• $500 from state treasurer's office Chief of Staff Jim Harris, who is Huckabee's brother-in-law and worked on his 2008 campaign.

• $500 from Land Commissioner John Thurston's campaign committee.

• $250 from Attorney General Leslie Rutledge. She was legal counsel on his 2008 campaign.

• $250 from Chief Deputy Attorney General Julie Benafield, who was a state insurance commissioner under Huckabee.

Huckabee's campaign headquarters is in Little Rock, and he made his official campaign announcement May 5 in his hometown of Hope.

His FEC report reflected payments made to several Arkansas businesses for campaign services, such as $2,750 to the University of Arkansas Community College at Hope, where he held his announcement, $1,072 to Doe's Eat Place in Little Rock for a dinner with reporters and $297 to Whole Hog Cafe in Little Rock for meals.

Quote of the Day: Mike Huckabee Wants American Wars to Last Ten Days Max // Mother Jones // Kevin Drum – July 17, 2015

From noted national security expert Mike Huckabee:

Here is what we have to do: America has to have the most formidable, fierce, military in the history of mankind. So when we have a threat, whether it is ISIS, Boko Haram, Al Qaeda, Hamas, Hezbollah, the Iranians, whatever it is, we make it very clear that we plan to push back and destroy that threat to us. And we won't take 10 years doing it, we hopefully won't even take 10 months, it will be like a 10 day exercise, because the fierceness of our forces would mean that we can absolutely guarantee the outcome of this film. That's how America needs to operate in the world of foreign affairs, and foreign policy.

Damn! If only we'd known this before. If we took this shit a little more seriously, we could have wiped out all these guys in a short series of ten-day bloodbaths. No more Al-Qaeda. No more ISIS. No more Hamas or Hezbollah. Even the entire country of Iran would apparently have fallen to our fierceness in ten days or so. Booyah!

Generally, speaking, I try not to obsess over each and every Idiocy of the Day™, since they fly fast and furious during campaign season. But I have to assume that Huckabee is being more than astonishingly ignorant here. He's also channeling the beliefs of a lot of base conservatives, who figure if we stopped pussyfooting around and spending all our time worrying about PC crap like gay soldiers and whatnot, we could unleash the full might of America and destroy our enemies in a matter of days or weeks. And that would be that.

I wonder how many people are out there who believe this? More than we think, probably. Maybe someone should take a poll.

Road to White House Paved on Path of Smoothies, Mattress Stores, and Outside Spending // NY Mag // Jaime Fuller – July 17, 2015

2016 presidential candidates have finally revealed how many people are giving them money so far — and where they've decided to spend it. As you might have expected, Hillary Clinton is in the lead, Senator Bernie Sanders has raised more small donations than anyone else (and Jeb Bush raised hardly any money from small donors), Republican candidates' super PACs are significantly outpacing their traditional fund-raising, and hardly anyone wanted to give Lincoln Chaffee or George Pataki any money.

Hillary Clinton received donations from a bunch of celebrities — Leonardo DiCaprio, Reese Witherspoon, and Ben Affleck — and Chuck Norris managed to find one Republican candidate he likes above all others: Mike Huckabee. Danny DeVito gave money to Martin O'Malley, and Bobby Jindal received financial support from Duck Dynasty stars. Sixty-three people actually gave more than $250 to Donald Trump — who bragged earlier this week that he was worth more than "TEN BILLION DOLLARS." One donor joked to the Daily Beast that he "was probably drunk" when he made the donation.

And what have the candidates done with all that money? This early in the race, money mostly goes into staffing up in the first primary states, an endless number of meet-and-greets, and spending money to raise money. Clinton has spent about 40 percent of her haul — and she still has more money on hand than any other candidate.

Traveling around the country constantly for months leads to some deliciously weird purchases, too. Listed out of context on a Federal Election Commission form, this campaign spending would work well as a writing prompt in a freshman writing seminar. Why did Mike Huckabee spend $2,657.81 at Mattress Firm, and what did "Tim the Balloonman" do with the $100 Ben Carson gave him? Why did Senator Marco Rubio list a 43-cent expense? (And in 2015, what can you actually buy for 43 cents?) Was the $6 that the Donald Trump campaign spent at Beignet Done That in Davenport, Iowa, well spent? What does $3,000 buy at Possum Holler Catering? Did the Bernie Sanders campaign buy smoothies or more at Minnesota Smoothie & More — and how nice is the office furniture his campaign bought on Craigslist?

FIORINA

Fiorina: Obama 'pallid' on Chattanooga shooting // The Hill // Mark Hensch - July 17, 2015

GOP presidential candidate Carly Fiorina has been underwhelmed so far by President Obama's response to Thursday's mass shooting in Chattanooga, Tenn.

Fiorina argued Friday that Obama is not treating the attack with the dignity it deserves.

"I think the president's response, as usual, has been a bit pallid," Fiorina told host Dana Loesch on The Blaze's "Dana." "This is an unbelievable tragedy."
"Whether this guy turns out to be ISIS-inspired or not, it's clearly an attack on the homeland and an American military installation, and not the first, as you point out," she added.
Mohammad Youssuf Abdulazeez, 24, killed four Marines by opening fire on two military facilities in Chattanooga on Thursday morning.

Police confirmed later that evening he also died during the attack.

Fiorina on Friday said arming personnel at U.S. military installations would prevent future incidents from claiming innocent lives.

"Of course we need to permit these fighting men and women to defend themselves," she said.

"I mean, think about it — these are Marines, who stormed battlefields in Ramadi and Afghanistan," she said.

"And they're killed by a coward driving by in his car and they have no way of defending themselves," Fiorina added. "It is outrageous."

"I would change the policy immediately, and I am very disappointed from the lack of action from this president."

Fiorina said the ban on arming U.S. military facility personnel is outdated because of the Islamic State in Iraq and Syria (ISIS).

"Immediately this policy should have been changed when we learned that ISIS was going to target military facilities, military men and women and their families," she said.

Reports emerged Thursday night that Abdulazeez had blogged about Islam before striking two locations in Chattanooga.

He first targeted a recruitment center on Lee Highway before next setting his sights on the U.S. Naval and Marine Reserve Center on Amnicola Highway.

Abdulazeez was a naturalized Kuwaiti who reportedly lived in Hixson, Tenn., mere miles from the scene of the crime.

Carly Fiorina records 'If men were treated like women in the office' video // Washington Times // David Sherfinski – July 17, 2015

Former Hewlett-Packard CEO and GOP presidential candidate Carly Fiorina, who has spoken about the sexism she's faced in the corporate world, turned the tables a bit in a new video she recorded with Buzzfeed.

"How do you walk in those shoes?" she asks a man wearing sneakers at the beginning.

"You like to bake — how about you handle the cake for Gina's birthday?" she asks later.

Ms. Fiorina, who announced her candidacy in early May, has been an aggressive critic of former Secretary of State and 2016 Democratic presidential front-runner Hillary Rodham Clinton and gave a speech at the Competitive Enterprise Institute last month about the state of women in America.

"A feminist is a woman who lives the life she chooses," Ms. Fiorina said. "A woman may choose to have five children and home-school them. She may choose to become a CEO or run for president."

The only female candidate in the Republican presidential field, Ms. Fiorina might not make it onto the stage at the first RNC-sanctioned GOP debate Aug. 6. The debate is limited to the top 10 candidates in an average of recent national polls. She was just outside the top 10 at 1 percent in a Fox News poll released Thursday.

In a video for Buzzfeed, Republican presidential hopeful Carly Fiorina took on the differences between how men and women are treated in the workplace.

I'll admit that I laughed multiple times throughout the video. On the surface, the lighthearted video is yet another example of Fiorina's grasp of the importance of reaching people on different platforms. It also showed Fiorina's willingness to address difficult topics that might appeal to a broad spectrum of voters.

But after finishing the video, I concluded that it was just another attempt to divide people. Amy Miller at Legal Insurrection said Fiorina's attempt to connect was "pandering."

"Carly is funny, engaging, and smart — but she used that power for evil. She walked into a young, modern, progressive venue, and threw her own womanhood under the bus in an effort to pander to a base that will never vote for her," Miller wrote. "Fiorina has defined herself as a businesswoman, CEO, and force to be reckoned with; she should not have to — and should never (NEVER) — have to play into the hands of liberals who work every day to manufacture divides in our society."

Let's go point-by-point on each issue raised in the video:

1. "How do you walk in those shoes?"

I laughed out loud at this part. The idea of a man in sneakers being asked this just tickled me.

I also don't find this question particularly sexist. High heels are difficult to walk in for a lot of women and are very painful. Other women — not men — are the ones who usually ask me if a shoe is difficult to walk in. I have asked this question myself with the ultimate goal of hoping the woman I'm asking has some simple secret to heel-wearing that makes them comfortable that I don't know about. That's never the case. You're either comfortable in heels or you're not.

On the flip side, I've also always wanted to ask people walking on stilts how they do that, but they are too high up to hear me.

2. "Getting talked over"

This one I've experienced. Maybe it's sexism, maybe I didn't speak up loudly enough. I've had people steal my ideas — and my jokes — because I wasn't heard and they were. One example of this occurred at one of my previous jobs — but I can't conclusively say that it was due to the fact that I am woman and not, say, the fact that I was new to politics and knew very little compared to the people around me (I definitely lacked confidence due to that).

The video suggests that this is just the way women are treated in the workplace, as if no woman has ever had her ideas heard because a man always steps in to steal them. That happens; it also happens to men. Certain bosses take credit for their subordinate's ideas, regardless of whether the subordinate is a man or a woman.

3. "Being defined by family"

Fiorina asks a male "coworker" in the video how he handles the work-life balance. I have no doubt that women with children get asked this question more than men with children.

The difference here reflects poorly on both sexes. When women are asked this, the implied question seems to be: "Why don't you spend more time with your children?" At the same time, not asking this question of men comes with the undertone that men don't need to be there for their children, or simply don't need to care about them.

The best idea here would be not to ask this question, especially of an acquaintance. I'm always amazed by people who are able to pack a lot of activities into a single day or week — even if those activities don't involve children. I don't think it is wrong to be curious about how they are able to do this — I simply want to know how they do it so that maybe I can be more active one day too (never going to happen, but I can dream).

4. "Getting assigned domestic tasks"

This one could be an error in the script, because Fiorina asks a male coworker: "You like to bake, how about you handle the cake for Gina's birthday?"

If she had said, "hey, you're a man, which means you must like baking, right?" I would have thought it was sexist. But what's wrong with asking someone who likes to do something if they would be willing to do that thing for others?

"Hey, Ashe, you know how to ride horses, would you be willing to teach my child to ride?" HOW DARE YOU ASK ME SUCH A QUESTION.

I don't see the harm in asking. If I were asked because it was assumed I know how to horseback ride because of my sex, that would be another story. But that's not how it was asked in the video.

The flip-side of this section of the video is the potential for hurt feelings if you bought a cake when — ohmygod! — you knew your co-worker Taylor loves to bake for everyone. What, you don't think Taylor's cakes are good enough? The opportunities to offend are endless.

5. "Being defined by family (again)"

I'll again give Buzzfeed this one. Fiorina asks her male coworker if work is less of a priority for him now that he has a family. Women could very well be asked this more often than men are after a child is born — I don't know, I've never heard of the question being asked at all. But it's plausible that women are more likely to get that question.

6. "(And again)"

"Does your wife help with the kids?" Fiorina asks her male coworker. Again I could see this question asked of either sex, but probably being asked more of women. I also think this question is asked more of women who don't work outside the home than of those who work in an office.

7. "Commenting on your food"

I actually have a big problem with this one. Not the problem brought up in the video — that women apparently are questioned about their food choices. Rather, my problem is that I ask people about their food. It's a personal problem that stems from having the palate of a child. I tend to inadvertently insult other's perfectly normal food choices. I'm working on it. I simply say nothing now.

I also think the question Fiorina asks about portion is actually more likely to be asked of men. I've never been asked this question and I'm always the person who loads her plate up with food. But I have seen men asked this question when they're embarking on what appears to be "Man versus food"-worthy proportions.

Though just because it's never happened to me doesn't mean it doesn't happen. I would venture to guess that it's women asking the question of other women rather than men asking the question.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

8. "Being talked down to"

Fiorina suggests not having "too many men" working on the same project because they might get "catty." This is another one of those statements I have never heard made about women. I've been working for only a decade, so maybe I've just been lucky.

The main problem with the video is that it implies that all the issues raised are commonplace. But that's simply not true. These things might happen in certain divisions of certain companies, but it's wrong to suggest that they're the norm.

The only people I hear suggesting otherwise are liberals.

9. "Being defined by your gender"

Fiorina tells her male coworker that she didn't know men could be funny. I would buy this statement more than any other that's presented in the video. Although I don't believe it's so much an issue in the workplace as in society in general. Well, unless your workplace is a comedy club, perhaps.

JINDAL

Bobby Jindal should just shut up: His simple-minded, dishonest Chattanooga comments make things worse // Salon // Sean Illing – July 17, 2015

Among the first GOP candidates to comment on the tragic shooting in Chattanooga, Tennessee, was Bobby Jindal. His response was every bit as trite and empty as you'd expect it to be. In an exclusive interview with Breitbart.com, Jindal said:

> "It's time for the White House to wake up and tell the truth…and the truth is that Radical Islam is at war with us, and we must start by being honest about that. There have been many bad things that have happened under President Obama. One that stands out to me was the horrible shooting at Ft. Hood…which was clearly an act of terrorism by a Radical Islamist. Yet the White House labeled that horrible act as 'workplace violence.' This is grotesque. You cannot defeat evil until you admit that it exists."

This statement is remarkably simpleminded and dishonest. In what sense has the White House failed to "tell the truth" about terrorism? Like so many Republicans, Jindal is obsessed with the superficial; he's intentionally oblivious to what Obama has actually done. Obama has made it fairly clear that we're at war with terrorists, especially Islamic terrorists. He's been far more effective, in fact, than the previous Republican administration at finding and killing said terrorists (remember bin Laden?).

What's dishonest about Jindal's statement is the implication that what happened in Chattanooga is a policy failure on the part of Obama. That's not at all the case. A man decided to sacrifice his life in order to kill other people. Just as the officer at Fort Hood decided, on his own, to kill innocent people. The truth is that there's no real defense against that. Life in a free society involves certain risks. All the armies in the world can't stop a lone gunman before he fires the first shot. This notion that if we dropped more bombs abroad or tightened immigration standards, we'd somehow be immune from attacks of this kind is a Republican fantasy, one no thinking person believes.

When something like this happens, our response should be simple: deal with it and carry on. Terrorism is a tactic — it's not defeatable. The best we can do is limit the conditions that breed terrorists while fighting them when and where we must, which is what Obama has done since taking office. Exaggerating every isolated attack into an apocalyptic threat plays perfectly into the enemy's narrative. Yet that's exactly what Jindal does. Indeed, he warned that yesterday's shooting (again, perpetrated by one man) is a reminder that we're being colonized by Muslims.

"What's not acceptable is people that want to come and conquer us. That's not immigration, by the way, that's colonization," Jindal said. This is preposterously stupid on every level. Yes, we're in a real war. Yes, there are Muslim extremists that want to kill us. And yes, we have to take that seriously. But America isn't being colonized. Suggesting otherwise is dangerous and needlessly alarmist.

The worst thing we can do, the thing Republicans often do, is blame a single person or party for a terrible and ultimately unavoidable attack. Republicans understand this when it's the other way around. The logic Jindal uses to pin this attack on Obama applies equally to Bush during 9/11. Indeed, by any measure, the Bush administration was infinitely more responsible for that incident, as it involved dozens of people and months of preparation to which they remained blind. Can you imagine the GOP's response if a Democratic candidate for president said, the day after 9/11, that it was Bush's fault, that 3,000 people died because he failed to take terrorism seriously? True or not, they'd have considered that treasonous, at the very least.

One of the luxuries of not being responsible for anything is that you can propose to do everything without explaining how you'd do it. This is what Jindal — and other Republican candidates — will likely do in the coming days. They'll talk about their plans to conquer terrorists and terrorism without, you know, mentioning strategy or tactics or the complexities of geopolitics. They can do this because they're not president, because they don't have any actual ideas, and because they're more interested in tossing red meat at their base than in mitigating terrorism.

Which is why no one should give a damn what they have to say about it.

TRUMP

Trump's Appeal? G.O.P. Is Puzzled, but His Fans Aren't // NYT // Jeremy W. Peters – July 17, 2015

LACONIA, N.H. — There are many, many things Donald Trump would like you to know about how he would run the country. As he told a standing-room-only crowd here the other night, turning America around would be a lot like running the Trump National Doral golf club in Miami, which he bought when it was in bankruptcy in 2012.

He is really smart. "I'm really smart," he boasted in Phoenix last weekend before rattling off his résumé highlights. "Went to the Wharton School of Finance. Even then, a long time ago, like the hardest, or one of the hardest, schools to get into."

People like him, clamor for him, must see him. Describing for an audience in Las Vegas how demand to see him at a recent event was so high, he said the venue managers had panicked and called, "begging us not to be there."

He is not wrong on this last point — even if he does sometimes embellish the size of his following, as he did here in New Hampshire. He declared that of the 300 or so people who packed a suffocatingly hot banquet hall, there must have been three times as many outside. There were not. And by the end of his speech, that estimate had ballooned to "thousands of people outside."

But the question that is giving so many Republicans heartburn today is how a man so few took seriously is suddenly a leading presidential contender.

Listening to Mr. Trump as he campaigned across the country over the last week, and talking to the people shouting "U.S.A! U.S.A.! U.S.A.!" who crammed into halls and ballrooms by the hundreds and sometimes thousands, shed some perspective on his appeal, and on the void he is filling in Republican politics.

Mr. Trump is not, as many Republicans have suggested, merely a renegade agitator who sneaked up on the party establishment and threatens to spoil its plans for a tidy, civil primary. Rather, Mr. Trump has become the new starring attraction for the restless, conservative-minded voters who think the political process is in need of disruption.

Some align themselves with the Tea Party movement. Others call themselves independents or Republicans who are just fed up. The praise they heap on Mr. Trump — "He speaks the truth," "He's fearless," "He's not politically correct" — echoes the words conservatives have used to describe others, like Sarah Palin and Senator Ted Cruz of Texas, who have stirred their passions before.

"I think he means what he says," said Kristi Eglody, 63, a retired school counselor from Manchester. "He loves America, and he wants it to be better. And that's what I love about him."

Jerry DeLemus, 60, of Rochester, N.H., said he liked the idea of voting for a candidate who had not been in politics very long and found Mr. Trump's swagger inspiring. "You won't leave confused about where he stands," he said. "And how fun would it be to watch him debate Hillary Clinton?"

"We need the truth," Mr. DeLemus went on. "We don't have to like the truth. But we need it."

The adulation that Mr. Trump is enjoying now can be a complicated, paradoxical gift. Voters like Mr. DeLemus, who said he tended to vote Republican and identifies with the Tea Party movement, often draw motivation from outsize personalities like Mr. Trump. But they have also generally rejected any singular figure as a leader. And in that sense, Mr. Trump could find his moment fleeting, the latest showman to lead a movement that has so far refused to be led.

Mr. Trump has found success by putting a sharper edge on a popular conservative message: that the United States is an exceptional nation run by unexceptional people who are fundamentally altering what it means to be American.

In Las Vegas, he lamented: “We don’t have victories anymore. We used to have victories. We used to be great.”

In Phoenix, he said: “We have stupid leaders. The American dream is dead. But I’m going to make it bigger, better and stronger.” To chants of “U.S.A.! U.S.A.! U.S.A.!” he vowed: “Don’t worry, we’ll take our country back. Very soon.”

The implication is that he will take the country back from incompetent leaders and undocumented immigrants. And this is where there is a darker side to his promises to make America great again, one that many critics, including Republicans, say feeds on xenophobia and racist caricatures of immigrants.

To reinforce his claims that Mexico is sending rapists and murderers across the border in droves, he has been traveling the country with people whose relatives were killed by immigrants who entered the country illegally. He has them share their stories with his audiences.

“The illegals come in, and the illegals killed their children,” he said at a news conference in California recently as he introduced the victims’ family members. One man talked about how his son had been crushed to death under the car of an undocumented immigrant. A woman accused the news media of hiding the nationalities of the people committing crimes like these. “They never tell you what nationality they are,” she said. “Most of them are Mexican.”

Mr. Trump’s attacks on Mexicans seems politically short-sighted, many Republicans say. Every month for the next two decades, 50,000 Hispanics turn 18 and will be eligible to vote.

And some of his supporters acknowledge that he has gone too far with some of his comments, though they still believe he makes valid points about illegal immigration. “He probably didn’t really think about how that was going to come out,” said Paula Borbotsina, 69, of Manchester, who said she liked Mr. Trump mostly because she believes he would not feel beholden to anyone. “But a lot of bad people are coming over.”

But many of Mr. Trump’s followers acknowledged in interviews deep suspicions about Mexico. Some said they doubted whether President Obama was a citizen, a misrepresentation Mr. Trump himself has reinforced repeatedly.

“Finally here’s somebody who has some common sense and is not just pandering to people,” said Tom Mosier, 77, of Bisbee, Ariz., which is along the Mexican border. Both he and his wife, Ginger, drove up to hear Mr. Trump in Phoenix and said they believed the president was a Muslim and was not born in the United States.

Mr. Trump brushes off the charges that he is race-baiting and swears he has nothing but respect for Mexico — mostly because, he often says, their leaders are “much sharper, smarter and more cunning” than ours.

“I love Mexico!” he insists. Same for the Chinese. “I love China! I sell apartments for $10 million, $15 million, $25 million to people from China,” he said in Las Vegas.

Mr. Trump’s events are drawing the committed and the curious. And the large crowds he attracts seem to be a mix of people who want to do more homework for voting, and others who just want proximity to a celebrity and a picture. While many say they are attracted to Mr. Trump’s candor and his success, there are also many others who are not quite sure they can see themselves voting for him.

Bill Davies, 53, was on vacation in New Hampshire this week and decided to drive with his wife to Laconia because they were both intrigued by Mr. Trump. Mr. Davies, from Boston, said he was impressed but not quite sold.

“No one else is that direct,” he said. “No one else is going to speak their mind like that. But he’s a bit of a cartoon character, you have to admit.”

A lot of Republican voters agree with Donald Trump. What does that mean? // WaPo // Greg Sargent – July 17, 2015

Does the Donald Trump boomlet reflect widespread agreement among Republican voters with his views on immigration in their rawest, ugliest form? Or does it reflect something else that no one has been able to put a finger on yet?

At first glance, a new Fox News poll would seem to suggest the former:

Recently, presidential candidate Donald Trump called for a wall on the U.S.-Mexico border. He said

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

> Mexico is quote, “sending people that have lots of problems…they’re bringing drugs. They’re bringing crime. They’re rapists. And some, I assume, are good people.” Setting aside how Trump worded his comments, do you think he’s basically right on this or not?

Seventy percent of Republicans said Yes, versus only 27 percent who said No. Americans overall said Trump is wrong by 53-44; independents said the same by 61-36.

As I’ve argued, the GOP’s problem with Latino voters goes a lot deeper than Trump’s rhetoric. That problem is rooted in the fundamental underlying difference between the two parties’ views on immigration. Most Democrats believe the 11 million undocumented immigrants in this country have something positive to contribute, while most Republican lawmakers either don’t believe that or cannot accept legalization under any circumstances, because it would reward lawbreaking.

The new Fox finding perhaps comports generally with that. But this shouldn’t be taken too far. Other numbers from the Fox poll cast doubt on the idea that GOP voters are in the grip of unrelenting xenophobia. Large chunks of Republican voters agree that legal immigrants bring some positives to the country, such as new ideas and entrepreneurial spirit. This is in line with the view expressed by some GOP pollsters that Republican primary voters can be won over on immigration: their initial instinct is to lash out at the idea of legalization but they change their views when they are led through the moral and practical complexities of the problem. I like to think this is true. Indeed, I believe the instinct of many conservatives against rewarding lawbreaking should be engaged seriously, even if I disagree with it.

Still, how to explain the Trump boomlet? One GOP operative suggests an explanation for what’s motivating Trump’s supporters. “They seem to be galvanized by a notion that Washington is hopelessly corrupt – and you need somebody who is completely outside of the process to go in there and shake things up,” this operative says. “For a lot of these folks, I think immigration speaks more broadly to a federal government that’s not doing its job as effectively as they think it should be or could be.”

Perhaps. Alternatively, it could just be name-recognition, or something else still. As it happens, there is one way this question might be settled. Many Republicans expect an epic showdown between Trump and Jeb Bush on immigration, perhaps at the coming GOP debate. It’s possible that Jeb, who has challenged Republicans to accept that the 11 million are more than mere criminals, may try to call out Trump’s views for what they are before a high profile audience. If so, the reaction from GOP voters across the country will tell us a lot.

Donald Trump says he’s 10 times as popular as anyone else on Google. Nope. // WaPo // Philip Bump – July 17, 2015

If it's a day that ends in "y," it must be time to evaluate a hyperbolic claim from Donald Trump!

In an interview with Bloomberg News, Trump responded to a claim that he'd lied in his financial filing with the Federal Election Commission. (Which, as we noted this week, he doesn't need to do anyway.) "Could you imagine me signing a false document?" Trump told Bloomberg New's Mark Halperin. "Me? Right now the most high-profile guy in the world. More Google hits than anybody in the entire world by a factor of 10."

That, we can check! And, surprising no one, it's not true.

Google offers up a great deal of data on what people are searching for through its "Trends" tool. It allows you to see the frequency with which people are searching for particular terms, such as "Donald Trump."

Here's the last 90 days of searches for Trump. The scale at the left is proprietary; "100" is the peak amount of search for whatever terms are being considered.

The place where Trump has been searched the most? Mexico.

Notice that Trump is actually off his personal peak, which came at his announcement. But, being generous, we'll peg the "more popular by a factor of 10" to that peak. According to Trump, no one else should be getting above about a four.

So let's compare him with President Obama.

Oops. Obama generally engenders more interest than Trump, and his speech in Charleston put him well over Trump's maximum.

And that's just politics. If you throw in entertainers, who, we will note, count as "anybody in the entire world," Trump seems downright pedestrian.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

There's Justin Bieber...

... and, of course, the queen of the Internet, Kim Kardashian.

We had to check whether or not Kardashian met the famous John Lennon metric of popularity: Was she more searched than Jesus? Yes.

(An aside: Google allows you to narrow your query to focus on a particular topic. So if you were searching for "airplane," it might ask if you meant the vehicle or the 1970s movie. The clarifying term to pick out the correct Bieber is "singer-songwriter." For Kardashian, "television personality." For Jesus? "God.")

There you have it. Trump is pretty popular on the Google. But he's nowhere near 10 times as popular as everyone else.

Guys, we're starting to think that he exaggerates.

Donald Trump is now essentially guaranteed a spot on the debate stage // WaPo // Philip Bump – July 17, 2015

Donald Trump shouldn't be excoriating Univision on Twitter. He should be thanking them.

On June 30, Trump was at 4.2 percent in the Real Clear Politics polling average, good enough for eighth place. In our assessment of who would and wouldn't make the stage at the upcoming Fox News debate -- calculated by averaging the five most recent national polls -- Trump was on the bubble. Maybe in, maybe out.

Then Univision called him out for his anti-immigrant comments about Mexicans at his presidential announcement. In the new Fox poll released on Thursday, the Trump surge that resulted continues. His RCP average is now 15 percent -- half a point shy of the leader, Jeb Bush. And given that there have been only three polls taken this month and that the Fox debate is on August 6, there's basically no chance that enough new polls can emerge showing Trump doing badly enough that he won't make the top ten.

Here's our assessment, as it stands right now.

Alert! For the first time since we started doing this in late May, there's a change in the top ten. Rick Perry has dropped out of the top ten, and Rick Santorum has made the cut. (So zero net change on the first names on the stage. (If this is what it looks like in August, with a candidate left out because of a 0.1 percent difference, you can expect a lot of fury from the left-out parties.)

But back to Trump, he said with a sigh.

Since Fox News' June survey, Trump and Scott Walker are the only leading candidates to see an improvement. (On the chart below, anything outside of the gray area is a net plus for the candidate.) Jeb Bush dropped; Ben Carson dropped more.

So where did Trump's gains come from? All over the place. On the graphs below, Trump's is the largest, hugest, classiest, most luxurious dot. He picked up 15 points with people earning under $50,000 a year, 12 points with men, 13 points with evangelicals. No doubt to the massive frustration of Ted Cruz, Trump even gained 8 points with conservatives, despite holding some ... not conservative views.

For Trump to not make the stage at this point, one of the following things would have to happen.

1) Trump drops out.
2) Trump's poll numbers crumple and there are five new polls that reflect it. (Even if Trump loses all support in the next four polls, his average would be 3.6 points -- certainly enough to make the cut.)
3) Fox bars him on a technicality. Given that Fox is in the ratings business, that seems unlikely.

So that's about it. Look forward to Donald Trump on your television next month. Maybe he will say his catchphrase, "I suddenly appear to possibly be a viable candidate for the presidency!" Everyone loves that line.

Trump says building a U.S.-Mexico wall is 'easy.' But is it really? // WaPo // Jerry Markon – July 17, 2015

For centuries, societies have erected walls and fences to separate themselves from their neighbors, from the Great Wall of China through the Berlin Wall right up to the barrier that today divides Israel from the Palestinians on the West Bank.

The United States has debated putting up security barriers of its own along the Southwest border and has spent billions of dollars in recent years fencing one-third of it.

Now, Donald Trump is proposing to go even further, vowing to build a massive, impenetrable wall along the U.S.-Mexico frontier to keep out illegal Mexican migrants. “Building a wall is easy, and it can be done inexpensively,” the Republican presidential candidate said in an interview. “It’s not even a difficult project if you know what you’re doing.”

The wall has become the signature proposal of Trump’s campaign, which has stirred widespread controversy over its focus on illegal immigration and his comments about immigrants.

Any wall-building effort would cost billions of dollars and encounter a variety of obstacles, according to experts, documents and federal officials, including some of the same difficulties that bedeviled the federal government as it spent more than $7 billion on border fencing. The hurdles include environmental and engineering problems; fights with ranchers and others who don’t want to give up their land; and the huge topographical challenges of the border, which runs through remote desert in Arizona to rugged mountains in New Mexico and, for two-thirds of its length, along rivers.

If such a barrier could be erected, experts and government officials agreed that making it impenetrable would be virtually impossible, as is completely securing the entire 1,954-mile border. The Department of Homeland Security is already spending millions of dollars a year to maintain existing fences and to repair breaches, according to government reports and officials, while drug traffickers and smugglers are increasingly using tunnels to pass underneath.

While a wall along much of the border might theoretically be possible, said Thad Bingel, a former senior U.S. Customs and Border Protection official, “is it desirable? At what cost, and what do you give up to pay for that?”

Bingel — who was involved in border fence-building during the George W. Bush administration and is now a partner at Command Consulting Group in Washington — added: “Every wall can be circumvented. People can go under it, they can go over it. . . . No one should go into this with the idea that if you just build the right kind of wall, no one will get through.”

Trump disputed that, saying that a wall “would be very effective” in deterring illegal migrants and that seismic and other equipment could detect and stop any underground tunnels. “A wall is better than fencing, and it’s much more powerful,” he said. “It’s more secure. It’s taller.”

The veteran builder acknowledged that environmental impact studies would be difficult but said he is the one person who can rise to the challenge. “I’m considered a great builder, by everybody,” he said, adding that cost is irrelevant because he would force Mexico to pay for the structure. Asked whether that was realistic, Trump said: “It’s realistic if you know something about the art of negotiating. If you have a bunch of clowns negotiating, it’s not realistic.”

Trump’s vision

Trump has emerged as a leading GOP candidate partly because of his strong statements about immigration, which have included describing Mexicans entering the country illegally as “rapists” and “murderers.” He has suggested at times that his proposed wall would be extensive and would cover nearly the entire border, but said in the interview: “You don’t have to build it in every location. There would be some locations where you would have guards, where you don’t need it because the topography acts as its own wall, whether that’s water or very rough terrain.”

The concept of a wall or fence along virtually the entire border has bubbled up occasionally in the nation’s immigration debate, with some Republicans supporting the idea. Today, there are more than 45 such walls and border fences worldwide, perhaps most prominently Israel’s West Bank barrier.

While Israeli officials say it has reduced attacks, security specialists say that barrier, slated to be more than 400 miles long when finished, is not comparable to what would be required along the far more extensive U.S. Southwest border. The Israelis, they add, supplement the physical concrete barrier with a mix of border police and technology, much as the Department of Homeland Security does in the United States.

The U.S. government began building border fencing near San Diego in 1990. As DHS cracked down on illegal immigration after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, President George W. Bush dramatically expanded the effort. Spending on border fencing and related infrastructure such as lighting shot up from $298 million in 2006 to $1.5 billion the following year, according to the nonpartisan Congressional Research Service.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Overall, more than $7 billion has been spent to build what is now almost 653 miles of Southwest border fencing — costing nearly $5 million per mile in some spots — nearly half in Arizona.

The costs could rise substantially if extensive new fencing was built, since it would be in increasingly remote regions without roads and in mountainous terrain, said Marc Rosenblum, deputy director of the U.S. immigration policy program at the Migration Policy Institute. Adding even more to the expense, he said, would be acquiring private land near the border and maintaining existing fencing.

Trump's wall would probably cost far more than fencing, Stana said, given the greater needs for construction materials and labor.

A broader strategy

While current and former DHS officials say the fencing has been effective in deterring illegal immigration, they say it is only one part of a broader border strategy that includes expanded sensors, drones and other technology, along with growing numbers of Border Patrol officers.

"Our southern border is a mixture of winding river, desert and mountains. Simply building more fences is not the answer," DHS Secretary Jeh Johnson said in an October speech.

The government's difficulties in erecting fences highlight the challenges of building a wall, experts said. The fencing mandated by Congress in 2006 was beset by delays, surging construction costs and disputes with private property owners, mostly in Texas, DHS officials have said. The biggest failure was the virtual fence, a Bush administration effort to cover the border with a high-tech surveillance system.

"It's a huge effort to construct anything at the border," said one DHS official, who has worked in Republican and Democratic administrations and spoke on the condition of anonymity because Trump's plan is part of a political campaign. "You have lots of requirements to do construction: the environmental piece, engineering assessments. And a private landowner might not want fencing."

Wayne Cornelius, director of the Mexican migration field research program at the University of California at San Diego, called Trump's proposal "ludicrous. . . . Any physical barrier can be tunneled under or climbed over or gotten around. There will always be gaps, and smugglers and migrants will seek out those gaps and go through."

Donald Trump seizes on Chattanooga shooting // Politico // Nick Gass – July 17, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Donald Trump is calling to eliminate gun-free zones on military bases in the United States in the wake of Thursday's shooting attacks at two military centers in Chattanooga, Tennessee.

Muhammad Youssuf Abdulazeez opened fire at two civilian military facilities on Thursday, killing four Marines and injuring three others, according to officials. Abdulazeez was killed in a subsequent gunfight with police, reports said.

"Get rid of gun free zones. The four great marines who were just shot never had a chance," Trump tweeted Friday. "They were highly trained but helpless without guns."

In an interview with Fox News' Bill O'Reilly on Thursday night, Trump also decried President Barack Obama and others for not calling the shootings acts of "Islamic terrorism."

Terrorism is only going to get worse in the U.S., Trump told O'Reilly, because "people don't respect our law enforcement, and I think they don't respect our country and we're taking power away from the police."

"Whether it's Islamic or anything else, it's getting worse. We're losing law and order. They don't respect — you look at what's happening in Detroit, you look at what's happening in Baltimore or Chicago, it's getting worse all the time," Trump said.

Tennessee Gov. Bill Haslam said it's ultimately up to the U.S. military to decide on any new protection measures at civilian facilities, adding in an interview on MSNBC's "Morning Joe" that it's still "awfully early to try to come to a new conclusion about that."

The Republican governor said he was not concerned about the potential for reprisals against Muslims in Chattanooga and Tennessee, saying that people in his state "are both sickened and saddened" by Thursday's events.

Donald Trump: My supporters aren't 'crazies' // Politico // Nick Gass – July 17, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Donald Trump says the people who came out to see him last weekend in Phoenix weren't "crazies," as Arizona Sen. John McCain claimed in a recent interview.

In fact, Trump declared in a telephone interview with MSNBC's "Morning Joe," the five-term senator will lose his primary next year "if the right person runs against him."

"They weren't crazies. They were great Americans, and I know crazies, believe me," Trump said.

These people "wanted to know about illegal immigration. It's killing them," he added.

"And when he called them crazies—I think he will lose in the primary," Trump predicted, with the caveat: "If the right person runs against him."

McCain's comments came in an interview with The New Yorker's Ryan Lizza published Thursday, in which the Arizona senator said Trump "fired up the crazies" with his rally.

The mystery of the Trump coalition // Politico // Ben Schreckinger and Cate Martel – July 17, 2015

Last weekend, Donald Trump added to his long list of bold claims by declaring himself the champion of a new "silent majority" of Americans.

While 17 percent of Republican voters isn't a majority, and the 4,000 raucous supporters cheering him in Arizona were anything but silent, Trump has hurtled to the top of several recent GOP primary polls. Apparently, he speaks for some Americans. So who are they and where did they come from?

As it turns out, the Trump coalition looks a lot like the rest of the Republican Party. Other than a spike in support in the Northeast, there is little in recent polling data to distinguish Trump's supporters from the heart of the GOP primary electorate. Even immigration hardliners support him at the same rate as the rest of the Republican Party.

"It's a strange coalition of people," said Patrick Murray of Monmouth University. "We can't pin them down demographically. … It appears he's cherry-picked individual voters."

Interviews with Trump supporters at a rally on Saturday in Phoenix and in New Hampshire, where he was among the first candidates to hire staffers, suggest he is attracting Republicans from many corners of the party who are drawn to his image as a straight-talking businessman who would shake up politics as usual.

"The issues that are driving the average Trump voter are, first and foremost, that he's not a politician. Secondly, he is self-funding his campaign, so he can't be bought," said Steve Stepanek, Trump's New Hampshire co-chairman, who supported Newt Gingrich in 2012 and Rudy Giuliani in 2008.

"People today are looking for plainspoken people who say what's on their mind," said Lou Gargiulo, a New Hampshire activist and Trump's Rockingham County co-chair who supported Mitt Romney in the 2008 and 2012 Republican primaries.

Trump voters skew older, whiter and more male, but no more so than the rest of the Republican primary electorate.

In a Monmouth poll released on Monday that put Trump in second place and a Suffolk University/USA Today poll released on Tuesday that put him in first, the real estate mogul fared better among somewhat conservative voters and very conservative secular voters than he did among moderates and religious conservatives.

At least in that way, said Murray, they really are like Richard Nixon's silent majority of middle Americans. "They're in the middle of the Republican Party. They're not evangelicals. They're not hardline social or fiscal conservatives. They're also not on the liberal side of the party," he said.

Because Trump had flirted with running for president before without jumping in, many observers doubted he would do so, and most polls before mid-May did not include his name.

Trump's rise came so suddenly and unexpectedly, and Republican voters are divided among so many candidates, that the data to fully understand the Trump coalition does not yet exist, said Quinnipiac University pollster Peter Brown.

What Murray can say definitively about Trump is that he is an anomaly. In a Monmouth poll released a month ago, Trump had the worst favorability rating of any Republican candidate among Republican voters, 20 percent favorable to 55 percent unfavorable, a fact cited by many political observers in pooh-poohing his viability. In the poll out this week, Trump's favorability has pulled nearly even at 41-40. The swing was even more dramatic among self-identified tea party voters, who went from viewing him unfavorably, 55 percent to 20 percent, to viewing him favorably 56 percent to 26 percent.

“I’ve never seen a candidate who’s so well known who was able to suddenly turn around people’s opinions of him,” Murray said.

Even as Republican elites decried his claims about the alleged criminality of undocumented Mexican immigrants (which defy all available evidence) and brands cut ties with him, a large chunk of GOP primary voters were evaluating him in a positive light.

Joan Riscki, 67, a Phoenix resident and retiree, is an independent who voted for Mitt Romney in the general election in 2012. “I usually vote for Democrats, but it’s a bad situation now,” she told POLITICO outside Trump’s rally on Saturday. “They’re all liars anyways. I try not to listen to the news. I listen to KFYI,” a local conservative talk radio station.

Matt Bates, 52, a property manager from Scottsdale, who remains uncommitted to a presidential candidate, said he found out about the Trump event from his in-laws, who had heard about it on Fox News. “He’s not a politician, he’s a businessman,” Bates said of Trump’s appeal.

His wife, Stephanie, 52, a grocery store manager, said she supports Trump. “His views are similar to the GOP, but he’s not in anybody’s pocket,” she said. “You can’t trust the rest of them.”

Hazel Powell, 68, also of Phoenix, is a retired Peace Corps volunteer (she felt the need to leave the country after Obama’s election) and a fan of “The Apprentice,” Trump’s reality show on NBC. “I’ve always liked Donald with his television shows, his aggressiveness. He just speaks the truth,” she said.

The crowd in Phoenix was overwhelmingly white (as is the Republican primary electorate), and Trump’s fellow Republicans have condemned his comments about undocumented immigrants as racist, but Powell said he would eventually win over Latinos. “The Latinos are going to support him because they’re smart enough to know: He’s going to get them jobs.”

Trump has made the same claim, saying that “tens of thousands” of Latinos have worked for him over the years and that they “love” him.

In New Hampshire, Trump is currently polling second to Bush.

Greg Moore, the state director for the Koch-backed group Americans for Prosperity, which lost several staffers to Trump’s Granite State effort, has gotten an up-close look at the mogul’s supporters. His offices share a building with Trump’s campaign. He said he sees a lot of unfamiliar faces coming and going from Trump’s New Hampshire headquarters — not the state’s typical Republican activist crowd.

“They seem to be galvanized [by] a notion that Washington is hopelessly corrupt – and you need somebody who is completely outside of the process to go in there and shake things up,” he said. “Immigration really isn’t an issue in New Hampshire, but for a lot of these folks, I think immigration speaks more broadly to a federal government that’s not doing its job as effectively as they think it should be or could be.”

Despite Trump’s recent success capitalizing on widespread discontent with Washington, establishment Republicans say they aren’t worried his support will make him a viable candidate.

“I don’t think in the end, people when they vote in the primary will throw their vote away,” said Judd Gregg, a former senator and New Hampshire governor. “They’re not going to vote for somebody who isn’t a legitimate candidate for the nomination who can win the nomination and can govern.”

Trump brings his bluster to Bill Clinton's hometown // Politico // Annie Karni – July 17, 2015

Hot Springs, Ark. — A large highway sign on the drive to the Hot Springs Convention Center advertises the town proudly as the “boyhood home of President Bill Clinton.”

But Republican presidential candidate Donald Trump was the big name in town here Friday night, where he keynoted the state’s annual GOP dinner, and reminded a crowd of about 1,000 attendees: “By the way, Hillary Clinton, with her husband, deserted Arkansas.”

The state has changed politically since the Clintons were the stars of the Democratic Party here. The state that was once reliably blue has turned red — President Barack Obama lost Arkansas by 24 points in his 2012 reelection campaign. The changing tide was on display in the large, enthusiastic crowd that gave Trump a warm welcome.

Hillary Clinton, who is headlining a Democratic Party dinner in Little Rock on Saturday evening, seemed to be worth no more than a few throw-away insults for Trump, who lumped her together with former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush as a politician beholden to donors and special interests. “I don’t need money,” he said, “so the real thing is, I don’t owe anybody any favors.”

Trump wasn’t even beholden to a teleprompter or any prepared notes.
In a 40-minute speech, the real-estate mogul and former television personality rambled about his favorite subjects: his high poll numbers (“as you know, I’ve been No.1 in all the polls”); the Iran deal (“disgusting, done by rank amateurs”); the Mexican border (“people are just flowing in”); China (“when was the last time you saw this country beat China in a trade deal?”); and, of course, his personal wealth (over $10 billion!”).

Throughout his stream-of-consciousness remarks, he had one overarching theme: all other nations have smart leaders, and America has inept leaders — but he could change that.

“The Persians are great negotiators,” he said of the Iran deal. “I watched this negotiator on television, after watching for about four minutes, I said there’s no way that [Secretary of State John] Kerry and our people can deal with this guy, he’s too smart.”

Closer to home, “the problem is the Mexican leaders are much sharper and more cunning than our leaders,” he said. “They’re much more cunning!”

He dinged “the genius pundits, who are really dumb people,” for doubting he would really run for president.

“We need smart people,” he said of the Republican Party. “We have to be wise … People are tired of watching us get ripped off. They’re tired of stupidity … I’m, like, this person who knows how the system works, and I made lot of money.”

He criticized Kerry for not pushing harder to bring home the American prisoners still held in Iran, while negotiating a nuclear deal.

“Complicate the deal?” he said, “Hey, we want four people, that’s complicated?”

In Trump’s world view, all his competitors are too inept to “make this country great again.”

“Bush will never have a clue, and Hillary will never have a clue, that I can tell you,” he said. “Who would you rather have negotiating against China or Mexico: Bush, Hillary, or Trump?”

Unlike most presidential candidates, who view the media as second to the voters they are in town to meet, Trump held a 15-minute press availability before his speech. There, he didn’t answer questions so much as use them as prompts to launch into his talking points blasting Obamacare and illegal immigration.

The convention center was teeming with a surprisingly diverse crowd for a Trump dinner just before his arrival. But all of the African American attendees, it became clear, were on site to attend a Jehovah’s Witness conference taking place next door. Trump’s crowd, in the end, was almost completely white.

And the attendees — some of whom paid $350 for dinner and a photo op with Trump — were taken with him.

“I would vote for him today,” said Darich Nations, who works for Arkansas State Parks, and bought a “Trump for President” t-shirt on her way out. “He’s honest. He’s not afraid to say what he’s thinking. He’s not afraid of big government, of foreign governments, of PACs, he’s not owned by anybody.”

Jane Phillips, who works for two local magazines, said she was impressed with his record in New York City, “the hotels, the jobs, creating them in New York,” she said, “It’s really quite amazing.”

Huffington Post Can't Make Trump Go Away by Ignoring Him // Bloomberg // Will Leitch – July 17, 2015

As of this precise second–and this might well change by the time I finish this sentence–there are 21 people running for President. Twenty have officially announced, and one (Gov. John Kasich) is expected to join the race soon. Some of them will be weeded out by the first debate, some will vanish by Iowa, all but two (probably) will be gone by next summer and eventually one of them will actually become the 45th President of the United States. Some of those 21 people are more likely to reach that level than others, but no one has cast a single vote, and no one will for another 199 days. We’re all just guessing.

These things tend to go crazy. At this point four years ago, Michelle Bachmann was rising in the polls and would end up winning the Iowa straw poll, knocking out two candidates right then and there. Over the next few months, Herman Cain, Rick Santorum, Rick Perry and Newt Gingrich would all surge and fall in the polls; Cain, a man who was running for public office for the first time, even reached the cover of Newsweek magazine. Cain never ever had a realistic shot of becoming President, and it seems quite possible, in retrospect, looking at that smoking ad, that he was maybe insane.

This cycle, Donald Trump is the elephant in the room.

But you couldn't wish away Herman Cain just because he made terrifying campaign ads. You can't ignore polls just because you want to.

Which brings us, as everything tends to do these days, to Donald Trump. This morning, the Huffington Post announced that it will no longer cover the "campaign"–those air quotes are theirs–of Trump, saying "Trump's campaign is a sideshow. We won't take the bait. If you are interested in what The Donald has to say, you'll find it next to our stories on the Kardashians and The Bachelorette." Now it's worth noting that as I type this, the Huffington Post politics page has this story placed directly below one titled "Donald Trump's 1990 Nazi Nightstand," one of four Trump stories on the page. But those could just be grandfathered in. Let's take them at their word. Let's assume they're done.

I am sure everyone at Huffington Post Politics felt better about themselves this morning when they posted that statement. People who cover politics take a lot of pride in covering something of consequence. Reporting can be a demoralizing job where you spend every day hounding people who don't want to talk to you, getting called horrible things by strangers, making less money that your college friends who gave up and went to law school, and watching your current colleagues lose their jobs all around you at an increasingly alarming rate. The upside is the self-importance that comes with covering Politics, capital P. You can tell yourself you are writing the first draft of history. You're not recapping reality television or captioning celebrity sex tapes. You have prestige.

For some journalists, Donald Trump seems to trample this prestige. People don't go into covering politics to write about people like Trump; he's what they got into this to avoid. And I get it. It can be frustrating to do your best to explain to your readers the complexities of the Iran deal and have them care more about what Donald Trump's favorite Vegas stage show is. (Not Penn & Teller, in case you were wondering.) Donald Trump can make you feel worse about your job.

But, you know, the job's a job. Just because you believe Donald Trump shouldn't be a legitimate candidate for President doesn't mean he actually isn't. Wringing your hands about the fact that Trump is starting to actually lead in national polls may make you feel better about yourself, but for a political journalist, it's a questionable impulse. Imagine a sports reporter not including Patriots' scores because they don't like Bill Belichick, or an entertainment reporter refusing to mention Transformers box office results because Michael Bay is destroying America. You can have these thoughts–I might even agree with you–but that doesn't mean you get to cover your eyes and plug your ears and wish away facts, however distasteful.

Well, Trump isn't going to win, this is all a stunt, you say. Well, yeah, probably not: I don't think Donald Trump is going to be elected President in November 2016 either. (I actually just shuddered typing that.) But what, exactly, makes Trump a less viable candidate than George Pataki, or Bobby Jindal? Sure, they've won elected office and he hasn't ... but, in the Fox poll, they have zero percent of voters picking them as a first choice. Surely being in first place in a poll gives one some legitimacy? And even if Trump doesn't win, it doesn't mean he's not going to matter. He has clearly galvanized a certain percentage of the Republican electorate, and other candidates are already strategizing as to how to respond to Trump, and his voters. Those votes will count, even if other candidates are able to pry them away from Trump; the section of the electorate that Trump has worked up is a substantial, real one. They exist. Politicians will go after them. That all looks a heckuva lot like politics to me. What is HuffPo going to do when Trump is on stage at the debate? "Bush responded to [NAME REDACTED] accusation that was a 'loser' with a frown."

This campaign cycle, Trump is the elephant in the room. He's ridiculous, sure. The only thing sillier is pretending he's not there.

A Note About Our Coverage Of Donald Trump's 'Campaign' // HuffPo // Ryan Grim and Danny Shea – July 17, 2015

After watching and listening to Donald Trump since he announced his candidacy for president, we have decided we won't report on Trump's campaign as part of The Huffington Post's political coverage. Instead, we will cover his campaign as part of our Entertainment section. Our reason is simple: Trump's campaign is a sideshow. We won't take the bait. If you are interested in what The Donald has to say, you'll find it next to our stories on the Kardashians and The Bachelorette.

Why Donald Trump is surging in the polls // CNN // Sara Murray – July 17, 2015

Laconia, New Hampshire (CNN)Donald Trump, surging in the polls, arrived at this lakeside enclave and trained his ire on perhaps the only target that aggravates his supporters as much as the Obama Administration: Republicans.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"They're all talk, they're no action," Trump said, revving up his fiery takedown of politicians.

"I'm more disappointed in many ways with the Republicans," Trump said. "They have this great indignation, whether it's Benghazi or the emails... nothing ever happens."

Trump is enjoying a summer surge as takes the lead in a poll of Republican presidential contenders released on Friday. The billionaire businessman is offending Hispanics and irking his GOP competitors but it's clear that his in-your-face demeanor and willingness to take on President Barack Obama -- then just as quickly turn his sharp tongue toward members of his own party -- is winning over Republican voters.

"Even though I'm a Republican and I'm obviously voting that way, I'm very disappointed in the Republicans in the House. There's weakness there," said Julie Pagliarulo, a 56-year-old resident of Belmont, New Hampshire, who arrived hours early to see Trump speak. "Donald just says it like it is. I love it."

Friday's Fox News poll found Trump leading with support from 18% of Republican primary voters nationwide, compared to 15% for Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker and 14% for former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush. Statistically speaking, the top three candidates are within the margin of error, and therefore tied -- a point Trump tends to leave out of his speeches.

Belknap County, nestled in New Hampshire's picturesque southeastern lakes region, is home to 60,000 predominantly white residents. They tend to be middle class, with a median household income of nearly $59,000, according to Census data. The unemployment rate in May stood at a modest 3.3%, well below the 5.5% national rate that month.

Each summer, Laconia -- where Trump held his rally -- plays host to one of the nation's largest gatherings of motorcyclists. The town is more than 2,000 miles from the U.S.-Mexico border.

Grievances

On a recent muggy summer evening, residents here were angry about everything from border security and the economy to Benghazi, Obamacare and more. Trump was speaking to their grievances, an approach that helps explain his rise in the polls.

Bert Hansen, 74 years old, joined hundreds of voters jammed into an overheated community center in Laconia waiting to see Trump. The soft-spoken veteran believes Obama is "incompetent" and bristles when recalling a relative who once said he was racist because he doesn't like the president. In fact, Hansen said, he's a big fan of GOP presidential candidate Ben Carson, who is black.

"There's some pent up frustration in the population right now that's ready to explode," Hansen said said. "That's why Trump's doing so well."

New Hampshire voters said Trump spoke to their broad range of concerns. But his greatest appeal may be that they see him as authentic and unfiltered. The opposite, voters said, of even the Republicans they elected to serve them in Congress.

"When he talks, he talks like them. He has the same frustrations they do," said Craig Robinson, a GOP activist in Iowa and editor of The Iowa Republican website. "They still want someone who's just going to turn Washington on its head."

Brenda Connolly, a 73-year-old independent voter, said she's disillusioned by politics these days.

"I don't think they're standing up to the president," she said of Republicans in Washington. "I voted for them as an independent and I expected them to do a lot more."

As for Trump, "I'm not even saying he's going to be the president, but I think he makes Republicans aware of what middle America wants," she said.

It appears voters' views of Trump are not yet set in stone even though he's well known. Some polls show his favorability numbers climbing among Republicans. The majority of Republicans -- 57% -- had a favorable view of Trump and 40% had an unfavorable view or him in the latest Washington Post/ABC News poll. That's a big shift from late May, when the same poll found 65% of Republicans had an unfavorable view of Trump.

Limits to Trump's appeal

There are limits to the billionaire's appeal in the context of a potential general election. More than six in 10 Americans viewed Trump negatively in the Post/ABC poll. And despite Trump's vow to win the Hispanic vote, his controversial comments about illegal immigration and America's relationship with Mexico are tarnishing him in the eyes of Latinos. More than seven out of 10 registered Hispanic voters said they had an unfavorable view of Trump, according to a Univision News poll. Univision recently cut ties with Trump and abandoned plans to air his Miss Universe Pageant.

The former "Apprentice" star's media savvy has helped his bid as well. Trump has pounced on a number of recent news events -- the San Francisco killing of Kate Steinle by an undocumented immigrant and drug lord Joaquin "El Chapo" Guzman's escape from the most secure prison in Mexico -- to bolster his argument that the U.S. needs to secure the border and take a tougher line in its relationship with Mexico.

Meanwhile, other GOP presidential contenders are trying to reclaim the mantle of Beltway outsider. Bush plans to deliver a speech Monday on how to reform Washington. New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie has tried to pitch himself as the straight talker in the field.

Christie's performance so far hasn't impressed Bill Borrebach, a 68-year-old resident of Sandwich, New Hampshire, who makes it his business to see as many candidates as he can in this first-in-the-nation primary state.

"I don't know if he has the wherewithal to go to Mrs. Clinton and say we're tired of all her stuff," he said of Christie.

Borrebach flashed a Trump bumper sticker he had tucked into the pocket of his floral shirt. Breaking into a smile, he added, "it's going to drive my neighbors nuts."

Donald Trump is Dominating Facebook Chatter in Iowa // TIME // Charlotte Adler – July 17, 2015

Donald Trump is monopolizing the conversation in Iowa, at least on social media.

According to data from Facebook, Trump's name has appeared in over 200,000 Facebook interactions between 66,000 people in the early-voting state in the last week. That's more than double the interactions of the next-most-talked about candidate, Democratic front-runner Hillary Clinton, who was the subject of 86,000 interactions between 31,000 people.

Trump also dominated the Facebook conversation compared to his Republican rivals. The next-most-talked-about GOP hopeful is Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker, with 37,000 interactions among 14,000 people. Former Florida Governor Jeb Bush's name came up 23,000 among 12,000 people. Facebook measured the data between July 10 and July 16, just among Iowa voters.

Facebook has no way to know whether the mentions of Trump are positive or negative, and social media buzz does not necessarily translate into votes. And since computer algorithms are notoriously bad at distinguishing between sarcasm and sincerity, it's hard to know whether the flood of Facebook mentions means Trump is being widely praised or widely mocked. As the 2016 presidential campaign swings into gear, campaigns and data analysis firms are looking for ways to reliably interpret this flood of data and use it to target potential voters, Reuters reports.

Trump and the myth of a Mexican crime wave // The Hill // Raoul Lowery Contreras – July 17, 2015

We have seen how Donald Trump insults Mexicans by his tone and his misstatement of facts on business and trade. He goes even further in insulting Mexican immigrants by suggesting they are criminals and rapists.

Yes, some Mexicans are criminals but not, as he implies, all. One need not believe Trump said that on June 16, but he did imply that; I watched him live, I've read the transcript. He implied all or at best, most, because he did say "some" Mexicans were nice people.

Also disagreeing with Trump's implication is former Texas Gov. Rick Perry (R), who debunks Trump — and he should know. Perry declares that Trump knew exactly what he was saying when he said it.

Trump's June 16 announcement about Mexicans, crime and building a "great wall" on the Mexican border and having the Mexicans pay for it is pure demagoguery said only to appeal to low-information voters.
Remember, Trump did not say "illegal alien Mexicans" in his June 16 statement. He said: "When Mexico sends its people, they're not sending their best ... They're sending people that have lots of problems and they're bringing those problems with us. They're bringing drugs, they're bringing crime, they're rapists, and some, I assume, are good people."

Let's prove Trump wrong. There is no crime wave by illegals from Mexico. There is crime, yes, but not a crime wave and he has no authentic statistics to support his claim. He has anecdotes. Even the San Francisco story is an anecdote.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Where are official statistics from law enforcement agencies? They are not produced because the Trumps of the world depend on anti-immigrant nongovernmental organizations that puff up phony stats to suit their and Trump's anti-Mexican-immigrant passion.

Let's look at real numbers. California has the largest number of illegal aliens: 2.5 million, maybe more. It also has the second most prison inmates (Texas is No. 1).

California's latest official prison numbers, from 2013, are 133,390 prisoners. Of the 133,390 prisoners, there were 13,010 Mexican-born prisoners, less than 10 percent. And of those, 9,605 had actual or potential "holds" assigned by the federal government for possibly being illegal aliens.

Note: Being Mexican-born is not proof of illegal presence in the U.S. as Mexico has been the largest source of legal immigration for decades.

Seven percent of the California prison population might be illegal aliens from Mexico — some crime wave, Mr. Trump.

Trump and his supporters will point to the federal prison system, which has 33,000 Mexican-born inmates, 16 percent of the total population of 159,000. Wow! That's horrible — except that most are not there for violent crimes, for murder, for rape, for aggravated assault; they are there mostly for immigration violations and smuggling of cigarettes, marijuana and other illicit substances. Trump won't say that, even if he knows it, because that would derail his tirade.

Even the anti-immigrant Center for Immigration Studies (CIS) hasn't found proof to support Trump. Jessica Vaughan, CIS director of policy studies, has said that connections between illegal immigrants and crime are hard to make. She studied crime and illegal immigrants and has said: "We didn't find any evidence to support the idea that either immigrants are more prone to crime or less prone to crime than ... legally resident Americans. ... It's very tricky."

Not as tricky as Donald Trump, however.

Trump calls off his bet with MSNBC host // The Hill // Mark Hensch – July 17, 2015

GOP presidential candidate Donald Trump is calling off his bet of one year's salary with MSNBC host Lawrence O'Donnell over the accuracy of Trump's financial disclosure forms.

"Well, I'm very disappointed because I was really all set to go after him this morning," Trump said Friday on "Morning Joe." "But it's hard to do that now. And now I feel guilty if I do that."

Trump issued the bet on Thursday after O'Donnell accused him of lying about profits he made making "The Apprentice," his former NBC show.
The real estate mogul cemented his 2016 presidential bid Wednesday by filing his personal financial disclosure paperwork with the government.

He told the Federal Election Commission that he made more than $200 million for 14 seasons of work on his popular reality television series.

O'Donnell challenged that amount on Thursday, arguing that other shows were more profitable than Trump's.

"It's a lie, Joe, a complete and total lie," O'Donnell told host Joe Scarborough on MSNBC that morning."Let me explain something to you, Donald Trump didn't even make a million dollars in his first year."

"Trump has been one of the lowest-paid people to have an hour-long show," he added.

Trump then bet O'Donnell a year of the MSNBC host's salary over his comments, but O'Donnell expressed remorse during Thursday evening's broadcast of "The Last Word" for doubting Trump's sincerity about his earnings.

"I don't want the prize for the guy who uses the meanest words in the debate," O'Donnell said that night.

"So no, Donald, there won't be any bet because I would never bet about anything," O'Donnell added. "And I might be wrong."

"He is wrong. He is wrong," Trump insisted Friday. "I mean, these are certified numbers."

"OK, I will not issue a challenge," Trump told Scarborough and Mika Brzezinski on "Morning Joe" after hearing O'Donnell had apologized. "Let's get on to more important things."

Donald Trump making biggest splash on Facebook in Iowa // The Hill // David McCabe – July 17, 2015

Donald Trump is dominating Facebook in Iowa, as many presidential candidates travel to the first-in-the-nation caucus state.

He generated more interactions — which the company defines as shares, likes, comments and posts — than any other candidate in the field in the last week.

From Friday, July 10 until Thursday, July 16, 66,000 people generated 206,000 interactions about Trump. He was followed by former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton (D), who generated 86,000 interactions from 31,000 people.
Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) rounded out the top three, with 17,000 people generating 57,000 interactions.

Of the candidates who generated measurable data, businesswoman Carly Fiorina (R) and New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie (R) made the smallest impact during the time period examined by Facebook. Both got only 3,000 interactions from 2,000 individuals.

The numbers may indicate who is attracting the public's attention as the presidential race heats up. But they do not show whether users are saying positive or negative things about the candidates.

Fifteen presidential candidates will be in Iowa this weekend, according to The Des Moines Register, thanks to two major events that gather the contenders together.

Facebook has become a highly valued tool of campaigns in recent years. In 2012, President Obama's reelection team accessed the Facebook profiles of supporters — with their permission — to allow them to target their friends who might also be supportive of the candidate.

Fox News Poll: Reshuffling of GOP field, many agree with Trump on immigration // Fox News // Dana Blanton – July 17, 2015

The latest Fox News national poll finds another reshuffling in the race for the 2016 Republican nomination, as Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker gets a post-announcement bump and businessman Donald Trump claims more of the spotlight.

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton still dominates the Democratic race. Yet the poll also warns trouble may be ahead for her.

Among Republican primary voters, Trump captures 18 percent. He's closely followed by Walker at 15 percent and former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush at 14 percent. No one else reaches double-digits.

Support for Trump is up seven percentage points since last month and up 14 points since May. He's also the candidate GOP primary voters say they are most interested in learning more about during the debates.

Walker's up six points since he officially kicked off his campaign. That bump gets him back to the support he was receiving earlier this year. In March, he was also at 15 percent.

Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul gets eight percent, Florida Sen. Marco Rubio receives seven percent, former neurosurgeon Ben Carson comes in at six percent, and Texas Sen. Ted Cruz and former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee get four percent a piece.

New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie launched his campaign June 30. Even so, he comes in at three percent -- mostly unchanged from his two percent last month (June 21-23). Ohio Gov. John Kasich (who is announcing Tuesday) and former Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum each get two percent. Businesswoman Carly Fiorina, former Texas Gov. Rick Perry, South Carolina Sen. Lindsey Graham, Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal and former New York Gov. George Pataki each receive one percent or less.

On the Democratic side, Clinton captures 59 percent among Democratic primary voters compared to 19 percent for Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders. Last month, 61 percent backed Clinton and 15 percent Sanders (June 21-23). Eight percent would like to see Vice President Joe Biden as the nominee (he's undeclared). Former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, former Rhode Island Gov. Lincoln Chafee and former Virginia Sen. Jim Webb each get one percent.

But here's the possible trouble for Clinton in the general election: 70 percent of voters overall say that a candidate who is sometimes less than honest is a "deal breaker" for their vote -- and a 58-percent majority believes Clinton's natural instincts lean more toward "hiding the truth" than "telling the truth" (33 percent). Democratic primary voters are more likely to think her natural instincts lean toward telling the truth (61 percent) -- but even here, 29 percent say Clinton is more prone to hide the truth.

The Fox poll also asks voters their second choice candidate, which allows us to look at what happens to the lineup if someone were to drop out. For example, if Trump decides to get out, Bush moves to the top spot at 19 percent, followed by Walker at 16 percent, Paul at 9 percent, Rubio at 8 percent, Carson at 7 percent, Cruz at 6 percent, Huckabee at 5 percent, Christie and Perry at 3 percent, and Fiorina, Kasich and Santorum get 2 percent.

Trump's June 16 announcement speech included provocative comments on illegal immigration that people are still talking about a month later, including the suggestion that the Mexican government is sending criminals and rapists to the United States. Whatever the blowback, his views resonate with many: 44 percent of voters think Trump is "basically right" on the issue. A 53-percent majority disagrees. Among Republican primary voters, 68 percent say he is right.

Immigration

There's been a major shift in the last five years in how voters want to handle illegal immigrants currently working in the United States. Today 64 percent favor setting up a system for them to become legal residents, up from 49 percent in 2010. And now 30 percent favor deportation, down from 45 percent five years ago.

Compared to 2010, support for setting up a system for legalization is up 21 points among Democrats, 11 points among independents and 8 points among Republicans.

The top concerns about illegal immigration are strain on the government and, increasingly, crime. The poll shows 55 percent of voters are very concerned about illegal immigrants overburdening government services. That's down from 61 percent who felt that way in 2006.

Fifty percent are very concerned about increased crime associated with illegal immigration. That's up from 39 percent almost 10 years ago. Views are about the same when voters are asked about illegal immigration leading to an increase in terrorism: 50 percent are very concerned, up from 34 percent in 2006.

People also see significant benefits to the country from legal immigration: 43 percent say adding needed skills is a major benefit and another 43 percent feel that way about immigration adding to the entrepreneurial spirit of the U.S. About a third thinks a major upside is that legal immigrants perform jobs that Americans mostly don't want (35 percent) and bring new cultures (34 percent).

Pollpourri

Voters are divided over whether Congress should continue to investigate then-Secretary of State Clinton's handling of the attack on the U.S. consulate in Benghazi that killed four Americans. Nearly half -- 47 percent -- want lawmakers to keep investigating Clinton. A slightly larger number -- 49 percent -- think it's time for Congress to move on.

Most Republicans (74 percent) say continue investigating, while most Democrats (74 percent) say move on. Views among independents split: 47 percent investigate vs. 48 percent move on.

After being on the campaign trail for about a month, how do voters feel about the Donald? Fifty-four percent dismiss him as "just a loud mouth." Yet just over a third -- 34 percent -- admire Trump because "he's got guts." That jumps to 59 percent among GOP primary voters.

By a 15-point margin, Republican primary voters (82 percent) are more likely to say they are extremely or very interested in the upcoming election than Democratic primary voters (67 percent).

The Fox News poll is based on landline and cell phone interviews with 1,019 randomly chosen registered voters nationwide and was conducted under the joint direction of Anderson Robbins Research (D) and Shaw & Company Research (R) from July 13-15, 2015. The full poll has a margin of sampling error of plus or minus three percentage points. The margin of error is higher among the subgroups of Democratic (+/-5%) and Republican primary voters (+/-4.5%).

Donald Trump has rocketed to the top of another new poll // Business Insider // Brett Logiurato – July 17, 2015

Real-estate magnate Donald Trump is at the top of another new poll of Republican primary voters nationally.

A Fox News poll released Thursday showed the Republican presidential candidate Trump leading a crowded GOP primary field, with 18% of the vote.

Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin, who announced his entry into the race this week, also saw a bump. He came in second behind Trump, with 15% of the vote. Former Gov. Jeb Bush of Florida is third with 14%.

Trump and Walker made the biggest advances in the Fox poll over the past month. In a June poll released just before Trump officially announced his candidacy, he garnered 11% of the vote. Walker last month grabbed 9% of the GOP vote.

Trump has been at the center of a media firestorm since announcing his candidacy last month, when he commented that the Mexican government was sending "rapists" and drug runners to the US. He has since doubled, tripled, and quadrupled down on those comments — and more — even as several businesses and organizations have severed ties with him.

But he has spent much of the past month rocketing up in both national and key early-state polls, and he now finds himself at or near the top of several of them.

"I am incredibly pleased that my message is resonating with people all over the United States," Trump said of the Fox News poll in a statement. "There are so many Americans that are ready to make our country great again, and I am the only one who can make it happen. We will bring back the jobs, bring back the money, and bring back the spirit!"

The Fox News poll also found that 44% of all voters — including 70% of Republicans — said they thought Trump was "basically right" that Mexico was sending "rapists" and other criminals to the US. And 59% of Republicans said they admired Trump, compared with 28% who said he was "just a loudmouth."

The new Fox News poll will most likely be the final one from the network before it hosts the first Republican presidential debate on August 6. The top 10 in an average of five recent national polls will make the debate stage.

Rounding out the top 10 in the GOP primary field:

US Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky — 8%
US Sen. Marco Rubio of Florida — 7%
Retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson — 6%
US Sen. Ted Cruz of Texas — 4%
Former Gov. Mike Huckabee of Arkansas — 4%
Gov. Chris Christie of New Jersey — 3%
Gov. John Kasich of Ohio and former US Sen. Rick Santorum — 2%

The Trump Bump Will Fade // U.S. News & World Report // Jean Card – July 17, 2015

Prediction: By summer's end, Republican presidential candidate and real estate mogul Donald Trump will be back where he belongs – at the bottom of the polls. Bless his heart.

Perhaps more importantly, as the presidential race matures, so will voters' tastes. A firebrand like Trump may seem delicious at first bite. There is a frustration and anger among voters, a desire to speak truth to power, flout the rules and get something done, and Trump has tapped into those emotions.

Indeed, it is always invigorating to hear someone say the things you've been thinking or feeling, maybe just a little, but were too polite or shy to say out loud. It's why comedians make us laugh: They say what many of us have noted or thought, deep down. They allow us to release the thought or observation, air it out and then move on. Perhaps move forward, to a better or more grown-up place. Ahem.

Trump's intolerant words felt empowering to many people these last few weeks. People want to throw a punch – at criminals, at China – but they can't, so they thought that maybe Trump would do it for them.

But the moment is more likely to be looked back on as one that released some pressure, allowing voters and commentators to move on to a more productive dialogue or debate. Because here's the thing: In the real world, people don't actually follow the guy who throws the punch. We don't think the guy who escalates the bar fight is a leader. We prefer the guy or gal who has the maturity and strength to step in and stop the bar fight. We want to follow and support the person who convinces the brawlers to cool off.

It's also worth reminding, for some perspective on the Trump Bump, that this isn't the first time something like this has happened. Many is the presidential season that has featured an inflammatory, outlier candidate or two. They burn hot for moment, then fade away. Remember Gene McCarthy. George Wallace. Pat Buchanan. Jesse Jackson. Howard Dean. Now add Donald Trump to that list.

Each candidate offered at least one thing that made voters stand up and say "Yeah!" for a moment. And it felt good. But it didn't last for any of those guys, and it won't last for Trump.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It is now the challenge of the other Republican candidates to learn from the Trump phenomenon. What does his moment of popularity say about what Republican voters might want from a candidate? The great fear, stirred up by some in the media, is that it means Republican voters might want an intolerant firebrand. But I don't think that's right. I think Republicans are interested in someone who doesn't play by the establishment's rules, and there are plenty of ways to do so that aren't offensive. They may also be interested in someone who speaks candidly, not in talking-point-ese, and to that, I simply say hallelujah.

Republican voters also likely admire the way Trump shakes off media scrutiny and politically-correct hand-wringing. The man doesn't care that the media thinks he's a bigot, just as he doesn't care that they constantly pick on his ridiculous hairstyle. In these ways, he embodies confidence. And confidence – in moderation – is a leadership trait.

Smart, mature candidates will recognize that Trump hit a nerve, then figure out a way to put that page in their own playbook. Over-eager candidates will try to imitate Trump or disavow him too aggressively. Both tactics are likely to fail or at least fall flat, which could narrow the field. And wouldn't that be interesting?

Donald Trump says a U.S.-Mexico border wall is 'not even a difficult project' // The Week // Sarah Eberspacher – July 17, 2015

Donald Trump says Donald Trump is "considered a great builder, by everybody," and the GOP presidential hopeful does have a few towers to his name. So why not add a comprehensive U.S.-Mexico border wall to the portfolio?

"It's not even a difficult project if you know what you're doing," Trump told The Washington Post in a Thursday interview. "And no one knows what they're doing like I do."

Trump's calls for tighter border security have recently landed him in hot water: During his campaign kickoff speech in June, Trump described Mexican immigrants as "rapists," and said they are responsible for rising drug and crime rates in the United States. But Trump later told NBC News that despite his rhetoric he has a "great relationship with the Mexican people" — which should serve him well in his plan to pay for the proposed border wall.

"[Convincing the Mexican government to pay for the wall] is realistic if you know something about the art of negotiating," Trump told the Post. "If you have a bunch of clowns negotiating, it's not realistic."

While a fence along the U.S.-Mexico border might be more, well, realistic, Trump says a wall is better.

"It's much more powerful," he explained. "It's taller."

Who, exactly, is voting for Donald Trump? // The Week // Becca Stanek – July 17, 2015

Even pollsters are baffled by who, exactly, is supporting Donald Trump. The real estate mogul has risen to the top of GOP polls in recent weeks, earning the support of 17 percent of Republican voters. Thing is, while the rise of Trump supporters is pretty clear, it's hazy where these supporters are from and who they are. "It's a strange coalition of people," Patrick Murray of Monmouth University told Politico. "We can't pin them down demographically. ... It appears he's cherry-picked individual voters."

As Politico puts it, "The Trump coalition looks a lot like the rest of the Republican Party." It might skew more white and more male, but not notably so. A recent Monmouth University poll reveals, if anything, Trump supporters tend to simply be "middle Americans." "They're in the middle of the Republican Party. They're not evangelicals. They're not hardline social or fiscal conservatives. They're also not on the liberal side of the party," Murray explained.

So then, what's driving Trump's appeal? Trump's New Hampshire co-chairman, Steve Stepanek, says it can be broken down into two things: "The issues that are driving the average Trump voter are, first and foremost, that he's not a politician. Secondly, he is self-funding his campaign, so he can't be bought." For people tired of Washington spin, they like that Trump simply says what's on his mind.

Donald Trump: 'John McCain was very disloyal to me,' 'made a big mistake' // Washington Times // David Sherfinski – July 17, 2015

Donald Trump on Friday said Sen. John McCain of Arizona was "very disloyal" to him and predicted Mr. McCain would lose in a GOP primary if the right challenger runs against him.

"Well first of all, let me tell you, I supported John McCain. He let us down because he lost but, you know, it was a hard one after what had happened with the economy," Mr. Trump said via phone on MSNBC's "Morning Joe." "But I supported him, raised a lot of money for him ... and I'm a loyalist. I'm a person that ... if somebody is with me, I'm with that person. And John McCain was very disloyal to me, number one, this is the first time I've spoken to him in a long time."

Mr. McCain, the 2008 GOP presidential nominee, spoke about Mr. Trump's recent rally in Arizona in a interview published in The New Yorker this week.

"This performance with our friend out in Phoenix is very hurtful to me," Mr. McCain said. "Because what he did was he fired up the crazies."

Mr. Trump, who is leading the 2016 GOP presidential field in two recent polls, said he had 15,000 people come to the recent rally in Arizona and said that "they weren't crazies — they were great Americans."

Local reports pegged the crowd actually inside at the Phoenix Convention Center at several thousand, but Mr. Trumptweeted July 12: "Convention Center officials in Phoenix don't want to admit that they broke the fire code by allowing 12-15,000 people in 4,000 code room."

"I know crazies, believe me — these were great Americans,"
Mr. Trump said Friday. "And they wanted to know about illegal immigration. It's killing them. Illegal immigration is really hurting these people, especially when you're talking about Arizona and Phoenix, and we had an amazing group of people, and when he called them crazies, I think he will lose in the primary."

"If the right person runs against him, they'll win. ... He's not very popular there, anyway," Mr. Trump continued.

GOP State Sen. Kelli Ward announced earlier this week she is challenging Mr. McCain, who handily defeated former U.S. Rep. J.D. Hayworth in a 2010 primary.

A McCain spokesman said in response to Ms. Ward's announcement that "Arizonans know that John McCain will never stop fighting for Arizona and America, as he has his entire adult life, both in uniform and in Congress."

"Senator McCain looks forward to this campaign, and to discussing his strong record of protecting America's national security, standing up for veterans, and growing Arizona's economy," spokesman Brian Rogers said.

Mr. Trump also went after Mr. McCain's academic record at the U.S. Naval Academy, tweeting on Thursday: "@SenJohnMcCain should be defeated in the primaries. Graduated last in his class at Annapolis — dummy!"

"We ended up with 15,000 people and they were great Americans, they were great people, and John McCain calls them crazies. I think it's inappropriate," Mr. Trump said.

"So, of course, I brought up a point that very few people know that he was just about or last [in his class] at Annapolis, and why not? He was very nasty to me," Mr. Trump said.

Mr. Trump has also traded barbs recently with fellow presidential contenders former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, Sen. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina and former Texas Gov. Rick Perry.

"My attitude is this: if a person is nice to me, I will go out of my way to be nice to that person," he said, pointing to Sen. Ted Cruz of Texas, one of his rivals in the presidential race who has backed him up on the issue of illegal immigration, as an example.

"Ted Cruz came out totally and strongly in favor of me. I don't forget things like that. I think it was very nice," Mr. Trump said.

"John McCain made a big mistake," he said. "I think John McCain will lose in the primary if somebody good runs against him."

Inside the Mind of a Trump Donor: 'I Was Probably Drunk' // The Daily Beast // Olivia Nuzzi – July 17, 2015

You learn a few things, calling the 63 individuals who donated more than $250 to Donald Trump's presidential campaign—helping him pull in a total of $96,000 in the 29 days since his June 16 announcement, according to the financial disclosure he released Wednesday evening.

You learn, for instance, that President Obama, who is an African-born Muslim, wouldn't help you if you were kidnapped in Iran, that not all undocumented Mexican immigrants are rapists but many of them may be, that it's unfair to expect billionaires to use their own money to run for office when less wealthy candidates aren't expected to, and that the willingness to file for bankruptcy multiple times is a sign of a great businessman. But what you learn, most of all, is that the characters propelling America's greatest political curiosity upward in the polls are a lot like the man himself.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The day started with Francine Aton, 62, Michigan, retired.

“You work for The Daily Beast—which is a more left-wing web-magazine,” she began. “I don’t want something to come out that’s slanted.”

Aton, who said she has a degree in journalism, has little patience for reporters and detects liberal bias in the most innocuous of statements.

Asked why she supports Trump (to the tune of $250), she said, “Because he speaks the truth, he’s honest, and he can’t be bought.” So she likes him, I said, because he’s wealthy and that means—“Listen to how you just slanted that question!” she cut me off. “Is Hillary wealthy? Yes, she is!” Well, what I meant was—“Just say what you mean! You’re slanting your story.”

I explained that all I was trying to do was figure out why she supports Trump. “Why do you support him?” she asked. Uh, I don’t, I said. “Donald speaks the truth. Thank you, goodbye.”

She hung up.

Next was Timothy Doody, 51, Colorado, real estate appraiser.

“I don’t know,” he said when I asked why he donated $500 to Trump. “I don’t know why I do half the things I do. I was probably drunk.”

He laughed. “I’m just kidding. I just think it’s refreshing…I just wanted to make a statement, that’s all.”

Doody explained that he’s a “conservative-leaning person” but a registered Democrat. Mostly, he sighed, “I just am fed up with politicians. I do know [Trump’s] negatives and I do know what he’s done as far as supporting Democrats via his corporations and supporting both parties.” But at the end of the day, Doody said, he liked that Trump could “rabble-rouse” and “make waves.”

Trump’s position on immigration, Doody admitted, was the central reason he made the donation, but he also believes Trump is the best person to repair the economy and to change the course of American foreign policy for the better.

And speaking of immigration, “The other candidates totally took his words out of context,” Doody said, referring to Trump’s claim that undocumented immigrants coming into America from Mexico are “rapists.” Doody said he listened to Trump’s statement “probably 10 times” to see if he had missed it, but in the end came to the conclusion that “he didn’t call all Mexicans rapists.”

In Trump’s absence, Doody guessed he could find another candidate to support. “Probably Ted Cruz, Governor Walker, maybe, and Rand Paul…I don’t understand Jeb Bush.”

Then came Damien Drab, 41, New York City, CEO of Loughlin Management, a company that “delivers a broad range of operational and financial consulting services with a results-oriented approach,” as opposed to all those consulting firms who strive for no results at all.

I told Drab I wanted to talk about his $500 donation to the Trump campaign. He laughed. “Good, I hope that helps with my golf club membership.”

Is he a member of a Trump golf club? “Uh, I can’t comment on anything, really,” he said. “I have one statement and that’s: Why should anyone use their personal money for public affairs?”

Further, Drab went on, it is “unfair” and “ignorant” to tell Trump he needs to use his personal wealth for his race when “everybody else who runs gets contributions.” Because “there’s no inherent personal wealth risk for people who run,” Drab said, there shouldn’t be one for a billionaire, either. Whether he needs the money is irrelevant, Drab argued, because “if you believe in Trump, you should contribute.”

Next was Mike McNerney, 73, California, funeral service provider.

“He’s the greatest thing running,” McNerney said when I asked about his $500 donation to Trump, which he called “just a show of support.”

“I think he’s gonna win,” he told me. “I think he has a pretty good chance. I mean, people are outraged at the way Obama Hussein has run this country.”

McNerney said he likes Trump “because he’s nonpolitical. He tells it like it is. He’s truthful, and he has more experience than being a short-term senator before he became president." What kind of experience does Trump have, I asked. "At life and management, and I'm sure he has more foreign experience, which Obama Hussein has ruined."

McNerney agrees with Trump on immigration "absolutely, 1,000 percent," and believes those expressing disapproval of his statements are "manipulating the press for the benefit of opposition against any sensible immigration policy that comes along."

I asked McNerney, who repeatedly referred to the president as "Obama Hussein," if he thought Obama was Muslim. He said, "I know he is." I asked if he thought Obama was born in America. He replied, "No, I don't. Probably Africa." Where in Africa, I wondered. "Wherever his father and his white mother were living." Kenya? "You got it," he said.

And Dr. Dane Wallisch, 64, Pennsylvania, radiologist.

"Why did I do it?" Wallisch said when I asked about his $2,700 check to Trump's campaign. "I think he would be a very strong leader, and I think that's what we need now. I have very similar beliefs to Donald Trump. I agree with him on just about everything."

Wallisch agreed with Doody that "the immigration thing, I think, the media took that way out of context."

He explained that having lived in Mexico for a time, he knows that the government there is corrupt. "Of course there's good Mexican people, but there's bad with the good," he said. And the unsecured border, he told me, is "an open door for terrorists, as well."

"Trump just speaks what's on his mind and I like that," he said. "I think it's refreshing. It's time people say what they felt rather than just what people want to hear." Wallisch apologized for "getting on my soapbox here," but admitted it was hard to avoid when talking about Trump. "I like him and I hope he becomes president."

Why donate to a billionaire, though, I wondered. It's not like he needs it. "True, probably true," Wallisch said. "But that was my way of saying, 'I support you.'"

Without Trump, Wallisch said he was sure he could find another candidate to support. "I think there's a lot of good people running this year. I like Ben Carson—you know who Ben Carson is, right? I like Rand Paul, but he won't make it. Scott Walker. Bush is all right, but three Bushes? I don't know. Makes me a little leery."

Donald Trump Campaign Headquarters Illustrates Complicated Campaign Finance Rules // IB Times // Ginger Gibson – July 17, 2015

WASHINGTON -- There is really only one place that anyone could imagine Donald Trump would headquarter his campaign: the Trump Tower on Fifth Avenue in New York City. The 68-floor skyscraper bears his name in bold letters. It's the set of his reality television show. It's where he rode the escalator to deliver his announcement speech. And it's one of the most iconic -- or at least most emphatically branded -- buildings in the city.

But having Trump's small campaign staff working out of his building isn't all that simple. Federal campaign finance laws don't allow a candidate to use office space without paying rent, even if they own the company that owns the building. It's clear that Trump's campaign and company are closely intertwined. The phone number to contact Trump's campaign is the same number that has appeared on several of his real estate company's press releases.

"It's unusual in the sense in that you have a candidate who owns this much property, but the law does deal with the issue of a candidate owning a building and renting themselves office space," said Lawrence Noble, a former FEC general counsel who is now senior counsel at the nonpartisan Campaign Legal Center. "The scope of this may be unusual."

The Trump campaign says they're following all the rules. "We pay fair market value for our office space," campaign manager Corey Lewandowski told International Business Times.

That would appear to create an unusual circle of payments.

So far, Trump's campaign has largely been dependent on his own money. According to his FEC filings, Trump has loaned his campaign $1.8 million. There is no limit on how much a candidate can donate or lend to his own campaign. His campaign, in turn, is making monthly payments to Trump Tower Commercial for an expense marked "rent" at a rate of $9,583.33 a month. Trump's company is a privately held operation, so after expenses and taxes, presumably some of that rent goes back to Trump in the form of profits.

But if Trump's campaign weren't paying rent to his company, he would be in violation of the rule. Simply allowing the campaign to use the office space free of charge would be considered an in-kind contribution and violate prohibitions on corporate donations.

(If Trump -- or any candidate -- used his own home for his campaign headquarters, he wouldn't need to pay himself rent: That would be considered a personal in-kind donation and subject to no limits under campaign finance laws.)

“If a campaign uses the facilities of a corporation or labor organization, the campaign must reimburse the organization within a commercially reasonable time and at the usual and normal rental charge,” FEC spokeswoman Judith Ingram explained. “Use of facilities may include, for example, the use of telephones, typewriters or office furniture. It is also advisable that payment be made to the corporation or organization in advance in order to avoid a prohibited contribution from the organization.”

Trump's surge to the front of the polls has likely brought campaign donations into his coffers. He could eventually pay rent to his own company with donor money.

That's not unheard of. Congressional candidates frequently rent space that their businesses own to their campaigns, said Noble. Candidates must simply pay the market rate for the space. If the campaign pays too little, then use of the space can be considered an in-kind donation. If the campaign pays too much, the candidate could be accused of using donor money for personal gain.

The going rate for commercial real estate in Trump Tower is between $75 and $100 a square foot, according to Michael Cohen of the real estate company Colliers International. Those rates can vary according to a number of factors, including condition, views, floor level and length of the lease. Trump's campaign HQ staff consists of only a couple of people so the space involved may be relatively small.

Other candidates also have to deal with real estate issues and FEC compliance, of course. Hillary Clinton's campaign is renting office space in Brooklyn, opting not to add any additions to the shabby interior to keep costs down. Jeb Bush's campaign headquarters is in Miami. With a much larger staff than Trump, his campaign has made one rent payment for $77,739.76. The campaign also made a $145,308 deposit for his rent.

But Trump is one of the few presidential candidates to still be actively running a corporation. Mitt Romney had left business by the time he ran for president. The last active business leader to run for president was Ross Perot, who ran in 1992 and 1996 -- before the 2002 McCain-Feingold law placed stricter limits on “soft money” in campaigns.

Donald Trump Tops Third GOP Poll This Month // Slate // Josh Voorhees – July 17, 2015

Another national poll, another pole position for Donald Trump. The once-and-future reality television star is in first place in a new Fox News survey that was released Friday. With the support of 17 percent of Republican primary voters, Trump led Scott Walker by 3 points and Jeb Bush by 4 in the survey. The poll's margin of error, though, was plus or minus 4.5 points, so the GOP establishment can take some solace in the fact that all three men are in a statistical tie for the top spot. The full results:

1.) Donald Trump, 18 percent

2.) Scott Walker, 15 percent

3.) Jeb Bush, 14 percent

4.) Rand Paul, 8 percent

5.) Marco Rubio, 7 percent

6.) Ben Carson, 6 percent

7t.) Ted Cruz, 4 percent

7t.) Mike Huckabee, 4 percent

9.) Chris Christie, 3 percent

10t.) John Kasich, 2 percent

10t.) Rick Santorum, 2 percent

12.) Rick Perry, 1 percent

Lindsey Graham, Bobby Jindal, and George Pataki were all shut out.

Trump's up 7points from where he was in the same poll taken three weeks earlier (in which he was second to Bush). His strong showing in the survey comes on the heels of a USA Today/Suffolk University poll released earlier this week that had him in first place with 17 percent support to Bush's 14 percent, and a YouGov/ Economist poll released last week that had him with a 4-point lead, 15 percent to 11 percent, on both Bush and Rand Paul. Trump's lead in both polls was also within the surveys' respective margins of error.

In the current RealClearPolitics polling average (which does not include the YouGov survey), Trump sits in second place with 15 percent, a half-point behind Bush and 6 full points ahead of Walker. In the Huffington Post's rolling average, meanwhile, Trump sits in first place with 17.4 percent, 3.1 points ahead of Bush and 9.4 points ahead of Walker.

Outside of Internet comment sections, no one thinks The Donald's lead will last. But when combined with his required (although not necessarily expected) release of his FEC financial disclosure this week, it does mean he is now pretty much a lock to make it onstage at the first GOP presidential debate, which will be hosted by Fox News in Cleveland on Aug. 6.

The Case for Covering Trump // Slate // Josh Voorhees – July 17, 2015

First things first: Donald Trump is a vitriol-spewing, media-manipulating, self-aggrandizing, bigoted publicity hound who has no realistic chance of winning the Republican nomination next summer or any other. While a growing number of national polls currently have the once-and-future reality television star atop a historically crowded GOP field, Trump's candidacy is destined to fade away just as countless other novelty candidates have in primaries past.

None of that, however, is any reason for the media not to seriously cover Trump's campaign today. The Donald may be a Twitter troll in a $5,000 Brioni suit, but he's also the avatar of choice for a significant subset of the American electorate who sees themselves in his particular brand of belligerence. That view and those voters won't disappear when Trump does. The press ignores that fact at its own peril—and at the public's own loss.

Advertisement
On Friday, the Huffington Post announced that from this point forth it will relegate its coverage of all things Trump to its entertainment section. "Our reason is simple: Trump's campaign is a sideshow. We won't take the bait," editorial director Danny Shea and Washington bureau chief Ryan Grim wrote in a note to readers of one of the largest news outlets in the nation. "If you are interested in what The Donald has to say, you'll find it next to our stories on the Kardashians and The Bachelorette."

The Huffington Post so far stands alone in officially declaring itself above Trump as a news story, but it's clear there are plenty of working journalists who would be happy if their bosses made a similar decision. Politico's Ben White, to pick but one example, made his feelings known Thursday. "Trump's time in the lead will fade as the debates begin and the Republican Party starts to get serious," White argued. "And then all this coverage of the big-mouth billionaire will be exposed as largely ridiculous." (As someone who is paid to write about the campaign every day, I've been guilty of my own type of Trump dismissal; I began much of my early coverage of Trump's campaign with the word Ugh, a knowing wink meant to make it clear that I, too, would prefer to be writing about more traditional candidates.)

Such arguments against spilling digital ink on Trump are built on the idea that he can't win the nomination. That premise is correct, but the conclusion that follows—The media shouldn't waste its resources covering him—is false. For evidence, we have to look no further than those very same candidates that Trump dismissers rightly point to as proof that his time leading the GOP field will be short lived: Herman Cain and Sarah Palin.

Both Cain and Palin spent time at or near the top of national polls four years ago but flamed out soon after. Does the fact that the pair ended up with zero primary or caucus victories between them mean the media should have ignored them from the get-go? Hardly. Their rise was an important story line in the 2012 election. They provided clear evidence of conservative skepticism of Mitt Romney, while also reminding the GOP establishment that primary voters crave simplicity in message. For Cain, reforming the U.S. tax code was as simple as "9-9-9"; for Palin, addressing the nation's energy needs was as simple as "Drill, baby, drill." Four years later, Trump has surged past the establishment favorites by adding his own simplistic policy plank to the conservative platform: the promise of solving our immigration problems by building a fence along the Mexican border that we won't even have to pay for.

Cain, meanwhile, is a particularly helpful example of why these flash-in-the-pan candidates require immediate coverage. It was the increased scrutiny that the press provided that ultimately spelled his downfall. (The same could be said for Palin's disastrous vice presidential run in 2008.) Without that all-in coverage, voters would have never known that Cain was unable to answer basic foreign policy questions or that he faced a series of troubling sexual harassment allegations. It was only by treating the former Godfather's Pizza CEO as a legitimate candidate that the press was able to prove that he wasn't one.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Similar vetting of Trump has yet to erode his support, but without it his faulty and xenophobic claims about immigrants would have gone unrefuted, and his hypocritical business dealings would have remained unrevealed. Yes, the deluge of free press is responsible for some of Trump's rise, but in the long run it will also be what is responsible for his demise. Meanwhile, intentionally ignoring Trump—who had the support to qualify for the Fox News debate even before the current media storm—would risk having the opposite of the intended effect: A lack of serious scrutiny from the mainstream media wouldn't cut short Trump's ongoing infomercial—it would prolong it.

If the media took as its mission the task of only covering candidates who have a realistic shot at winning their party's nomination, then countless more legitimate candidates would also need to be ignored as well. Sorry, Ted Cruz. See you later, John Kasich. This if-they-can't-win-we're-not-covering-them logic doesn't seem to have been applied to conservative candidates in the past either and for good reason. Ron Paul was never going to win the GOP nomination in 2008, yet his campaign was one of the first clear signs of the emerging strength of the libertarian wing of his party.

Likewise, a similar dynamic is playing out this year on the opposite end of the spectrum: first with Elizabeth Warren and now with Bernie Sanders. The former was adamant she was never going to run for the Democratic nomination, and the latter has almost no shot of defeating Hillary Clinton in the primary. Yet what they do and say on the stump clearly matters for the future of the Democratic Party.

The press might not like it, but Trump, too, is already shaping the 2016 election. He's now a lock to crash the first Republican presidential debate, where he'll force establishment favorites like Jeb Bush and Marco Rubio outside of their comfort zones on immigration. Both men can still play the grown-up card, but how they choose to interact with Trump will help decide whether they ultimately win over the immigration hardliners in their own party and if they're even willing to try.

Trump's current surge also raises interesting questions about what it is the GOP base wants the face of its party to look like; his popular retrograde rhetoric is a counterpoint to the argument that voters want Republicans to rediscover their compassionate sides. And in the longer term, his rise embodies the larger challenge facing the Republican Party: Will it evolve in the face of inescapable demographic trends? Or will it continue to ignore them? It stands to reason that those questions are ones that campaign journalists would be interested in.

None of that is to say all Trump coverage is good Trump coverage. When TV reporter after TV reporter after TV reporter asks Trump whether he wants to apologize for branding Mexican immigrants as rapists and murderers, they're not hoping he backs down, and they aren't setting him up for a fact-based challenge either. They're simply hoping he says something even more jaw-dropping, handing them a viral video clip in the process. Of course the media fails when it goes chasing clicks only for the sake of clicks. But we can't fix a series of smaller journalistic errors by committing a larger one.

WALKER

Republican Doublethink on Mass Shootings: Scott Walker Edition // NYT // Andrew Rosenthal – July 17, 2015

Governor Scott Walker of Wisconsin, who recently joined the Republican primary carnival in an "official" way, says the government should reauthorize the Patriot Act in response to the murder of four Marines in Chattanooga, Tenn., by a 24-year-old gunman.

And he suggested that changing a policy that stops military personnel from carrying weapons in certain civilian areas would have prevented the attack. Those policies "are outdated," Mr. Walker said on Fox News, because the United States is "at war and radical Islamic terrorism is our enemy."

After a career criminal who had illegally entered the United States killed a San Francisco woman on July 1, Bill O'Reilly demanded that Congress pass a law that would impose mandatory sentences on people who repeatedly enter the country illegally and members of the right-wing Republican caucus in the House eagerly responded.

The idea was that such a law, along with another proposal to strip cities of federal funds if their police are not required to turn over all undocumented people to the federal government, would prevent shootings like the one in San Francisco.

This leaves me a little confused.

After any highly publicized killing – like the murders in Charleston, or Newtown, or in any number of other places — advocates of gun control call for greater restrictions on the sale and use of firearms. And people on the right, like Mr. O'Reilly and Mr. Walker, reliably respond by saying that no law could have prevented those killings.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

So, which is it? Can no law stop a determined person from killing another human being? Or can laws do that? It would be inconsistent, if not hypocritical, to take both positions, so there must be some logical explanation.

Mr. Walker and the Fox host Megyn Kelly tut-tutted about the fact that President Obama did not immediately call the Chattanooga killer a Muslim terrorist. They had no idea at the time whether that was true, but the point of the exchange was to attack Mr. Obama. They used it to revive another favorite talking point – that the president did not quickly label the attack on the American diplomatic compound in Benghazi as a terrorist attack (even though he actually did).

Oddly enough – or maybe not oddly at all – Mr. Walker called the murder of nine African Americans in a Charleston church a "racist" and "evil" act, but neither he, nor any other Republican candidate or public figure that I can find called it an act of terrorism, which is precisely what it was.

Senator Lindsey Graham, another Republican presidential poser, called it "racial jihadism," but that was mainly to deflect attention from the real motivations for the murders and toss that "jihad" word out there.

I'm sure there is a logical explanation for that, too.

One Subject Scott Walker Won't Talk About: Donald Trump // WSJ // Reid J. Epstein – July 17, 2015

DAVENPORT, Iowa – A lot of people are talking about Donald Trump, but Scott Walker is determined not to be one of them.

The Wisconsin governor, kicking off a three-day tour of Iowa, continued to parry questions about the billionaire New York developer's strident anti-illegal immigration rhetoric, which has propelled Mr. Trump to the top of the 2016 Republican presidential polls. While attention-starved lower-tier candidates like Rick Perry and Lindsey Graham – along with former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, who is making a concerted appeal to Hispanic voters — have condemned Mr. Trump's remarks, Mr. Walker affirmed Friday that he won't take the bait.

"What I've said is that Donald Trump can speak for himself," Mr. Walker told reporters after addressing supporters at a minor league ballpark here. "I'm going to answer questions about my positions, not about Donald Trump's or Jeb Bush's or Marco Rubio or anybody else out there."

Plenty of others are speaking about Mr. Trump. Facebook data released Friday showed twice as many Iowans discussing Mr. Trump on the social network than any other 2016 presidential candidate. Nearly five times as many Iowans are talking about Mr. Trump on Facebook than Mr. Walker.

Mr. Walker made it clear he would not share his thoughts about Mr. Trump's rise.

"If you want to ask me again, I'll give you the same answer 50 more times," Mr. Walker said. "So if you want to waste your time on that question, go ahead."

Earlier, during a brief interview at the nearby Quad City International Airport across the Mississippi River in Moline, Ill., he expressed surprise at recent polls.

"Who would have thought this week's polls would be where they're at a couple months ago," Mr. Walker said. "A lot of things are going to be surprising throughout the next year. Our key is we just want to get our message out. If we do that we'll be in the thick of it no matter who else is in it."

Washington (CNN)Republican voters' support for real estate mogul Donald Trump continues to grow, according to a new national poll out Friday.

Trump led the pack of 16 major-name Republican candidates with 18 percent of likely Republican primary voters saying they would vote for the blustery billionaire and former reality TV star, up from 11% who supported him in a June survey. The Fox News poll, conducted earlier this week, also saw Wisconsin Gov. Scot Walker jump to second place in the field, following his formal announcement this past Monday, with support from 15 percent of likely voters.

Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush maintained a steady following, holding 14 percent of support from voters. While the rest of the candidates polled in the single-digits, 9 percent of voters said they were still undecided and 4 percent chose none of the above.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Aside from simple jockeying, polling has a more immediate function in this contest: it will decide which 10 candidates make it on stage for the first Republican debate and which seven are shuffled off to a second-tier debate.

Fox News, which will host the first Republican debate next month in Cleveland, has said it will pick the top 10 candidates based on an average of the five most recent national polls. But it has not said precisely which polls will be used.

Trump currently ranks among those who would most likely appear onstage if the debate were held today, and the poll finds he's the candidate Republicans are most likely to want to see on the stage. When asked which of the GOP candidates they are most interested in learning about during the debates, 18% chose trump, 12% Walker, 11% Bush and 8% Marco Rubio.

Among the field, Trump has been the most willing to blast fellow Republicans, most vociferously Bush -- jabbing repeatedly, with assertions like Bush "couldn't negotiate his way out of a paper bag."

In the Democratic primary, the Fox poll found Hillary Clinton continues to hold a comfortable lead over liberal insurgent Bernie Sanders. Among likely voters in the Democratic primary, 59 percent picked Clinton and 19 percent backed Sanders. Other Democratic contenders, including former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, former Rhode Island Gov. Lincoln Chafee and former Sen. Jim Webb, are still struggling to find any traction in the field.

The poll came from cell phone and landline telephone interviews with 389 likely Republican voters July 13-15. On the Democratic side, Fox News spoke to 382 likely Democratic primary voters.

Walker Expectations High as He Tours Iowa This Weekend // Bloomberg // John McCormick – July 17, 2015

Near a mighty river that shares its banks with his neighboring state, Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker launched his first Iowa campaign swing as a declared presidential candidate with a Winnebago and high expectations for his performance there.

No state is more critical to Walker's future than Iowa, where strong early polling has built expectations to the point that anything short of a win in the state's lead-off Feb. 1 caucuses could be viewed as a loss.

Underscoring its importance, the Republican from the other bank of the Mississippi River is spending three days in the state -- triple that of any other he visited during his campaign rollout week. On Sunday, he plans to visit his boyhood community of Plainfield, Iowa, a not-so-subtle reminder to the state's Republicans that he considers himself one of them.

During a speech to about 200 people at a minor league baseball stadium in Mississippi River town of Davenport, Walker showed he's learned some Iowa political slang, while also demonstrating he has more to learn.

"We're going to do the Full Grassley," he said in a nod to his commitment to visit all of the state's counties, something U.S. Senator Chuck Grassley typically does every year.

"We're going to visit all 99 counties in this state between now and the caucus next year," Walker added, using the singular instead of the plural caucuses that locals typically use in describing the individual meetings in more than 1,700 precincts.

Walker also retold an anecdote he first used in mid-May that now provides him a first-class political pander to Iowans. It's about how the Plainfield city hall lacked an Iowa flag when he was growing up in the mid 1970s, prompting him and his brother to raise money for one. Walker's mother kept the original flag and a photo of her boys with it.

"Aren't moms great?" Walker asked the audience.

Walker said his brother, David, plans to join him for part of the Iowa tour. Also along for the ride, as they have been since his Monday announcement in Wisconsin, are his wife, Tonette, and sons, Matt and Alex.

Asked if he has any concerns about expectations being too high for him in Iowa, Walker brought up his experience as a high-school track runner.

"My coach used to say it's a lot easier to win if you're ahead," he said. "In the end, we know there's a lot of time, a lot can happen between now and then. We're just going to stay focused, day by day, week by week, getting our message out."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Walker said he hopes to "at least to be first, second or third" in all the early states.

A Bloomberg Politics/Des Moines Register Iowa Poll in May showed Walker backed by 17 percent of likely Republican caucus participants, well ahead all others in the field.

Beyond Iowa, Walker is also starting to build a plan for a Republican primary that goes past February and the initial contests in Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina. On Wednesday, he visited Georgia, a state that will host a March 1 primary. Plans are also in the works for visits to Tennessee and other states that hold contests on that date.

Scott Walker Inquiry Shows the Danger of Secrecy // Bloomberg // Megan McArdle – July 17, 2015

In 2010, Wisconsin convened a "John Doe" investigation into the misuse of funds in the Milwaukee county executive's office. In the state, a judge can allow prosecutors to carry out a John Doe investigation, requiring secrecy from everyone involved. Stuart Taylor explains: "This 'gag order' provision, almost unique in American law, effectively disables targets or witnesses from publicly defending themselves or responding to damaging leaks." In 2012, this somehow spawned a second John Doe probe of Wisconsin conservative groups, who were accused of illegally coordinating with Governor Scott Walker's campaign, as he tried to hold his office during the recall election.

The Wisconsin Supreme Court has finally ended that investigation, which has been stalled for many long months as its targets sued their way through the courts. The ruling mostly relied on technical legal questions: Was the campaign finance statute upon which prosecutors relied unconstitutionally vague? (Yes.) Did Judge Gregory Peterson, the second judge to supervise this investigation, step outside of his remit when he quashed subpoenas and effectively ended the investigation? (No.) Did the judges and prosecutor act wrongly when they accepted their jobs running this investigation? (Also, no.)

But the summation is brutal. It seems clear that the Wisconsin Supreme Court would like to make a broader ruling targeting the behavior of the prosecutors (which you can read about here), and the court's decision fires a few well-placed shots in that direction:

> It is utterly clear that the special prosecutor has employed theories of law that do not exist in order to investigate citizens who were wholly innocent of any wrongdoing. In other words, the special prosecutor was the instigator of a "perfect storm" of wrongs that was visited upon the innocent Unnamed Movants and those who dared to associate with them. It is fortunate, indeed, for every other citizen of this great State who is interested in the protection of fundamental liberties that the special prosecutor chose as his targets innocent citizens who had both the will and the means to fight the unlimited resources of an unjust prosecution. Further, these brave individuals played a crucial role in presenting this court with an opportunity to re-endorse its commitment to upholding the fundamental right of each and every citizen to engage in lawful political activity and to do so free from the fear of the tyrannical retribution of arbitrary or capricious governmental prosecution. Let one point be clear: our conclusion today ends this unconstitutional John Doe investigation.

I found myself nodding along at every word. This investigation never should have taken place. This would be true if conservatives are correct that the investigation's amoeboid spread and pattern of selective leaks indicate a politically motivated prosecutor doing his best to take down a controversial Republican governor. It would still be true if we are looking at merely one more instance where a special prosecutor roamed out of control, dizzy with a superheroic mandate to hunt down all malefactors wherever they might be found. Either way, the fundamental problem is the same: Government power gone wildly beyond the limits of common sense.

I am not quite libertarian enough to think that there is no place for secret investigations in our legal system. Is the FBI investigating a terrorist cell that is likely to steal softly and silently away into the night if they are notified that their banker is onto them? Will publishing the warrants in open court reveal intelligence "sources and methods" that will degrade our ability to keep track of terrorists? OK, there is probably a case for some sort of secrecy. Are you investigating a cartel that might start shooting witnesses at any moment? I grant you the need for discretion. Do you need a 48-hour gag order so that the very dangerous people you are targeting will not be able to destroy all the evidence of their wrongdoing? Fair enough.

But what possible reason can there be for be for slapping gag orders on people who are accused of ... possibly coordinating their issue ads too closely with a governor's office? And doing so after you have already broken down the doors of their homes with battering rams to collect every scrap of paper or electronics in sight? You can almost hear the prosecutors' logic: "These suspects' dangerous allies must not be allowed to find out about the case, lest they smite our great citizenry with white papers and YouTube videos and strongly worded billboards!"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

If prosecutors truly thought the investigation needed to be secret, they would have kept it secret -- not allowed news of it to leak out. Conveniently in time for Democrats to use it in their campaign materials. This is one of the dangers of making investigations like this secret: Individuals who know of the case have the power to hurt the targets by leaking, but the targets have no ability to publicly defend themselves. That gives prosecutors a perverse power, even when they have weak evidence and a weak case, to elicit guilty pleas from innocent suspects or otherwise do them harm.

But that's far from the only problem. As I've written before, when it comes to criminal justice investigations, the process itself is a punishment. That's why the process needs to be carefully scrutinized. Judicial supervision is not sufficient, except possibly in some of those moments I mentioned above. In almost every case, the public also has to have eyes on the whole thing. Otherwise, investigations all too easily degenerate into"general warrants," the legal instrument allowing officials to search anywhere, for anything -- and quite properly forbidden by the Fourth Amendment because no one wants to be at the mercy of the unchecked whims of government investigators.

The real problem, in other words, is not the investigation, but the law. And the judge who permitted this use of the law. I come very close to thinking special prosecutors and similar roles should simply be abandoned, given how frequently those appointed seem to get distracted from the crimes they were asked to investigate. (Remember the Clintons? How exactly did an investigation into Whitewater lead to Bill Clinton lying under oath about his sexual relations with White House interns?) But if we do not abandon the whole "special prosecutor" approach, we should be clear when they are appointed: Secrecy is an option only when it's clear lives are at stake.

There are worse things than campaign finance violations. One of them is living in a nation where law-abiding citizens don't know if they're safe from ambitious prosecutors -- especially prosecutors who can silence their targets at will.

Washington (CNN)Republican voters' support for real estate mogul Donald Trump continues to grow, according to a new national poll out Friday.

Trump led the pack of 16 major-name Republican candidates with 18 percent of likely Republican primary voters saying they would vote for the blustery billionaire and former reality TV star, up from 11% who supported him in a June survey. The Fox News poll, conducted earlier this week, also saw Wisconsin Gov. Scot Walker jump to second place in the field, following his formal announcement this past Monday, with support from 15 percent of likely voters.

Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush maintained a steady following, holding 14 percent of support from voters. While the rest of the candidates polled in the single-digits, 9 percent of voters said they were still undecided and 4 percent chose none of the above.

Aside from simple jockeying, polling has a more immediate function in this contest: it will decide which 10 candidates make it on stage for the first Republican debate and which seven are shuffled off to a second-tier debate.

Fox News, which will host the first Republican debate next month in Cleveland, has said it will pick the top 10 candidates based on an average of the five most recent national polls. But it has not said precisely which polls will be used.

Trump currently ranks among those who would most likely appear onstage if the debate were held today, and the poll finds he's the candidate Republicans are most likely to want to see on the stage. When asked which of the GOP candidates they are most interested in learning about during the debates, 18% chose trump, 12% Walker, 11% Bush and 8% Marco Rubio.

Among the field, Trump has been the most willing to blast fellow Republicans, most vociferously Bush -- jabbing repeatedly, with assertions like Bush "couldn't negotiate his way out of a paper bag."

In the Democratic primary, the Fox poll found Hillary Clinton continues to hold a comfortable lead over liberal insurgent Bernie Sanders. Among likely voters in the Democratic primary, 59 percent picked Clinton and 19 percent backed Sanders. Other Democratic contenders, including former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, former Rhode Island Gov. Lincoln Chafee and former Sen. Jim Webb, are still struggling to find any traction in the field.

The poll came from cell phone and landline telephone interviews with 389 likely Republican voters July 13-15. On the Democratic side, Fox News spoke to 382 likely Democratic primary voters.

Scott Walker tries to prove he's a national contender for president // LA Times // Noah Bierman - July 17, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As he rumbled through South Carolina this week, Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker told his favorite story about shopping for clothes at Kohl's department store and cobbling together so many discounts that "they're paying me to buy the shirt."

The tale drew chuckles from some of the 200 Republicans who came to see him at a Harley-Davidson dealership in North Charleston. But the details, including references to the "Kohl's cash" coupons found in his wife's purse, did not spark the same knowing nods that they did during his announcement speech in Wisconsin, where the chain is based and is a more entrenched symbol of middle-class culture.

The stump-speech anecdote points to one of Walker's challenges as he opened his campaign for president by embarking on a whirlwind tour: proving he is a national contender who can win states beyond his Midwestern base.

He is investing time, money and organizational resources in Iowa, which holds the nation's first presidential nominating contest and borders his home state. But to rise above other leading Republican candidates, he needs to show strength in other regions of the country that have early primaries, including South Carolina.

"Fifty percent of the people in South Carolina, you show them a picture of Scott Walker and they don't know who he is," said Moye Graham, chairman of the Republican Party for a state district that covers 15 counties north of Charleston. "He probably has the least face recognition of the major candidates."

Walker, hoping to remedy that problem, pursued an aggressive schedule in early primary states for his first week, with stops in Nevada, South Carolina, Georgia, New Hampshire and Iowa, followed next week by trips to Tennessee, California and North Carolina, and a return trip to New Hampshire for a motorcycle tour. Walker was hoarse during his first appearance in South Carolina after going without a bed for more than 24 hours.

Trying to save money and reinforce his Everyman credentials, he and his staff flew commercial but ran into delays caused by weather, including an unexpected stop in Memphis, a missed connection in Atlanta and a 3 a.m. ride in a rented van to South Carolina.

Polls have suggested Walker can compete in South Carolina and other early states. And many GOP activists in South Carolina, where Republican primary voters are especially conservative, also say he has a shot. But several have said he will have to visit more often — something he pledged to do this week — and distinguish himself from a crowded field that includes Sen. Lindsey Graham, who represents South Carolina, and Sen. Marco Rubio of Florida, who has a strong network in the state. Other very conservative candidates, including Dr. Ben Carson, real estate magnate Donald Trump and former Texas Gov. Rick Perry, are also mentioned favorably by activists here.

"There's just so many candidates," said Brian Grant, a 47-year-old pharmacist from Charleston who came to check Walker out at the Harley-Davidson event. "Nobody's narrowed it down."

And South Carolina voters do not always honor the winners of other early primaries with a bounce. Newt Gingrich, the former speaker of the House, won the primary here in 2012, stanching the momentum of Rick Santorum, the former Pennsylvania senator, who won Iowa.

"He was completely reliant on the bump. It will help, but it never really works," said Brandon Newton, a party chairman from a district based along the border with North Carolina. "It's really who does the ground game in South Carolina."

That's where money and organization help candidates like Jeb Bush, the former Florida governor who has mainstream support and leads by a substantial margin in fundraising through outside groups.

"Your biggest challenge is time," said Rick Wiley, Walker's campaign manager, marking as the most difficult logistical hurdle a stretch of 26 contests in the first two weeks of March that will probably determine the party's nominee.

Walker tries to connect with crowds, and draw a contrast with Bush, by emphasizing his humble roots, including a job at McDonald's and his grandparents' lack of indoor plumbing for a time. He wore jeans, rolled-up sleeves and motorcycle boots in South Carolina, one of three states where he scheduled events at Harley-Davidson dealerships, a nod to another Wisconsin-based company and to his hobby of motorcycle-riding that suggests a renegade streak. In North Charleston he stood before a backdrop of motorcycles stacked three stories high.

Many who took pictures and sought autographs from him after his speeches were eager to talk about their Wisconsin ties -- a few wore Green Bay Packers jerseys or carried the team's mug.

Walker is one of the most polarizing candidates in the field, loathed by Democrats and union activists and admired by conservatives for defeating a recall effort after his rollback of collective bargaining rights for public employees in Wisconsin. That fight is the centerpiece of Walker's speeches and the issue party activists know most about him.

"We took on the unions and we won," Walker said in Lexington.

Walker has tried to move still further to the right to court social conservatives. His work to curtail abortion rights drew some of his loudest applause here, along with his boast of passing a voter-ID law and his fight to require welfare recipients to take drug tests.

Walker has tiptoed around issues that could risk alienating conservative voters, even if they are less controversial with moderates.

He has mostly sidestepped questions about whether South Carolina should have removed the Confederate flag from the capitol, calling it a state issue. That allowed him to avoid taking sides on a topic that remains divisive among the state's Republicans.

To reporters, he praised Republican Gov. Nikki Haley for "bringing together a broad coalition to get the job done."

Walker's impulse to please cultural conservatives has prompted some awkward moments. On Tuesday, he was quoted as saying that he believed gay people should be barred from leading Boy Scout troops because the policy "protected children and advanced Scout values."

But speaking to reporters on Wednesday, Walker downplayed his comment.

"It's up to the Boy Scouts," he said. "All I pointed out was the policy was perfectly fine when I was there and I thought they should be protected from all the political and media controversy about it."

Liberals Lose to Scott Walker in Wisconsin Again // The Daily Beast // Betsy Woodruff – July 17, 2015

The gods are smiling on Scott Walker.

And by the gods, I mean four of the six Badger State's supreme court justices, who just put the kibosh on a lengthy and secret "John Doe" investigation that targeted some of the governor's top allies and like-minded groups.

The investigation was sparked over allegations that outside independent groups who supported Walker secretly coordinated with Wisconsin Republicans during the run-up to the 2012 recall vote.

John Doe refers to a Wisconsin law that lets prosecutors investigate suspects to determine whether or not they have probable cause, according to Marcus Berghahn, of Hurley, Burish, and Stanton Law Firm.

This particular John Doe proceeding—conducted in secret—investigated got kicked off in 2012 because, as the Milwaukee Journal-Sentinel notes, prosecutors suspected that Walker's gubernatorial campaign illegally coordinated with the Wisconsin Club for Growth.

The special prosecutor referred to it as an "a criminal scheme" and to prove it, investigators pointed to documents that seemed to show Walker urging donors to contribute to the advocacy groups, according to the Wisconsin State Journal.

The court's decision—split 4-2 along ideological lines—ruled that the state's anti-coordination law is too broad and vague to comply with the First Amendment.

But even though Team Walker won and progressives lost, Wisconsinites on both sides are not ready to move on. And prosecutor Francis Schmitz has indicated he may try to appeal the case to the U.S. Supreme Court.

Progressives say the justices should have recused themselves, because they benefited from issue-advocacy ads.

"The four justices whose opinion halts an investigation and possible prosecution of Walker's campaign and allies and orders records to be destroyed were the beneficiaries of at least $10 million in campaign spending by parties named in the investigation," said a statement from progressive group One Wisconsin Now issued after the decision.

As you might expect, conservatives strongly back the state's top court—and are univocal in their support of the conservative justices who moved to call off the secret investigation. Rick Esenberg, the president of the Wisconsin Institute for Law and Liberty, said the four made the right call by choosing not to recuse themselves. His group filed an amicus brief for the side that ultimately won.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I don't think it can be the case that the mere fact that somebody has spent money on issue advocacy means that you can never hear a case in which they're involved," he said.

The John Doe investigators targeted a number of members from throughout Wisconsin conservatives' infrastructure in the state—an infrastructure whose operations that has been remarkably efficient and effective.

"They issued subpoenas or search warrants to virtually every conservative or libertarian 501(c)4 advocacy organization in the state," he continued. "So they were all involved, in a way, almost every one of them."

To assert that investigating conservative advocacy organizations means conservative justices can't rule on the case, Esenberg argues, is unfair.

"It's a little bit like the guy who kills his parents and then pleads for clemency because he's an orphan," Esenberg said. "They don't get to remove one side of the political spectrum from the bench because they've attacked the entire advocacy structure on that side of the political spectrum."

And investigators' use of SWAT teams and no-knock raids drew criticism from both ends of the ideological spectrum. Salon's Heather Digby Parton called the no-knock raids "disturbing."

Matt Kittle, the editor-in-chief of the conservative news site Wisconsin Watchdog, characterized the investigation as Nixonian.

"This was, based on our investigation over the last few years, one of the more abusive probes in our lifetimes in the state of Wisconsin, and I think it goes up against any nationally," he said. "This was politically motivated, the court made that clear today."

But Wisconsin progressives argue that that all misses the point.

State Senator Chris Larson said the ruling is "the definition of corruption."

"If you asked the average person on the street, 'Draw me a picture of what a corrupt system looks like,' this would be too obvious to them," he said. "This is it. This is what they would draw."

"This is our state," he continued. "And hey, if Walker keeps going, this will be the country."

Campaign Announcement

Walker announced his run for the White House at the Waukesha County Expo Center in Waukesha, Wisconsin, a suburb of Milwaukee.

He began his speech with a sure-fire winner of an opening line: "I Love America."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Like many presidential candidates before him, Walker used his announcement to recount his biography and his accomplishments, and to mention people who have inspired him along the way. When he turned to policy matters, he was long on criticism and promises and short on specific policy measures. He summarized his platform in three words: "I'm for Reform. Growth. Safety."

The "safety" part of Walker's platform deals with foreign policy. He argues that President Obama has left Americans imperiled:

> Today sadly, under the Obama/Clinton doctrine, America is leading from behind and we're headed toward a disaster.

> We have a president who drew a line in the sand and allowed it to be crossed. A president who call ISIS the JV squad, Yemen a success story and Iran a place we can do business with. Iran…think about that.

Walker went on to vow that he would terminate the nuclear deal with Iran, help "our Kurd and Sunni allies reclaim land taken by ISIS," stand by Israel, stand up to Putin, resist Chinese aggression, spend more on defense and "fight to win."

Walker's Story

Walker was born in Colorado but moved to Plainfield, Iowa at age three when his father became a pastor at a local Baptist Church. Seven years later the Walkers relocated to Delavan, Wisconsin, a small town located roughly fifty miles southwest of Milwaukee. As a teenager, Walker was an Eagle Scout, and he occasionally gave sermons in his father's church. But rather than following his father into the ministry, he chose a career in politics.

Walker ran his first campaign for public office in 1990, but he lost his bid for the State Assembly. He has been on a winning streak ever since. In 1993, he won a State Assembly seat in a more conservative district. He stayed in the State Assembly until 2002, when he won a special election to be Milwaukee County Executive. He subsequently won two regular elections. He stood out during his time as county executive; most of the members of the Milwaukee County Board of Supervisors were Democrats.

Walker launched an ill-fated run for governor in 2005. After a year of campaigning, he dropped out of the race before any votes were cast. He had more success on his second try, winning the governorship in November 2010.

Shortly after taking office in 2011, he proposed legislation limiting collective bargaining rights. That triggered an epic political donnybrook. More than one hundred thousand protesters swarmed Madison, Wisconsin's capital city. Democrats in the Wisconsin Senate staged their own kind of protest: they left Wisconsin in an effort to prevent the quorum needed to act on the bill. Republicans legislators still managed to pass it. The move made Walker a hero to conservatives and a villain to the labor movement. Walker survived a bitterly fought recall election in 2012, and he was reelected governor in 2014.

Walker's Message

Walker admires Ronald Reagan. He often invokes the 40th president when discussing issues, particularly when it comes to foreign policy. He also likes to compare himself to Reagan, who was "a fellow governor who cut taxes and as a leader who proved his mettle by staring down organized labor." He will likely continue to invoke Reagan's name as he positions himself in the 2016 campaign as an unabashed conservative who will stand by his principles and "who will fight and win for America."

Foreign Policy Views

As with most governors who seek the presidency, Walker has limited foreign policy experience. As he puts it, foreign policy is "not an area that governors typically look at." He urges voters to worry less about specific foreign policy experience and more about leadership abilities, because foreign policy is:

> Something that's not just about having PhDs, or talking to PhDs—it's about leadership.

When Senator Marco Rubio, one of Walker's rivals for the GOP nomination, said that "there is no way" a governor can be ready "on Day One to manage U.S. foreign policy," Walker retorted: "I think he's questioning how Ronald Reagan was ready."

General Foreign Policy Worldview

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Walker's general approach to foreign policy mirrors that of most other GOP presidential candidates. (Rand Paul is the obvious exception.) He thinks that President Obama has been weak in his handling of foreign policy and unwilling to recognize threats like ISIS:

> When you have an administration … who doesn't take seriously the threats, who doesn't invest the resources needed to take those threats seriously, you open the door to chaos.

He promises to provide strong, tough leadership that will deter America's adversaries and rally its friends and allies:

> The world needs to know that there is no better friend and no worse enemy than the United States of America.

Overall, however, Walker has tended to limit his public comments on foreign policy. That reluctance to speak about foreign policy became an issue in February when he spoke in London at Chatham House, Britain's leading international affairs think tank. The moderator not surprisingly asked him several foreign policy questions, which Walker declined to answer. He defended his reluctance to speak by saying:

> I just think for me, commenting on foreign policy or, in this case, economic policy in a country where you're a visitor is not the politest of things.

When Walker has waded into foreign policy discussions, the results haven't necessarily been what he wanted. Shortly after returning from London, he answered a question at the annual Conservative Political Action Conference about international terrorism by saying:

> I want a commander-in-chief who will do everything in their power to ensure that the threat from radical Islamic terrorists does not wash up on American soil. We will have someone who leads and ultimately we'll send a message that not only will we protect American soil, but do not, do not take this upon freedom-loving people anywhere else in the world. We need a leader with that kind of confidence. If I can take on 100,000 protesters, I can do the same across the world.

Critics complained that he had equated union members exercising their constitutional right to protest with international terrorists. Former Texas Governor Rick Perry, now Walker's rival for the GOP presidential nomination, called the remark "inappropriate" and "a mistake." Walker insisted that he was not equating protesters with terrorists, but rather was offering up "the closest thing I have in terms of handling a difficult situation, not that there's any parallel between the two."

Days later, Walker triggered criticism with a different set of remarks. At the close of a speech for the Club of Growth, a conservative advocacy group, a questioner said that many people viewed the Chatham House performance as a sign Walker was "not prepared to speak about foreign policy" and then asked what he was doing to prepare for the White House. In his answer, Walker said Ronald Reagan's decision to fire striking air traffic controllers in 1981 was, "the most significant policy decision of my lifetime."
He added:

> Years later, documents released from the Soviet Union showed that…The Soviet Union started treating [Reagan] more seriously once he did something like that. Ideas have to have consequences. And I think [President Barack Obama] has failed mainly because he's made threats and hasn't followed through on them.

Whether Reagan's decision was the most significant act in recent history is a matter of opinion and not fact. But there is no evidence that the documents Walker referred to exist. Reagan's own ambassador to the Soviet Union dismissed the claim as "utter nonsense."

The Middle East

How does Walker's general foreign policy worldview translate into specific steps to respond to specific challenges and opportunities? In terms of radical Islamic terrorism, which Walker has identified as "the greatest threat to future generations," it means relying more on military power:

> I think aggressively, we need to take the fight to ISIS and any other radical Islamic terrorist in and around the world, because it's not a matter of when they attempt an attack on American soil, or not if I should say, it's when, and we need leadership that says clearly, not only amongst the United States but amongst our allies, that we're willing to take appropriate action.

Walker believes that Obama withdrew U.S. troops too hastily from Iraq, thereby sowing the seeds for the rise of the self-proclaimed Islamic State. To deal with that threat, Walker says"I'd rather take the fight to them than wait for them to bring the fight to us." He would do so by going beyond airstrikes and drone strikes:

> We have to be—go beyond just aggressive air strikes. We have to look at other surgical methods. And ultimately, we have to be prepared to put boots on the ground if that's what it takes.

When asked whether that means he favors ordering U.S. troops to return to Iraq, as Senator Lindsey Graham has argued, Walker says he is "not arguing that's the first approach." He thinks for now the United States can roll back the ISIS threat with more modest steps:

> We have a capacity to reclaim Iraq with the Iraqi forces that are there as long as we unleash the power that's already there by the American armed forces.

To that end, he proposes "lifting the political restrictions on our military personnel in Iraq" so that they can better help Iraqis defeat the Islamic State.

Overall, Walker's insistence on keeping all military options on the table may have less to do with an enthusiasm for military action and more to do with a conviction that it is a mistake to put limits on what the United States might do:

> Once we start saying how far we're willing to go or how many troops we're willing to invest, we send a horrible message, particularly to foes in the Middle East who are willing to wait us out.

The political risk in that position, of course, is that voters might see only the prospect of new wars and not a broader deterrent tactic.

Iran

Walker wants a tougher U.S. policy on Iran. He responded to the news that a nuclear deal had been struck with Iran by issuing a statement denouncing the agreement:

> President Obama's nuclear agreement with Iran will be remembered as one of America's worst diplomatic failures. The deal allows Tehran to dismantle U.S. and international sanctions without dismantling its illicit nuclear infrastructure—giving Iran's nuclear weapons capability an American stamp of approval. In crafting this agreement, President Obama has abandoned the bipartisan principles that have guided our nonproliferation policy and kept the world safe from nuclear danger for decades. Instead of making the world safer, this deal will likely lead to a nuclear arms race in the world's most dangerous region. What's worse, the deal rewards the world's leading state sponsor of terrorism with a massive financial windfall, which Iran will use to further threaten our interests and key allies, especially Israel.
> I call on all congressional leaders and presidential candidates, including Secretary Clinton, to repudiate this agreement. Iran's Supreme Leader should know that a future American president will not be bound by this diplomatic retreat. Undoing the damage caused by this deal won't be easy. But when the United States leads, and has a president who isn't eager to embrace Iran, the world will follow. In order to ensure the safety of America and our allies, the next president must restore bipartisan and international opposition to Iran's nuclear program while standing with our allies to roll back Iran's destructive influence across the Middle East.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Before entering the race, Walker vowed to repudiate the deal if he made it to the White House. When asked if he would do that even if it meant breaking with U.S. allies, Walker's answer was succinct: "Absolutely." That prompted Obama to say:

> It would be a foolish approach to take, and perhaps Mr. Walker–after he's taken some time to bone up on foreign policy–will feel the same way.

Walker responded to Obama's jab by reiterating his critique of the president's foreign policy:

> President Obama's failed leadership has put him at odds with many across the country, including members of his own party, and key allies around the world. Americans would be better served by a president who spent more time working with governors and members of Congress rather than attacking them.

Walker's criticism of the Iran deal is tied to his belief that "the current administration is not giving Israel the support it needs…the president is making bad deals with a country that wishes to wipe Israel off the map." Walker vows that during his presidency there will be "no daylight" between the two countries. As Middle East hands like to point out, though, political daylight between the United States and Israel is not unique to Obama's time in office; it happened, for instance, during the presidency of Walker's favorite politician, Ronald Reagan.

Russia and Ukraine

Walker wants to get tough with Vladimir Putin. He said in his campaign announcement speech:

> We need to stop the aggression of Russia into sovereign nations. Putin bases his policies on Lenin's old principle: probe with bayonets, if you encounter mush, push; if you encounter steel, stop.
> With Obama and Clinton, Putin has encountered years of mush. The United States needs a foreign policy that puts steel in front of our enemies.

To that end, he favors intensified sanctions on Russia and the provision of lethal military aid to Ukraine "so they can defend themselves against Russian aggression." He also wants the United States to provide more support for Ukraine's anti-corruption initiatives and to declare that NATO will permanently station troops in Eastern Europe and the Baltics.

China

Walker visited China on a trade mission in 2013, but he hasn't said much about U.S. policy toward Beijing. He does want the United States to take a tougher line against China, particularly with respect to its activities in the South China Sea:

> A serious American response is necessary. The most important step is to reestablish U.S. military strength. We must increase the size of our Navy, strengthen the self-defense capabilities of our regional partners, and regularly engage in freedom-of-navigation patrols throughout the Pacific. Boosting our trade relations with friendly Pacific nations will fortify our economic presence in one of the world's most consequential regions.

Increasing the size of the Navy is an expensive proposition; Walker hasn't identified what he would give up to accommodate the additional spending. The other items on his to-do list are things the U.S. government is currently doing.

Trade

Walker says he is "a strong advocate for free and open trade." Like most governors, he has participated in many overseas trade missions, in his case trying to drum up business for Wisconsin's exports and to encourage foreign firms to invest in the state. He went to Europe twice in the first half of 2015, using it as an opportunity to flag the potential benefits of the proposed Transatlantic Trade and Investment Partnership, which would create free trade between the United States and Europe.

He also supports the Trans-Pacific Partnership. He urged Republican members of Congress to pass trade promotion authority because it would "allow the Republican-controlled Congress to hold this president accountable for presenting a bad trade agreement" by giving them the chance to block it.

Immigration

Walker's views on immigration have shifted. As Milwaukee county executive, he signed resolutions applauding the contributions that undocumented immigrants make and calling for federal action to grant them legal status. As late as 2013, he argued that it "makes sense" to create a path to citizenship for undocumented immigrants and to make it easier for people to immigrate legally into the United States. He also argued that immigrants in the United States legally should get "first preference" and doubted that there would be a need for "border security and a wall and all that…if you had a better, saner way to let people into the country in the first place."

More recently, he has opposed a path to citizenship. For example, in March he said publicly, ""I don't believe in amnesty." (Participants at a meeting Walker held for business leaders a few weeks later reported that he told them that undocumented immigrants should not be deported and that he would support allowing some of them to become citizens. Walker's spokesperson disputed those claims.)

The shift in Walker's public comments on immigration prompted Fox News's Chris Wallace to press him to admit he had changed his position. Walker did just that:

> And my view has changed. I'm flat out saying it….
> I look at the problems we've experienced for the last few years. I've talked to governors on the border and others out there. I've talked to people all across America.
> And the concerns I have is that we need to secure the border. We ultimately need to put in place a system that works. A legal immigration system that works.

Walker now stresses that immigration reform should be "based on, first and foremost, protecting American workers and American wages." Some conservative scholars and activists have criticized that claim, noting that ample economic research shows that undocumented workers do not hurt the economy or take jobs from native workers.

Climate Change

Walker has not said whether he thinks climate change is real and the result of human activity. He has signed a pledge to oppose any tax or fee increases intended to combat climate change.

More on Walker

Walker summarized his worldview in his 2013 book, co-authored with Marc Thiessen, in Unintimidated: A Governor's Story and a Nation's Challenge.

Scott Walker Push For Milwaukee Bucks Arena Subsidy Could Benefit His Fundraising Chief // IB Times // David Sirota and Andrew Perez – July 17, 2015

In the year leading up to the announcement of his presidential campaign, Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker championed a high-profile proposal to spend a quarter of a billion dollars of taxpayer money to help finance a new Milwaukee Bucks arena -- all while pushing to slash roughly the same amount from state funding for higher education. One of those who stands to benefit from the controversial initiative is a longtime Walker donor and Republican financier who has just been appointed by the governor to head his presidential fundraising operation.

Real estate mogul Jon Hammes, who has donated hundreds of thousands of dollars to Republican candidates and causes, is a prominent member of the investor group that owns Milwaukee's NBA team. Last week CNN reported that he also will serve as the Walker campaign's national finance co-chairman. Days after that appointment, Walker's Republican allies in the Wisconsin state Senate backed the governor's proposal to spend public funds on a new arena for the Bucks.

In his speech announcing his presidential candidacy, Walker presented himself as a free-market conservative and derided what he called a "top-down, government-knows-best approach" to economic policymaking. Hammes serves on the board of a conservative think tank called the Wisconsin Policy Research Institute that says "competitive free markets, limited government, private initiative and personal responsibility are essential to our democratic way of life."

But under Walker's proposal, the government would redistribute taxpayer money to a project benefiting Hammes and other Bucks investors.

A representative for Walker defended the proposal, saying in a statement: "Governor Walker's focus is on protecting Wisconsin's taxpayers from the negative financial impact of losing the Bucks, while balancing state and local support."

A Walker campaign aide additionally asserted that it was "a dangerous leap" for International Business Times to ask about the propriety of subsidizing a deal in which Hammes could benefit. "The stadium deal has been in the works much longer than he has been involved with the campaign," the aide said.

However, before Walker proposed the arena deal, Hammes had donated more than $15,000 to his gubernatorial campaigns, according to state campaign finance data. Federal records also show that over the last decade, Hammes has donated almost $280,000 to Republican candidates and third-party groups -- including more than $14,000 to the Wisconsin Republican Party. He also contributed $500 to Walker while he was a Milwaukee county executive.

Hammes became one of the part owners of the Bucks in 2014. A little more than three months later, Walker unveiled his proposal to spend a quarter of a billion dollars on a new arena for the team. The team currently plays at BMO Harris Bradley Center in Milwaukee.

A Hammes Company representative declined to say what percentage of the team he owns.

Hammes' financial interest in Walker's arena subsidy package may not be limited to just his stake in the team. According to local news reports, his real estate firm also also bought parcels of downtown land near the location of the proposed new arena. Hammes' firm also was contracted by the local chamber of commerce to evaluate new stadium proposals. The company has expertise in that area, having been involved in the construction of the New York Giants' stadium and the renovation of the Green Bay Packers' home at Lambeau Field in Wisconsin.

Walker's administration has justified the expenditure as a means of safeguarding Wisconsin's economy, which has seen the largest decline of its middle class of any state in the country.

"This plan protects taxpayers from the loss of $299 million if a new stadium is not built and the NBA moves the Milwaukee Bucks to another state," Walker's spokeswoman, Laurel Patrick, told IBTimes.

The Bucks have claimed the new arena would be a boon for Wisconsin, saying in an advertisement that the entire state would feel a "ripple effect."

A widely cited 2008 study by Econ Journal Watch found an "overwhelming preponderance of evidence that no tangible economic benefits are generated by these heavily subsidized professional sports facilities."

While Walker's arena financing proposal passed the state Senate with bipartisan support, some Republican and Democratic legislators decried the initiative.

Democratic Sen. Tim Carpenter of Milwaukee said that "the burden of paying for the construction of the new arena should fall on those who would benefit from its construction." Republican Sen. Rob Cowles said, "I think it is incredibly unfair that my constituents in northeastern Wisconsin are being asked to pay for a sports arena in Milwaukee."

As Scott Walker takes national stage, some home-state constituents cry foul // Christian Science Monitor // Sarah Caspari – July 17, 2015

If Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker (R) has been divisive among his constituents in the past, his recent presidential candidacy announcement has drawn more critical eyes.

Governor Walker has come under fire for neglecting his gubernatorial duties in favor of the presidential campaign trail, as well as for his political moves, which have always caused controversy.

"We don't blame him for running, but he still has to do his job as governor," said a Milwaukee Journal Sentinel editorial published Tuesday. “There were signs during the recent debate over the state budget that Walker was AWOL at times.”

The Journal Sentinel criticized Walker for attempting to “win over” Republicans by “bragging” about his legislation to slash collective bargaining rights for public employee unions – an act that “cleaved the state in two” and inspired “angry protests.”

Walker’s approval rating in Wisconsin is down to 41 percent as of an April poll, though he is leading in all-important Iowa.

The Journal Sentinel editorial also criticized Walker’s delivery on promises regarding job creation saying he has lagged behind other Midwestern states and could not “come close” to the 250,000 jobs he vowed to create in his first term.

The Journal Times of Racine also noted in an editorial Monday the role Walker’s office played in the ill-received Republican attack on Wisconsin’s open records law, as well as its subsequent haste to pass the buck onto other Republicans:

> A spokeswoman for Walker said on July 8 that legislative leaders notified the governor's office they were interested in making changes to the state's open records laws.
> Then on Friday, Walker pointed the finger at Republican lawmakers directly while speaking on a WTMJ talk-radio program: ‘I think it was a mistake to even think about it in the budget, even though it didn't come from us.’ Walker's office earlier in the week acknowledged it helped draft the changes.

The Wisconsin GOP as a whole is also drawing attention for its accusations that the Government Accountability Board is biased against Republicans.

A Sunday Wisconsin State Journal editorial said there was “little evidence” to support the claims and criticized Republicans for citing the board’s secret investigation of Walker’s recall election campaign in 2012 as proof of anti-Republican sentiment.

The Journal noted that two out of four attorneys who approved the investigation were Republicans themselves, and the special prosecutor in charge has said he voted for Walker.

Now On The National Stage, Scott Walker Is Still A Guy From Delavan // NPR // Don Goneya – July 17, 2015

Drive into Delavan, Wis., and you immediately notice the giant circus animals downtown. A giraffe towering over a small grassy park, and an elephant rearing up on its hindquarters. They're statues, actually — here to commemorate the town's quirky history as home to circus companies that needed a place to winter over.

They began arriving in the mid 1800s — P.T. Barnum's Greatest Show on Earth was founded in Delavan. But the last of the circuses pulled out of the town three decades ago.

You might also spot the small green road sign that reads: "Welcome to Delavan. Population 8,463." And in script, "Hometown of Governor Scott Walker."

As Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker's presidential campaign officially begins, he has something no other 2016 hopeful has — close personal ties to three states Republicans would love to capture in the next presidential election. Walker was born in Colorado, lived in Iowa, then moved to Wisconsin. And that's where the young Walker got the political bug.

Here in solidly Republican Walworth County, Walker's backers look forward to updating that sign to "Hometown of President Scott Walker."

"I call him Scott. I don't call him Gov. Walker. That's the way I look at Gov. Walker — as a friend," said Mel Nieuwenhuis, who has been mayor of Delavan for 14 years.

Walker hasn't lived here since he left to go to college in the mid-1980s, but he gets back on occasion. These days, when local residents see him, it's probably on television.

I asked the mayor whether, when he sees the governor and candidate now, does he still see that guy from Delavan?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I do, I think so," he said. "Because to me, Scott, he speaks at my level. He doesn't talk down to you. He's just a regular guy."

Walker was 10 years old when his father became pastor at the First Baptist Church in Delavan and moved his family from the even smaller town of Plainfield, Iowa. You can still walk around the back of the church and see the project Walker completed to earn Eagle Scout honors. There's a small but steep hill there, and Walker and some fellow scouts built a retaining wall using old telephone poles. It worked.

People who knew him back when say he was already developing leadership qualities.

It's evident in the pages of his 1986 high school yearbook, which library director Anita O'Brien opens to the index. There's a long list next to Scott Walker's name: Foreign Language Club, the Library Club, Pep Club, Student Council, Varsity Club, Basketball, Cross Country, Football, Track, Swing Choir, Concert, Pep Band, String Ensemble.

One photo shows him with the choir performing songs from the musical Cats. There's one of him playing drums in the high school band. In the varsity football team photo, he sits front row to the left wearing the number 32.

In another photo, he sports the classic hairstyle of the day — a mullet. The caption underneath reads: Scott K. Walker — the Desperado. There's no further explanation.

Following Walker's junior year of high school he took part in a decades-old Wisconsin tradition — an American Legion-sponsored program called Badger Boys State, which brings together about 800-900 young men from across the state of Wisconsin. Most high schools send one to three students, said Thomas Skrenes, who has been a staffer at these annual gatherings for decades. He also said Walker actually made it in as an alternate, when one of those selected from Delavan couldn't make it.

But Skrenes says Walker stood out for being "very poised, very articulate, very well-read ... and he was very interested in politics and history."

During the week at Badger Boys State, participants form a government, run for office, debate issues. Then, at the end, two students are selected to attend Boys Nation in Washington, D.C. Walker was chosen.

In a video on the American Legion website, Walker spoke about the program, saying: "In and of itself, [it] just transformed me. I was totally taken, not just by the politics and the running for office and the government, but just about the public service."

Twenty-five years after attending Boys Nation, he was elected governor of Wisconsin. In that job, Walker has had many battles — he took on the public employee unions, including teachers, stripping them of most of their collective bargaining rights. That led to a recall attempt two years into his term. But he survived, and was re-elected in 2014.

His campaigns have been bruising affairs, and even in Delavan, you can feel the aftereffects. Some around town can be reluctant to talk about him.

Nieuwenhuis, the Delavan mayor, had a theory on that: "I think either you love Scott Walker or you hate Scott Walker — depending on which side you're on."

It's a small town, he said, so why risk getting your neighbor mad at you?

As for Walker himself, these days when he talks about Delavan, he talks about the conservative values he learned there.

"When I was growing up in Delavan, not a one of my classmates ever said to me, 'Hey, Scott, someday when I grow up, I want to become dependent on the government.' Right? Nobody every wrote in my yearbook, 'Scott, good luck becoming dependent on the government,' " he said to laughs at a speech he made in New Hampshire.

It isn't a laugh line for everyone, though.

One lifelong Delavan resident — and Democrat — says such comments are divisive.

"It does kind of offend me a little bit," said Ryan Schroeder. "You know, divide and conquer. I just don't agree with those statements. And unfortunately we've seen that happen here in the state and I think it would be very unfortunate to see it nationwide."

It may rub Schroeder the wrong way, but Walker's message has been welcomed by conservatives across the country. Republicans have noticed that he has won — repeatedly — in a state their party hasn't carried in a presidential year since the 1980s.

As Walker himself often notes, the last Republican to win Wisconsin's electoral votes was a guy who grew up just across the state line in another small town called Dixon, Ill. He became a governor, too — and his name was Ronald Reagan.

Can Walker Hit South Carolina's Sweet Spot? // NPR // Jessica Taylor – July 17, 2015

Scorching temperatures near the triple digits weren't driving away the 325 people gathered to hear Scott Walker speak at a Lexington, S.C., barbecue joint Wednesday.

Packed under an open-air porch with fans that were hardly helping, the heat didn't seem to affect the enthusiasm for the Wisconsin governor on just his second day as an announced presidential candidate — and it's the type of excitement he'll need to generate to win the important South Carolina GOP primary.

Clad in his Harley boots, jeans and a button-down shirt, Walker bounded onto stage that afternoon to Dierks Bentley's "I Hold On."

That may have been the motto for the day for Walker, who was running on no sleep since 4 a.m. the day before, thanks to flight snafus and cancellations.

"Holding on" could also be the Wisconsin governor's maxim in the traditionally rough-and-tumble Palmetto State politics. He's at the top of very early polls there, but the Southern prize is wide open, even with one of its sitting senators running.

With Iowa considered a must-win for Walker, and lesser hopes in moderate New Hampshire, a victory in South Carolina in 2016 could secure Walker's place atop the GOP field.

The state is looking to reclaim its streak of picking presidential nominees, and Walker could be just the candidate who can bridge its divide — appealing to both conservative and establishment coalitions across the state's diverse Republican Party as a recipe for a win.

Running On Adrenaline

There was no weariness in Walker's stride, though, as he barreled from one end of the Palmetto State to the other. The Republican was feeding on pure adrenaline as he delivered his stump speech three times — and at the final stop even had to do an abbreviated version in the parking lot (again, with temperatures reaching into the 90s) to an overflow crowd of 500 at Mutt's BBQ in Mauldin, S.C.

"In case you hadn't heard, I'm Scott Walker, I'm running for president, and I'm asking for your vote," he said to roars at the trio of stops, starting early that morning at 8 a.m. in North Charleston at a Harley-Davidson store.

"Americans want to vote for something and for someone, so give me a few minutes and I'm going to tell you what I'm for."

He ticked off his own record, which most in the crowd are familiar with — "we took on the unions, and we won," and his three victories in four years in a blue-leaning state.

When asked what they know about Scott Walker or why they came out to see him, most in the crowds said it's his fight with labor that impressed them and left them wanting to know more.

"I know that he instituted some pretty major changes in Wisconsin, had a lot of pushback from a lot of people but was able keep what I think were positive changes in place," Nancy Nicodemus of nearby Summerville said at his North Charleston event.

To fill out the rest for voters, Walker runs down his history of tax cuts and social credentials. Another top reminder is that he worked to defund Planned Parenthood — particularly resonant in this socially conservative state a day after a controversial video that allegedly showed a top staffer discussing the sale of parts of aborted fetuses to researchers.

He's against Common Core education standards — unpopular with conservatives in South Carolina — and gets lots of cheers for his push to reform welfare in Wisconsin, including mandatory job training enrollment and drug testing.

But the main crux of Walker's stump is his humble roots — a not-so-subtle jab at wealthier, more privileged candidates in the race like former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush and billionaire businessman Donald Trump. He's the son of a Baptist minister and a part-time secretary, whose grandparents didn't even have indoor plumbing while his mother was growing up. He talks of how his first job was as a dishwasher but he later was hired to flip burgers at McDonald's. He doesn't mention his own time in college, though, and the fact that he never finished his degree at Marquette University.

"We did not inherit fame or fortune from our family," said Walker. "What we got was the belief that if you work hard and you play by the rules you can do and be anything. That's the American dream, and that is worth fighting for."

Another anecdote he tells to drive that point home is of how his family shops at Kohl's department store — but on the discount rack, and armed with coupons and "Kohl's cash."

It's an illustration he ties into tax cuts and spending. Arguing that Kohl's can afford such deep discounts because of the volume it produces, Walker says the federal government should mimic that idea.

"The government could charge higher rates, and a few of you could afford it. Or we can lower the rates, broaden the base and increase the value of people participating in the economy," said Walker, renaming Ronald Reagan's "Laffer curve" the "Kohl's curve."

Gaming A South Carolina Win

For Walker, he'll have to use a unique balancing act to win the Palmetto State. Except for the state's wrong pick in 2012 of former Speaker Newt Gingrich, South Carolina had a perfect streak of picking the eventual GOP nominee since 1980.

Past nominees won by crafting winning coalitions across the state — appealing to the Upstate's sizable evangelical population while also wooing more "country club Republicans," military veterans and retirees in the Lowcountry. That's how George W. Bush got a win in 2000, securing his place. The foe he defeated, Arizona Sen. John McCain, was able to bridge the divides and win in 2008, though.

South Carolina GOP consultant Chip Felkel says his then-college professor Whit Ayres — now a national pollster for Florida Sen. Marco Rubio's campaign — summed up the state like this: "In the Upstate they want to know where you go to church, in the Midlands they want to know where you work, and in Charleston they want to know what you want to drink."

Felkel, who is unaligned in the 2016 race, says Walker could have the right mix for South Carolina. After he jolted into the national conversation after a fiery Iowa speech in January, his nascent campaign had some growing pains and stumbles. On his announcement tour at least, those appeared to have been fixed.

"He's got that blue collar appeal, and his messaging seems that he's going to try to play to that hilt," said Felkel. "I think in certain parts of the state he's got the potential to do pretty well, but he's got to prove he's ready for prime time."

For John Borkowski of Mt. Pleasant, Walker might just be the sweet spot for him and other South Carolinians — not too moderate, not too conservative, but just right.

"I think a lot of folks around here are tired of the establishment, of the Jeb Bushes of the world. We love [Texas Sen.] Ted Cruz, but sometimes he just talks too much, he's just out there to be heard," Borkowski said at the North Charleston stop. "Scott Walker, when he says something, he does it. He took on the unions and he beat them. He took on the schools and the teachers and beat them. He took on the recall and won. He's a worker — he says what he does and does what he says."

The Republican free-for-all is about to become a 17-candidate scrum.

Never in modern times has a major political party had so many prominent candidates vying at once for its presidential nomination. The 2016 field is all but set, as Ohio Gov. John Kasich will formally join the race Tuesday morning and former Virginia Gov. Jim Gilmore plans an early August announcement.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

So far, familiarity and intrigue with some new players have boosted a handful of candidates to the top. Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush is the brother and son of presidents. Real estate mogul Donald Trump is classic Internet click bait. Sens. Marco Rubio of Florida, Ted Cruz of Texas and Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker are younger upstarts whose success in swing states rates them close looks from insiders.

As the race begins in earnest, here's where the candidates stand:

TOP TIER: The Front-runners

JEB BUSH

Pros: The former Florida governor and his supporters have raised $114 million, more than double any other Republican. He can keep tapping the loyal family network that's won the White House three times.

Con: Too tight with big donors. Plodding campaign style. And that network last won 11 years ago.

MARCO RUBIO

Pros: At 44, the senator from Florida has the look and vigor of a new generation's leader. Hispanic heritage is a big advantage. Stirs intrigue among the party establishment.

Cons: Backed a bipartisan path to citizenship for undocumented immigrants in 2013, then took a tougher stance. A first-term senator who could be seen as too inexperienced to be commander in chief.

SCOTT WALKER

Pros: The Wisconsin governor successfully battled state public employee unions. Won three statewide elections in four years. First governor in the nation to survive a recall effort.

Cons: No foreign policy or Washington experience. Can be awkward in unscripted settings. Hasn't proven widespread appeal outside Midwest.

SECOND TIER: Potential, but . . .

DONALD TRUMP

Pros: The real estate billionaire's stardom and bluster attract big, adoring crowds and media attention. His demands that the U.S. get tougher with illegal immigration is popular in conservative circles.

Cons: Unusually high negatives. Critics deride his immigration views as intolerant. Alienates many in his own party.

TED CRUZ

Pros: The senator from Texas' passionate style is a big hit with conservative audiences, particularly evangelical voters. He and backers raised $51 million this year, second only to Bush among Republican presidential candidates.

Cons: Polarizing figure, disliked by many Republicans. Once called a "wacko bird" by 2008 GOP presidential nominee John McCain.

RAND PAUL

Pros: The senator from Kentucky inherits his father's libertarian following. Has strong views on individual rights and a less intrusive foreign policy. Has made efforts to reach out to minority voters.

Cons: His father's libertarian following and those strong views.

BEN CARSON

Pros: The retired neurosurgeon has a strong grassroots network. His low-key, thoughtful style plays well with conservative voters.

Cons: No government experience. Has made controversial statements. Gentle style may be too gentle in a 17-person brawl.

TIER THREE: Struggling

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

RICK PERRY

Pros: The former Texas governor's down-to-earth manner plays well with voters. Strong on issues he's familiar with, notably economics and border security.

Cons: One of the 2012 presidential campaign's biggest flops. Under indictment for abuse of power. Not sharp when unfamiliar with issues.

JOHN KASICH

Pros: Popular governor in Ohio, the nation's premier swing state. Approachable and eager to talk issues at length. Carried 86 of Ohio's 88 counties in November election.

Cons: Too moderate for national Republican electorate. Regular-guy demeanor doesn't seem presidential. Entering the race late.

CHRIS CHRISTIE

Pros: The New Jersey governor's tough talking, brutally frank and popular with audiences eager for an unscripted candidate. Won twice in a Democratic state, did well with minority voters.

Cons: Hurt by George Washington Bridge scandal. Bombastic style gets tiresome and is sometimes marred by flashes of temper. Too centrist and culturally distant for Southern and Midwestern Republicans.

BOBBY JINDAL

Pros: The Louisiana governor won statewide office twice. Strong background on health issues. Talks passionately about his deep religious beliefs.

Cons: Talks passionately about his deep religious beliefs, a turnoff for mainstream voters. Highly unpopular back home, as fiscal policy has proven shaky.

MIKE HUCKABEE

Pros: The former Arkansas governor is a vigorous, entertaining campaigner, popular with Christian right audiences. A pastor with solid evangelical credentials.

Cons: Views on moral issues such as same-sex marriage are toxic to many Republican voters. Won the 2008 Iowa caucus, then fizzled fast.

TIER FOUR: The unpredictables

RICK SANTORUM

Pros: The former senator from Pennsylvania won the 2012 Iowa caucus. Strong Christian right following. Tireless one-on-one campaigner.

Cons: Had his shot in 2012. Too many others vying for the same constituency this time.

CARLY FIORINA

Pros: The retired business executive wows crowds with her energetic style and pointed criticism of Hillary Clinton. Only woman in the Republican race.

Cons: Lost 2010 U.S. Senate race in California by 10 points. Opponents raise questions about layoffs during her time at Hewlett-Packard.

TIER FIVE: Who?

LINDSEY GRAHAM

Pros: The senator from South Carolina is an expert on military and national security matters. Strong one-on-one campaign skills.

Cons: Lagging in money, barely known. Unclear whether he can even win his own state's critical primary.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

GEORGE PATAKI

Pros: The former New York governor won three terms in a Democratic state. Helped lead state's recovery from 9/11 attacks.

Cons: Too moderate for conservative electorate. Barely known outside New York.

JAMES GILMORE

Pros: The former Virginia governor has a solid political resume. Former Republican Party chairman. Headed terrorism policy advisory panel under two presidents.

Cons: Last won political office in 1997. Crushed in 2008 Senate bid.

New data suggest GOP 2016 nominee will need to win nearly half of Latino vote // LA Times // Lisa Mascaro – July 17, 2015

New research out Friday shows that Republicans will need a larger slice of Latino voters than previously thought if they hope to win the White House in 2016, creating an even tougher hurdle for the eventual nominee.

Thanks to changing demographics, the conventional math that once said the GOP would need to win a minimum of 40% of the Latino electorate no longer holds.

Now, data suggests that Republicans will need as much as 47% of Latino voters -- nearly twice the share that Mitt Romney is believed to have captured in 2012.

Put another way: 47% is the new 40%. And it is a daunting number.

"It's very, very, very basic: Every single year, you need a little bit more of the Latino vote," said Matt Barreto, UCLA political science professor and co-founder of the polling firm Latino Decisions. "It's just math."

The research is based on demographic changes and voter preferences emerging at a time when older, white voters who have powered Republican nominees are fading. The growing Latino electorate is expected to surpass 10% of all voters in 2016, and younger white voters are trending toward Democrats.

The findings are likely to scramble Republican strategy circles, because the top Republican candidates are currently performing no better than Romney among Latinos -- a problem compounded by celebrity candidate Donald Trump's disparaging comments about Mexican immigrants.

Jeb Bush, the former Florida governor, does best with Latinos, at 27%, according to a Univision poll this week, closely trailed by Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) at 25%.

The new thinking unveiled Friday largely mirrors that of Republican pollster Whit Ayres, who has argued that the party's 2016 nominee will need more than 40% of the Latino vote. He has been tapped by Rubio's campaign.

A look at past elections shows the rough road ahead for the GOP amid the demographic shift.

The last Republican nominee to hit the 40% threshold was George W. Bush in 2004, who was popular with Latino voters. He went on to win the White House with 58% of the white vote, at a time when Latinos were 7% of overall voters.

Romney and John McCain trailed in Latino support and lost the presidency.

Republicans could stem their reliance on Latino voters if the party's nominee performed better among whites -- as some GOP strategists are hoping to do.

But that strategy could force the candidate to favor more conservative positions on immigration and other issues for little gain, as history also shows that the party's attempt to grow its support among white voters has its limits.

The party's high-water mark with white voters came when Ronald Reagan won 66% of the white electorate in the 1984 landslide.

By 2012, Romney won 59% of white voters against President Obama.

If the GOP nominee won 60% of the white electorate in 2016, the candidate would need 42% of the Latino vote to win the White House, the research shows.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But if the candidate again topped out at 59% of white voters in 2016, he or she would need 47% of the Latino vote to make up the difference, the research said.

Barreto, who conducted the research for America's Voice, a leading immigration advocacy group, acknowledged he had been using the old thinking until he ran the numbers.

"We were blind to this," he said at a briefing Friday in Washington. "We shouldn't use the 40% anymore."

Republicans' crush on Silicon Valley not returned // Politico // Tony Romm – July 17, 2015

SAN FRANCISCO — Jeb Bush this week gushed with love for Silicon Valley, hanging in the offices of Thumbtack, causing a spectacle with his pre-announced Uber hail, and flashing around his Apple Watch, as he talked about how Washington needs to learn a few things from the Silicon Valley way.

It's not really a mutual relationship.

Despite Republican candidates' high-profile outreach to the Bay Area, most tech industry bigwigs are throwing cash at Democratic front-runner Hillary Clinton.

Clinton's campaign in the second quarter counted big checks from a variety of tech executives, including Facebook Chief Operating Officer Sheryl Sandberg, Google Chief Internet Evangelist Vint Cerf, YouTube leader Susan Wojcicki and Tesla CEO Elon Musk, according to a fundraising report filed this week. Sandberg, Cerf and Wojcicki each gave $2,700, while Musk gave $5,000.

By contrast, Bush, Marco Rubio and Rand Paul collected just a handful of donations from Valley elite. The Republicans did receive support from many lower-level Silicon Valley employees, particularly Paul, who attracted a large number of small dollar donations.

All three GOP candidates have sought to make inroads in the region with a message of keeping government from getting in the way of innovation.

Paul, starved of Wall Street cash, has made a big effort to court Silicon Valley and the larger tech community. He's traveled regularly to California, set up an office in San Francisco and previously made his case to the industry at the annual South by Southwest summit in Texas, while broadcasting his travels on Meerkat.

Bush also has been ratcheting up his pitch, telling employees at a town hall on Thursday, "The government of the future needs to look more like Thumbtack, to be honest with you: lower cost, higher quality, focused on outcomes, really focused on citizens, or in your case, the customers." Rubio, for his part, traveled to a startup incubator in Chicago to talk about innovation earlier this month.

It's still early in the race for the White House, but as the latest filings show, the GOP has plenty of ground to cover if it hopes to dislodge Democrats' firm grasp on the industry's wealthiest donors.

"President Barack Obama set a record for level of engagement with the tech community," said Garrett Johnson, the co-founder of Lincoln Labs, a Republican tech group which is holding its Reboot conference this weekend. "We've been engaged by the Democratic Party for at least the past eight years … whereas you don't have that track record for anyone on the GOP side."

Tech executives showered Obama with support during both his 2008 and 2012 runs. By his re-election campaign, the incumbent even had in place a campaign apparatus — Technology for Obama — that raised cash from executives at Google, Salesforce and other Internet firms.

Of the $28 million contributed by the communications and electronics sector during the 2012 presidential race, more than $18 million went to Obama, according to data compiled by the Center for Responsive Politics.

And while some love has been lost over the Edward Snowden revelations, Democrats have only solidified their cultural advantage in Valley. For all the region's libertarian tendencies, it is resolutely socially liberal — and on some of the most prominent national issues, such as same-sex marriage, Bay Area donors find themselves in total alignment with Clinton.

The result is evident in the latest round of fundraising reports.

Clinton snagged checks from Lisa Jackson, the newly elevated policy chief at Apple; Mark Pincus, the CEO of Zynga; Drew Houston, CEO of Dropbox; and Aaron Levie, the leader of Box. Each gave $2,700. The campaign also received donations from a number of Facebook executives and two top venture capitalists at Andreessen Horowitz.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Republicans, by contrast, had a more sparse showing from the tech industry.

Bush did snag checks from Yahoo Chief Financial Officer Kenneth Goldman ($2,700), and Raj Shah of Palo Alto Networks ($2,700). Rubio saw support from some Oracle executives, after former CEO Larry Ellison held a fundraiser for him at his Woodside, Calif., home. Rubio also got a donation from Cisco CEO John Chambers, another fixture in Republican fundraising. Carly Fiorina, a former Hewlett-Packard CEO, attracted checks from more old-school tech types, including Ann Livermore.

Paul, who famously set up an outpost in the Valley to help recruit tech talent and support, didn't attract donations from major industry executives, although he was popular with many tech firm employees.

Today in Politics: Organizers Build Up Events in Iowa, and the Candidates Come // NYT // Alan Rappeport – July 17, 2015

The Iowa caucuses are more than six months away, but party activists in the state will get the chance to size up several Republican presidential candidates at one time this weekend.

Saturday brings the Family Leadership Summit meeting, the annual gathering in Ames intended to "inspire, educate and motivate" conservatives.

The lineup will include Senator Marco Rubio of Florida, Senator Ted Cruz of Texas, Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin, Gov. Bobby Jindal of Louisiana, Rick Perry, Mike Huckabee, Rick Santorum, Ben Carson and Donald J. Trump.

Breaking from the traditional cattle call, organizers will do away with speeches, and the candidates instead will each field about 20 minutes of questions from Frank Lutz, a conservative pollster.

Drew Zahn, a spokesman for the gathering, said that the themes of the day would include national security, economics and religious freedom.

There should be plenty to talk about after the recent Supreme Court decisions regarding the Affordable Care Act and same-sex marriage that have rankled many conservatives. The candidates will also have a better idea of where they stand on the fund-raising front now that the campaigns have released their latest financial disclosures.

Mr. Trump's attendance at the event will most likely create additional buzz, as the billionaire businessman's contentious comments on immigration have become a litmus test for his fellow Republicans and have brought a sense of disorder to the process. For Mr. Trump, who has been married three times and has liberal views on some policy issues, it will be a chance to reintroduce himself to the religious conservative crowd at a time when he has been at or near the lead in several opinion polls.

Obama's Donors Flocking To Sanders, Romney's Going To Rubio // U.S. News & World Report – July 17, 2015

Sen. Bernie Sanders, I-Vt., speaks to reporters after the Senate Democrats' policy luncheon at the Capitol on Tuesday.

Bernie Sanders is drawing more of Barack Obama's 2012 campaign donors than Hillary Clinton.

And Marco Rubio is scoring the biggest share of Mitt Romney's contributors thus far.

These are the findings of Crowdpac, a San Francisco-based political data-mining firm which analyzed the July presidential campaign finance reports.

The Vermont senator has already received contributions from 24,582 of Obama's donors; whereas Clinton has only tapped just over 9,000 of them. Martin O'Malley, the former Maryland governor, has grabbed 383 Obama donors.

That means Sanders has nabbed 72 percent of the 34,340 Obama donors who have given to a candidate in 2016, according to Crowdpac.

Ever since Mitt Romney dropped his flirtation with another White House bid last winter, the rush has been on to court his moneymen and women.

Rubio's winning that charge.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Crowdpac found that the first-term Florida senator has nabbed the greatest number of Romney donors so far – 2,891.

Perhaps more surprising. though, is that Ted Cruz is landing more of Romney's donors (1,840) than Jeb Bush (1,562).

Ben Carson is fourth in the GOP chase for Romney's contributors with 1,285.

Overall, of the 9,302 Romney donors who have doled out money to a candidate in 2016, Rubio has snagged about 31 percent of them.

Another instructive nugget inside the Crowdpac data is the slow crawl of Ron Paul's donors to his son, Rand Paul.

Crowdpac found that just 816 of the father's donors have given to the son, though just 1,133 of Ron Paul's donors have doled out money so far. (By comparison, Rand has drawn 511 Romney donors.)

Cruz has picked off 316 of Rick Perry's 2012 donors in their budding intrastate rivalry. Just over 1,000 of Perry's 2012 donors have engaged in the 2016 race.

And then there's the surprising.

There's 276 Romney donors who have given to Sanders, and 280 who have given to Clinton.

And just to show the dizzying breadth of some people's choices, Crowdpac discovered that five contributors to Michele Bachmann – one of the most conservative candidates in the 2012 GOP field – sent money to Sanders, the self-avowed socialist.

Capitalism for the Rest of Us // NYT // Joseph R. Blasi, Richard B. Freeman and Douglas I. Kruse – July 17, 2015

IN her most detailed economic policy address so far, Hillary Rodham Clinton said Monday that she wanted “to give workers the chance to share in the profits they help produce” through a two-year tax credit that would encourage profit-sharing. As social scientists who have studied the issue for years, we were glad to see it get attention.

The stagnation of earnings for most Americans, despite rising productivity, and the shrinkage of the middle class, because of soaring inequality, are without precedent in our economic history.

Capital’s share of national income has risen, while labor’s share has fallen — even though it includes lavish compensation of executives who are paid disproportionately through stock grants, options and bonuses. To restore prosperity for all, we need to spread the benefits of economic growth to entrepreneurial citizens through profit-sharing and the ownership of capital. This isn’t some radical notion; it has a long tradition in America.

Many of the founders believed that the best economic plan for the republic was for citizens to own land, which was then the main form of productive capital.

Washington signed into law tax credits to help revive the cod fishery destroyed by the British during the revolution, requiring that everyone had a share in the profits, from the cabin boy to the captain. The Northwest Ordinance of 1787 offered land cheaply to settlers. Jefferson concluded the Louisiana Purchase in 1803 to help further the notion of “an empire of liberty” through broad land ownership. Lincoln’s landmark Homestead Act of 1862 gave federal land grants to settlers. (As a result of the Civil War, it was passed without representatives of the South, where land was concentrated in the hands of slaveholders.)

As America industrialized in the late 19th century, the economy became dominated by big corporations. And yet some family-run businesses, and entrepreneurs who were concerned about the place of workers in an economy dominated by gigantic enterprises, sought to extend the benefits of capitalism to employees. Companies like Pillsbury, Kodak and Procter & Gamble introduced widespread profit-sharing and employee stock ownership.

The economic boom after World War II solidified the view that regular increases in fixed wages and benefits could carry the burden of “sharing the wealth.” Sadly, since the 1970s, wages have stagnated, and the idea of profit-sharing has been largely forgotten in public debates.

It’s time to revive it. The United States already has more extensive profit-sharing and employee share ownership than many other advanced economies. In the European Union in 2010, fewer than 10 percent of workers own company stock and fewer than 30 percent have profit-sharing (except Sweden, where the figure is 36 percent).

In the United States last year, close to 20 percent of private-sector employees owned stock, and 7 percent held stock options, in the companies where they worked, while about one-third participated in some kind of cash profit-sharing and one-fourth in gain-sharing (when workers get additional compensation based on improvement on a metric other than profits, like sales or customer satisfaction). An exemplar was Southwest Airlines, which paid $355 million of its more than $1 billion in corporate profits last year to union and nonunion workers and managers, on top of salaries.

Our research found that these programs, when combined with worker participation in solving problems, and increased training and job security, raise productivity and benefit workers. In every year, about half the winners in Fortune's list of 100 Best Companies to Work For have some type of broad-based profit or gain-sharing or stock ownership for regular workers. Google, Intel and Starbucks all have broad-based stock grants or options for their employees. Wegmans has profit-sharing. W. L. Gore, the maker of Gore-Tex, and Publix Super Markets, which operates in the Southeast, are owned by employee stock ownership plans, wherein a workers' trust typically borrows money to buy shares that are paid out of company revenues.

Some scholars have worried that employee-share ownership is too risky when workers buy the stock with their wages or 401(k) retirement savings; Enron is the classic example. We agree. We favor only ownership policies that emphasize grants of stock (as in the case of employee stock-ownership plans), restricted stock (which has to be held on to for a certain period of time, incentivizing workers to stay) or stock options.

How do we achieve this? First, the notion needs more powerful advocates from business and politics, like Mrs. Clinton. In New Jersey, lawmakers are finalizing legislation to expand tax incentives for small-business owners to sell their businesses to their employees and managers; Iowa has adopted similar legislation.

Second, we need to reform a little-known tax loophole, Section 162(m), of the Internal Revenue Code. In the early 1990s, in an attempt to reform executive pay, Congress changed that section to limit corporate income tax deductions to $1 million for the top five executive salaries, but allowed virtually unlimited deductions for a variety of top-executive performance-based pay, including equity and profit-sharing. Corporations, which have exploited this loophole to offer lavish compensation packages, should get these deductions only if they offer a profit-sharing or share-ownership plan to all employees.

Finally, all levels of government — federal, state and local — should offer incentives to companies that implement profit-sharing and employee-share ownership. Such incentives should include tax breaks, tax incentives and preference in the awarding of government contracts.

Spreading around profit-sharing and the ownership of capital is not the only answer to solving the challenge of soaring inequality in America, but it's a critical step that will help rather than hurt economic performance. If the middle class is to survive, we must move toward a more inclusive capitalism.

As Clinton Moves Further Left on Regulations, Jobs Go Away // The Fiscal Times // Diana Furchtgott-Roth – July 17, 2015

Hillary Clinton's support for rules classifying workers can do harm to the economic recovery.

It's no coincidence that in the space of a month, California declares Uber drivers to be employees, Hillary Clinton attacks the sharing economy, and the Labor Department issues guidelines on when to classify workers as employees, who are entitled to fringe benefits, or independent contractors, who are not.

What all three have in common is this: They are trying to stem the growth of independent contractors, the largest source of job growth in the United States, according to the American Staffing Association. California, Clinton and the Labor Department want companies to hire individuals as employees rather than as independent contractors. Although those people would get benefits as employees, their cash wages would decline.

According to the latest Employment Cost Index data published by the Labor Department, benefits make up 30 percent of compensation costs, and wages and salaries the remaining 70 percent. If independent contractors were reclassified as employees, their cash wages would decline and they would receive benefits such as health insurance, vacation, pension contributions and sick leave.

Someone who is earning $50,000 as an independent contractor might be paid about $35,000, plus fringe benefits, as an employee. Of course, as an independent contractor, he would owe the employer's share of Social Security and Medicare, $3,750, as well as the employee's share, the same amount. But he would have more cash in hand.

Some might value those benefits, but many others prefer to get more cash and to buy the benefits themselves.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Alternatively, some might get benefits through another working family member, and so cash might come in more useful.

Both the new Labor Department guidance and the proposed overtime revisions would reduce workplace flexibility, especially important to women and millennials, who want the freedom to work flexible hours in locations of their own choosing without having to punch a time clock.

The Obama administration wants to require employers to hire workers as employees because they prefer to have workers in an employer-employee relationship rather than in a contractor relationship. Forcing people into an employer-employee relationship gives the government more control over the workforce and more work to do, enforcing its regulations that apply to employees.

Take the Affordable Care Act, for instance. The Internal Revenue Service levies penalties on employers who do not offer the right kind of health insurance to their employees. Penalties are severe — $2,000 per worker per year for not offering the right kind of health insurance, $3,000 per worker who gets subsidies on the health-care exchanges and $36,500 per worker per year, effective this month, on employers who reimburse workers for their health-insurance premiums. Those penalties are not levied on workers who are independent contractors. More employees, more revenue for the IRS.

The new guidelines hit particularly hard those firms that contract out some tasks — such as payroll or janitorial services — to avoid hitting the 50-person limit at which the Obamacare penalties apply.

Then, take the Family and Medical Leave Act. Employers are required to give 13 weeks of unpaid leave annually to employees for maternity and paternity care, as well as for chronic illness. Independent contractors do not have to receive this leave. Nor do they have to receive any other kind of leave.

When workers are employees, rather than independent contractors, it is easier to force them to join unions against their will. The Supreme Court has just agreed to take the case of Rebecca Friedrichs vs the California Teachers Association, and decide whether Friedrichs has the right to opt out of paying agency fees to the union. More employees broaden the potential pool of union members, with higher potential revenue from dues. Unions are major contributors to Democratic political causes, so just follow the money.

The Labor Department ties itself up in knots with its new guidelines. It opens by saying that “misclassification of employees as independent contractors is found in an increasing number of workplaces in the United States,” but offers no statistical evidence for the claim. Nowhere does the department appear to be concerned with the reverse scenario — independent contractors being misclassified as employees.

Then, the department lists factors to help courts make the distinction between “whether the worker is economically dependent on the employer (and thus its employee) or is really in business for him or herself (and thus its independent contractor).” But this is a false distinction. Just because you are in business for yourself does not meanA that you are not economically dependent on your clients.

Lawyers, landscaping firms, defense contractors — they are all in business for themselves, but they are economically dependent on their clients for business.

The new guidelines add another layer of regulations to the enforcement pot. Different government agencies have different criteria for whether workers are independent contractors or employees. The Labor Department has a six-pronged test, the Internal Revenue Service has a 20-factor test, and antidiscrimination laws have their own common-law test. Plus, states have different criteria for unemployment, workers compensation, wage and hour rules, and state taxes. It is practically impossible for small businesses, which rarely have legal departments, to stay out of trouble.

But wait ... there’s an app for that. The law firm Littler Mendelson, working with Neota Logic, a technology company, has developed the ComplianceHR Independent Contractor application. That enables employers to enter data on characteristics of their workers and find out whether someone is supposed to be classified as an employee or an independent contractor. The app applies logic based on tests under federal and state law and analysis of 1,500 independent-contractor cases. It produces an answer based on questions from an online questionnaire.

Tammy McCutchen, a principal at Littler Mendelson, told me: “The administration is locked in a 1930s-era industrial economy and simply refuses to acknowledge that the 21st-century economy works differently. The law needs to reflect the reality of how the modern economy works.”

The reality is that the sharing economy is growing, no matter how hard Hillary Clinton, the state of California and the Labor Department try to stand in the way.

Over the past year or so, the Democratic Party has begun settling on a big new policy goal: beefing up family support programs. Now that ObamaCare has started the work of making health care available for all, support for children and parents is the major remaining hole in the U.S. safety net.

Though she has not yet released a formal proposal, Hillary Clinton has made family policy a centerpiece of her campaign, consistently positioning herself as a pro-family candidate. She focused sharply on the subject during her recent policy address, touting the benefits of sick leave and maternity leave, and the economic benefits of women in the workforce.

As I said, we don't know exactly what Clinton will advocate yet, but it's likely that her campaign will roughly follow the proposals coming out of the Center for American Progress (closely tied to both Clinton and the Democratic Party). In a recent paper, CAP analysts Heather Boushey and Alexandra Mitukiewicz outlined a maternity leave policy taken from Sen. Kirsten Gillibrand's FAMILY Act. It would create a new branch of the Social Security Administration and a small payroll tax increase to provide up to 60 days of paid family leave for parents.

A second plank of the policy is likely to be some kind of sick leave mandate in line with the proposed Healthy Families Act, which would require employers with more than 15 employees to provide one hour of sick leave for every 30 hours worked, up to a maximum requirement of seven full days per year. (Employers can always go higher if they want, of course!)

A third plank is likely to be some sort of quasi-universal pre-K program in line with Sen. Bob Casey's recent proposal.

All this is a good start, particularly in the design of the family leave program. Paid family leave should definitely be a social insurance benefit rather than an employer mandate. As Matt Yglesias explains, opting for the latter design (which resembles what the U.S. did with health insurance before ObamaCare) inevitably leaves out a great many workers, and then becomes nearly impossible to overhaul. It's critical to get the initial policy right, so further expansions are built on a sound foundation.

Sanders can provide three valuable additions (on top of what he's already proposed). First, he can simply aim higher. Sixty days of family leave isn't bad compared to the current zero, but it's pitiful compared to Sweden's 480 days (split between both parents, mostly as they like). America can easily afford 120 days or more, and Sanders ought to be planting his flag in aggressive territory. Instead of seven days of sick leave, 14. Instead of the smallbore pre-K program, a robust and fully universal one.

Second, he can add a universal child allowance. This can be achieved by folding all the various bizarre child tax credits and so forth into a single monthly allowance, distributed on a per-child basis until age 16. By scrapping parts of the welfare state that only benefit rich people, such as the mortgage interest deduction, it can be strengthened further. A $300 per month allowance, for example, would cut child poverty in half at a stroke.

Finally, and perhaps most importantly, Sanders can challenge Clinton's overall framework. Though she explicitly disavowed Jeb Bush's idea that Americans simply need to work more, she consistently valorized work throughout her recent address. She presented family programs as a way to keep women in the labor force, so as to produce more growth and economic output. She generally presented work, which appeared 57 times in the speech, as a major good in itself.

But while more jobs are surely a good goal in the short term, there are reasons to think that Americans actually work way too much. Matt Bruenig recently came up with a clever way to visualize this. As nations become richer, they generally choose to work less, since they can produce more with the same amount of work. In other words, most nations take some of the fruits of productivity growth in the form of leisure — but the U.S. has not.

Since 1970, America's GDP produced per hour has doubled, but we have cut average hours worked by only 6 percent. Compared to peer nations on the economic productivity ladder (like France, which cut its hours by 26 percent over that period), America does more unnecessary work than any other nation on Earth.

Just as Sanders challenged the primacy of economic growth, when all income gains are immediately sucked up by the 1 percent, he could challenge the idea of work as always and everywhere good.

This raises a deep question: What is the economy for? Not, one would hope, simply ratcheting up total GDP to make the number go higher. It turns out America is a very rich nation still flogging itself to work like a middle-income one. We can easily afford a great many more days off — all we need to do is make that choice.

Chattanooga Gunman Spent Time in Jordan, Official Says // NYT // Richard Fausset, Eric Schmitt and Richard Pére – July 17, 2015

CHATTANOOGA, Tenn. — Federal investigators on Friday began examining the background of the 24-year-old gunman who killed four Marines in an attack on two military sites here, going through his computer and cellphone and focusing on a seven-month trip he made last year to Jordan.

A senior intelligence official said that investigators, led by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, were trying to determine whether the gunman in the shooting rampage here Thursday, identified as Mohammod Youssuf Abdulazeez, had been in touch with any extremist groups in Jordan before or during the trip.

Edward W. Reinhold, the agent in charge of the F.B.I.'s Knoxville division, did not address specific trips abroad by Mr. Abdulazeez, but said at a news conference on Friday, "We are exploring all travel he has done, and we have asked our intelligence partners throughout the world to provide us with any information they may have as to travel and activities."

Before his stay in Jordan last year, Mr. Abdulazeez, who made the trip on an American passport, had traveled at least four other times to the country, said federal law enforcement officials, who were not authorized to speak about the investigation. He was in Jordan in the last weeks of 2005, in the summer of 2008, the summer of 2010 and the spring of 2013, officials said. Those stays ranged from two weeks to two months.

In 2013, he also spent some time in Canada, returning to the United States in May, these officials said. They offered no information about a reason for the trips.

"This attack raises several questions about whether he was directed by someone or whether there's enough propaganda out there to motivate him to do this," said the senior intelligence official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the investigation was still underway.

Federal agents took Mr. Abdulazeez's computer and cellphone back to Washington, to comb through them for evidence about who he had been in contact with, and about what.

Officials often look at international travel in terrorism cases because training in terrorist camps in Pakistan or Afghanistan has been seen as a crucial step in developing a plot. But a federal official said there was no indication that Mr. Abdulazeez's trips were connected with the plot, and the attack in Tennessee would have required no specialized training, he said.

"It would be premature to speculate on exactly why the shooter did what he did," Mr. Reinhold said. "However, we are conducting a thorough investigation to determine whether this person acted alone, was inspired or directed."

Authorities in Jordan said Mr. Abdulazeez traveled there last year to visit a maternal uncle, and the tiny, arid country — though squeezed into a volatile region, bordering Syria, Israel, Iraq and Saudi Arabia — is not considered a training ground for terrorism groups.

Jordan's monarchy heads the Arab world's most unflinchingly pro-American government and one of two that have standing peace treaties with Israel. Its security services are pervasive and their clampdowns on dissent played a role in keeping the country stable through the Arab Spring uprisings and the subsequent unrest that has rocked many Arab countries.

While Jordan has little internal militant activity, it is home to several prominent Qaeda-linked ideologues, and parts of the country are bastions of ultraconservative Islam. Abu Musbab Al-Zarqawi, who led Al Qaeda in Iraq before being killed in an American airstrike in 2006, hailed from the town of Zarqa, from which hundreds of young men have left more recently to join jihadists factions in Syria and Iraq.

Born in Kuwait in 1990, Mr. Abdulazeez became an American citizen in 2003 through the naturalization of his mother, federal officials said. Because he was a minor at the time, he did not have to apply separately for citizenship. When they came to live in the United States, both his mother and father were citizens of Jordan "of Palestinian descent," a law enforcement official said. His father is also a naturalized citizen.

Although counterterrorism officials had not been investigating Mr. Abdulazeez before Thursday's shooting, federal officials familiar with the inquiry said that his father had been investigated years ago for giving money to an organization with possible ties to terrorists.

Representative Michael McCaul, Republican of Texas, the chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, said the elder Mr. Abdulazeez had been put on a watch list preventing him from flying. “I believe there was a preliminary investigation,” Mr. McCaul said, “but there was no derogatory information, and he was taken off the list.”

In fact, father and son were able to travel together to Jordan in recent years, a law enforcement official said.

A United States official said that American intelligence officials were contacting authorities in Kuwait and Jordan to see if they had any information about the gunman, or whether he had been under surveillance or came up in any investigations while he was there.

The Defense Department said Friday that the general security level had not been raised at military installations around the country in the wake of the shooting, but that individual station commanders might take added precautions. In May, the military command raised the terrorism precaution level at its domestic installations to “threat condition alpha,” the lowest of four steps above normal, because of the general possibility of attacks inspired by the group calling itself the Islamic State, also known as ISIS or ISIL, and it has remained there.

Except for those assigned to police and security work, or engaged in certain kinds of exercises, military personnel generally are not armed when at military facilities. Reserve centers of the kind attacked Thursday, which provide training and other services, are sometimes on bases, but others, like the one in Chattanooga, stand alone, sometimes in places that are fairly public.

In addition, there are thousands of military recruiting offices in shopping centers and office parks, each staffed by only a handful of people, and those are especially vulnerable, said Brian Michael Jenkins, a security expert who is senior adviser to the president of the RAND Corporation.

“They’re supposed to be convenient; they’re supposed to be easily accessible,” Mr. Jenkins said. “They’re virtually no more protected than a shoe store in a shopping mall.”

“There have been continuing exhortations by both Al Qaeda and ISIL over the years to attack American military personnel, so if you were determined that that was your mission, then the most readily available, accessible, unprotected target is going to be a recruiting office,” he said.

The gunman fired on an armed services recruiting center here, and then, pursued by Chattanooga police officers, raced to a naval reserve facility and opened fire there. It was at the second location, a fenced-in campus with a building and a tree-lined parking lot, where the Marines and the gunman died.

“He did have at least two long guns,” meaning rifles or shotguns, “and he did have one handgun that we’re aware of,” the agent said, but he declined to be more specific. He said the gunman did not have body armor, but wore a vest with multiple ammunition magazines.

Mr. McCaul said he had been told that the gunman’s main weapon was an AK-47-style assault rifle.

Fred Fletcher, the Chattanooga police chief, said that when one of the first officers on the scene was shot in the ankle, the others there “put their hands on him, dragged him from the gunfire, and bravely returned fire.”

The separate rampages here were together the highest profile episode of violence at domestic military installations since April 2014, when three people were killed and more than a dozen wounded at Fort Hood, Tex. And the killings here came less than one month after another mass shooting, in which nine people were killed inside a church in Charleston, S.C.

After the shootings here Wednesday, the police in New York City ratcheted up security at military installations around the city. Officers with special weapons and training were deployed to those and other sensitive locations, said John J. Miller, the police department’s deputy commissioner of intelligence and counterterrorism.

About a dozen uniformed police officers stood outside the famed armed services recruitment center in the middle of Times Square on Friday, several of them carrying semiautomatic rifles and wearing helmets, and some with police dogs on leashes. These were members of “Hercules” teams, which are dispatched around the city to exhibit a show of force, often near landmarks or in busy commuter areas like Grand Central Terminal.

They were an incongruous presence on the busy pedestrian plaza, where tourists rested at bright red public tables or pulled rolling suitcases along the pavement. While some tourists stopped to have their pictures taken with people dressed as Elsa and Olaf from the movie “Frozen,” a steady stream of them also posed for photos showing them next to the heavily armed police.

The only run-in Mr. Abdulazeez had with local law enforcement appears to have been an April 20 arrest on a charge of driving while intoxicated, for which he posted a $2,000 bond, and was due to appear in Hamilton County court on July 30. The arrest record listed him as 6 feet tall and weighing 200 pounds.

According to a police affidavit filed in the case, officers spotted him weaving through downtown Chattanooga after 2 a.m., in a gray 2001 Toyota Camry, and when they pulled over, they smelled alcohol and marijuana, and he failed a field sobriety test. They said his eyes were bloodshot, his speech was slurred, he was “unsteady on his feet,” and he had “irritated nostrils and a white powdery substance/residue” under his nose, which Mr. Abdulazeez claimed came from snorting crushed caffeine pills.

3 states launch investigations of Planned Parenthood, which says senior official reprimanded // AP // David Crary – July 17, 2015

The governors of Georgia and Indiana and Ohio's attorney general on Thursday ordered investigations of Planned Parenthood facilities in their states to determine if organs from aborted fetuses were being sold.

The state investigations — as well as probes announced Wednesday by three Republican-led congressional committees — come in response to the release of an undercover video made by anti-abortion activists. The video shows Dr. Deborah Nucatola, Planned Parenthood's senior director of medical services, discussing procedures for providing fetal body parts to researchers.

Planned Parenthood officials said Thursday that Nucatola has been "reprimanded." They did not elaborate. The organization's president, Cecile Richards, apologized for the tone of some of Nucatola's recorded statements.

Nucatola is heard in the video referring to fetal hearts, lungs and livers and to efforts to retrieve these organs intact rather than crush them during an abortion procedure. She also is heard giving a range of monetary estimates for their procurement.

The commercial sale of fetal tissue is outlawed. Planned Parenthood, which provides abortions and other reproductive health services, says it legally helps women who want to make not-for-profit donations of their fetus' organs for scientific research.

According to Planned Parenthood, the monetary sums mentioned by Nucatola were for reimbursement of the clinics' costs in handling the tissue donations. "Nobody should be 'selling' tissue. That's just not the goal here," Nucatola says at one point.

The video, made covertly last year, was produced by the Irvine, California-based Center for Medical Progress, which released it with the support of several national anti-abortion organizations. It shows a lunchtime conversation between Nucatola and anti-abortion activists posing as potential buyers for a human biologics company.

On Thursday, GOP Govs. Nathan Deal in Georgia and Mike Pence in Indiana and GOP Attorney General Mike DeWine in Ohio ordered probes of Planned Parenthood clinics. DeWine said he'll investigate whether Planned Parenthood may have violated its nonprofit status and made money from the sale of fetal organs.

But in a video, Richards describes as "outrageous" the claims that Planned Parenthood clinics were breaking the law by selling fetal tissue for profit. "Our donation programs — like any other high-quality health care providers — follow all laws and ethical guidelines," she said.

However, she said some of Nucatola's remarks heard on the undercover video did not reflect Planned Parenthood's commitment to "compassionate care."

"This is unacceptable, and I personally apologize for the staff member's tone and statements," Richards said. "If there is any aspect of our work that can be strengthened, we want to know about it, and we take swift action to address it."

In Congress, House Speaker John Boehner said Planned Parenthood has embraced "gruesome practices" and he voiced skepticism at the suggestion that its procedures were legitimate.

"If you saw the video, it certainly didn't strike me that way," he said. "I could talk about the video, but I think I'd vomit ... It's disgusting."

Two Democratic congressmen, Reps. John Conyers of Michigan and Steve Cohen of Tennessee, criticized the launching of congressional investigations.

"House Leadership is using a sensationalist and heavily edited video as an opportunity to attack one of the nation's leading providers of high-quality health care for women," they said in a joint statement.

Dems float com promise linking Confederate flag to voting rights // The Hill // Mike Lillis – July 27, 2015

House Democrats are floating a legislative deal linking the thorny Confederate flag debate with expanded voting rights.

Republican leaders last week were forced to scrap a vote on an Interior Department spending bill — and suspend their appropriations schedule indefinitely — over a partisan disagreement about displaying the Confederate flag in national cemeteries.

Rep. James Clyburn (S.C.), the third-ranking House Democrat, said Thursday that Democratic leaders will drop their push to attach flag-related amendments to appropriations bills, freeing Republicans to pursue their spending agenda, if GOP leaders will agree to consider an update to the 1965 Voting Rights Act, a central part of which was gutted by the Supreme Court in 2013.

"I'm here to say to you that the members of the Congressional Black Caucus and the full Democratic Caucus are willing to sit down with the Speaker and work out a way for us to allow the proper display and utilization of ... the flag in certain instances if he would only sit down with us and work out an appropriate addressing of the amendments to the Voting Rights Act," Clyburn said during a press briefing in the Capitol.

"We believe that there's a proper place for all of us to honor our heritage, and nothing is more of a heritage to African-Americans than the right to vote."

The Democrats have been pushing a VRA update unsuccessfully for two years. With their new strategy, they're hoping the high-profile controversy surrounding the Confederate flag — which has only deepened since last month's racially charged killing of nine parishioners at an historic black church in Charleston, S.C. — will give them leverage in that fight.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) alluded to the Charleston massacre Thursday, suggesting that House Speaker John Boehner (R-Ohio) and other GOP leaders need to do more to address institutional racism than attend funerals in the wake of tragedies.

"There has been an opportunity for the Republican majority not just to send a condolence card or show up at a service but to translate that into action," Pelosi said. "And we are now segueing from the conversation about the flag to a conversation about voting rights now."

The voting rights issue has been under the spotlight since June of 2013, when the Supreme Court struck down a VRA formula defining which states required federal approval before changing their election procedures. The law had applied on a blanket basis to nine states — most of them in the South — with documented histories of racial discrimination.

Writing for the 5-4 majority, Chief Justice John Roberts argued that, while the federal government has the authority to monitor elections for fairness, the coverage formula is outdated and therefore unconstitutional. He invited Congress to update the parameters.

"Our country has changed," Roberts wrote, "and while any racial discrimination in voting is too much, Congress must ensure that the legislation it passes to remedy that problem speaks to current conditions."
The ruling has had immediate practical implications, as a number of conservative states — including Texas, North Carolina and Alabama — have since adopted stricter voting requirements that had been on hold under the old VRA.

Supporters of the tougher laws, which include new photo ID and proof-of-citizenship requirements, say they're necessary to fight voter fraud and ensure the integrity of the election process.

Critics counter that problems of fraud are exaggerated, and the tougher rules are just a Republican gambit to discourage minority and other vulnerable voters, who tend to side with the Democrats.

Rep. John Lewis (D-Ga.), who was savagely beaten during a landmark civil rights march that led directly to the VRA's passage in 1965, said Thursday that the tougher state requirements are a naked conspiracy to disenfranchise certain groups.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Across the country, there's a deliberate, systematic attempt to make it harder and more difficult for the disabled, students, seniors, minorities, the poor, and rural voters to participate in a democratic process," Lewis said. "We must not let that happen."

In February, Reps. Jim Sensenbrenner (R-Wis.), the former chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, and John Conyers (D-Mich.), the ranking member of the panel, introduced legislation to update the VRA's coverage formula. Lewis and Rep. Terri Sewell (D-Ala.) have introduced similar bills.

GOP leaders have declined to move the legislation, arguing that the current VRA offers sufficient voter protections — a message amplified by Judiciary Chairman Bob Goodlatte (R-Va.) in response to questions Thursday.

"While the Supreme Court struck down the old coverage formula that required certain states to pre-clear their voting rule changes with the federal government, the Court left in place other important tools in the Voting Rights Act, including the section that allows federal judges to place jurisdictions under a pre-clearance regime if those jurisdictions act in an unconstitutional and discriminatory manner," Goodlatte said in an email.

"So, strong remedies against unconstitutional voting discrimination remain in place today."

A GOP leadership aide noted only that, "Any action on the VRA would begin at the Judiciary Committee."

To Avoid Another Crash, Hillary Clinton Should Reinstate Glass-Steagall // Newsweek // Robert Reich – July 17, 2015

Hillary Clinton won't propose reinstating a bank breakup law known as the Glass-Steagall Act—at least according to Alan Blinder, an economist who has been advising Clinton's campaign. "You're not going to see Glass-Steagall," Blinder said after her economic speech on July 13 in which she failed to mention it. Blinder said he had spoken to Clinton directly about Glass-Steagall.

This is a big mistake.

It's a mistake politically because people who believe Hillary Clinton is still too close to Wall Street will not be reassured by her position on Glass-Steagall. Many will recall that her husband led the way to repealing Glass-Steagall in 1999 at the request of the big Wall Street banks.

It's a big mistake economically because the repeal of Glass-Steagall led directly to the 2008 Wall Street crash, and without it we're in danger of another one.

Some background: During the Roaring '20s, so much money could be made by speculating on shares of stock that several big Wall Street banks began selling stock alongside their traditional banking services—taking in deposits and making loans.

Some banks went further, lending to pools of speculators that used the money to pump up share prices. The banks sold the shares to their customers, only to have the share prices collapse when the speculators dumped them.

For the banks, it was an egregious but hugely profitable conflict of interest.

After the entire stock market crashed in 1929, ushering in the Great Depression, Washington needed to restore the public's faith in the banking system. One step was for Congress to enact legislation insuring commercial deposits against bank losses.

Another was to prevent the kinds of conflicts of interest that resulted in such losses, and which had fueled the boom and subsequent bust. Under the Glass-Steagall Act of 1933, banks couldn't both gamble in the market and also take in deposits and make loans. They'd have to choose between the two.

"The idea is pretty simple behind this one," Senator Elizabeth Warren said a few days ago, explaining her bill to resurrect Glass-Steagall. "If banks want to engage in high-risk trading, they can go for it, but they can't get access to ensured deposits and put the taxpayers on the hook for that reason."

For more than six decades after 1933, Glass-Steagall worked exactly as intended. During that long interval, few banks failed and no financial panic endangered the banking system.

But the big Wall Street banks weren't content. They wanted bigger profits. They thought they could make far more money by gambling with commercial deposits. So they set out to whittle down Glass-Steagall.

Finally, in 1999, President Bill Clinton struck a deal with Republican Senator Phil Gramm to do exactly what Wall Street wanted, and repeal Glass-Steagall altogether.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

What happened next? An almost exact replay of the Roaring '20s. Once again, banks originated fraudulent loans and sold them to their customers in the form of securities. Once again, there was a huge conflict of interest that finally resulted in a banking crisis.

This time, the banks were bailed out, but millions of Americans lost their savings, their jobs, even their homes.

A personal note. I worked for Bill Clinton as secretary of labor, and I believe most of his economic policies were sound. But during those years, I was in a fairly continuous battle with some other of his advisers who seemed determined to do Wall Street's bidding.

On Glass-Steagall, they clearly won.

To this day, some Wall Street apologists argue Glass-Steagall wouldn't have prevented the 2008 crisis because the real culprits were nonbanks like Lehman Brothers and Bear Stearns.

Baloney. These non-banks got their funding from the big banks in the form of lines of credit, mortgages and repurchase agreements. If the big banks hadn't provided them the money, the nonbanks wouldn't have got into trouble.

And why were the banks able to give them easy credit on bad collateral? Because Glass-Steagall was gone.

Other apologists for Wall Street blame the crisis on unscrupulous mortgage brokers.

Surely mortgage brokers do share some of the responsibility. But here again, the big banks were accessories and enablers.

The mortgage brokers couldn't have funded the mortgage loans if the banks hadn't bought them. And the big banks couldn't have bought them if Glass-Steagall were still in place.

I've also heard bank executives claim there's no reason to resurrect Glass-Steagall because none of the big banks actually failed.

This is like arguing lifeguards are no longer necessary at beaches where no one has drowned. It ignores the fact that the big banks were bailed out. If the government hadn't thrown them lifelines, many would have gone under.

Remember? Their balance sheets were full of junky paper, nonperforming loans and worthless derivatives. They were bailed out because they were too big to fail. And the reason for resurrecting Glass-Steagall is we don't want to go through that ever again.

As George Santayana famously quipped, those who cannot remember the past are condemned to repeat it. In the Roaring 2000s, just as in the Roaring '20s, America's big banks used insured deposits to underwrite their gambling in private securities and then dumped the securities on their customers.

It ended badly.

This is precisely what the Glass-Steagall Act was designed to prevent—and did prevent for over six decades.

Hillary Clinton, of all people, should remember.

Chattanooga shooting renews debate over military gun-free zones // NY Daily News – July 17, 2015

The image shows a stark contrast: the front window of a military recruiting center riddled with bullet holes. Jutting out from behind the shattered glass, a poster: Firearms prohibited in this facility.

That photograph from Chattanooga, Tenn., where four unarmed Marines were gunned down, has launched a political debate over the merit of a federal policy limiting guns at military facilities.

Since 1993, weapons have been banned at recruiting centers. Only military police can carry weapons at military bases and reserves centers.

Gun-free zones were launched to reduce the use of deadly force unless absolutely necessary at military facilities, according to the 1992 directive under President George H.W. Bush. The policy was modified under President Bill Clinton a year later.

"We go by that policy. Right now it is a political discussion, but we don't get into the political discussions," Kelli

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bland, public affairs chief for the U.S. Army Recruiting Command Center, told the Daily News Friday.

Gen. Ray Odierno, chief of staff of the Army, pledged to review security procedures at military bases and recruiting centers Friday. He did not detail what will happen to gun-free zones.

Gun-rights supporters argue lives could have been saved if soldiers were permitted to have weapons.

Donald Trump was one of the first to ridicule the policy after the shooting, calling for the end of gun-free zones.

"The four great marines who were just shot never had a chance," the bombastic presidential candidate wrote on Twitter. "They were highly trained but helpless without guns."

Trump's voice was one in a cacophony of gun-rights supporters claiming soldiers could stop mass shooters in their tracks if they were allowed to pack heat — a point debated after shootings at Fort Hood in 2009 and the Washington Navy Yard in 2013.

Even if soldiers couldn't have ended Muhammed Youssef Abdulazeez's attack as he ambushed them from a car, the sight of weapons could have deterred him, John R. Lott Jr., president of the Crime Prevention Research Center, told The News.

"Even just the threat of somebody pointing a gun will get them to stop the attacks," Lott said. "Without having to fire a gun, you could distract a killer, who may have to go and look for cover himself."

Military police often can't respond to an attack instantly, and those few minutes could mean the difference in how many people survive, Lott said.

The gun-free policy also makes military facilities bigger targets, he said.

"It's explicit these attackers go and pick places where victims aren't able to go and defend themselves," Lott said.

Lott pointed to the notebooks of Aurora theater shooter James Holmes, which showed he plotted his target after weeding through places with light security.

Recruiting centers don't allow weapons because they need to be "welcoming," Bland said.

"They are in public spaces. Applicants need to feel comfortable," she said. "They're not there to get a rehearsal to join the Army."

Bland noted soldiers are trained "when it comes to active shooter scenarios," regularly receiving guidance on safety procedures. She declined to detail what the specific protection measures are.

Dan Gross, the president of the Brady Campaign against Gun Violence, said the group "will leave it to the military to review their safety procedures at bases and recruitment facilities in consultation with law enforcement."

"This is a very unsettling time for the brave men and women who serve in the military and law enforcement, as well as their families," Gross said.

ISIS Has Fired Chemical Mortar Shells, Evidence Indicates // NYT // C. J. Chivers – July 17, 2015

The Islamic State appears to have manufactured rudimentary chemical warfare shells and attacked Kurdish positions in Iraq and Syria with them as many as three times in recent weeks, according to field investigators, Kurdish officials and a Western ordnance disposal technician who examined the incidents and recovered one of the shells.

The development, which the investigators said involved toxic industrial or agricultural chemicals repurposed as weapons, signaled a potential escalation of the group's capabilities, though it was not entirely without precedent.

Beginning more than a decade ago, Sunni militants in Iraq have occasionally used chlorine or old chemical warfare shells in makeshift bombs against American and Iraqi government forces. And Kurdish forces have claimed that militants affiliated with the Islamic State, also known as ISIS or ISIL, used a chlorine-based chemical in at least one suicide truck bomb in Iraq this year.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Firing chemical mortar shells across distances, however, as opposed to dispersing toxic chemicals via truck bombs or stationary devices, would be a new tactic for the group, and would require its munitions makers to overcome a significantly more difficult technical challenge.

Chemical weapons, internationally condemned and banned in most of the world, are often less lethal than conventional munitions, including when used in improvised fashion. But they are indiscriminate by nature and difficult to defend against without specialized equipment — traits that lend them potent psychological and political effects.

In the clearest recent incident, a 120-millimeter chemical mortar shell struck sandbag fortifications at a Kurdish military position near Mosul Dam on June 21 or 22, the investigators said, and caused several Kurdish fighters near where it landed to become ill.

The shell did not explode and was recovered nearly intact on June 29 by Gregory Robin, a former French military ordnance disposal technician who now works for Sahan Research, a think tank partnered with Conflict Armament Research, a private organization that has been documenting and tracing weapons used in the conflict. Both research groups are registered in Britain.

The tail of the shell had been broken, Mr. Robin said by telephone on Friday, and was leaking a liquid that emanated a powerful odor of chlorine and caused irritation to the airways and eyes.

It was the first time, according to Mr. Robin and James Bevan, the director of Conflict Armament Research, that such a shell had been found in the conflict.

In an internal report to the Kurdish government in Iraq, the research groups noted that the mortar shell appeared to have been manufactured in an “ISIS workshop by casting iron into mold method. The mortar contains a warhead filled with a chemical agent, most probably chlorine.”

Conflict Armament Research and Sahan Research often work with the Kurdistan Region Security Council. Mr. Robin and Mr. Bevan said the council had contracted a laboratory to analyze residue samples removed from the weapon.

“Soon we should have an exact composition of the chemical in this projectile, but I am certain it is chlorine,” Mr. Robin said.

He added, “What I don’t know is what kind of burster charge it had,” referring to the small explosive charge intended to break open the shell and distribute its liquid contents. The shell had not exploded, he said, because, inexplicably, it did not contain a fuse.

Whether any finding from tests underwritten by Kurdish authorities would be internationally recognized is uncertain, as the Kurdish forces are party to the conflict.

The week after Mr. Robin collected the shell, on July 6, another investigator found evidence that the research groups said indicated two separate attacks with chemical projectiles in Kurdish territory in the northeastern corner of Syria.

Those attacks, at Tel Brak and Hasakah, occurred in late June and appeared to involve shells or small rockets containing an industrial chemical sometimes used as a pesticide, the investigators said.

In the incidents in Syria, Mr. Bevan said, multiple shells struck in agricultural fields near three buildings used by Kurdish militia forces known as the Y.P.G., or Peoples Protection Units, in Tel Brak. More shells, he said, landed in civilian areas in Hasakah; at least one struck a civilian home.

Late on Friday, the Y.P.G. released a statement denouncing what it called “criminal actions” and said that in the last four weeks its forces had captured gas masks from Islamic State fighters.

The attacks at Tel Brak sickened 12 Y.P.G. fighters, who suffered many symptoms, including headaches, breathing difficulties, nausea, vomiting, eye irritation, disorientation, temporary paralysis and, in some cases, loss of consciousness, said a Western investigator for Conflict Armament Research who asked that his name be withheld for security reasons.

The investigator said he examined two impact craters at Tel Brak and also a hole in a reinforced concrete wall at Hasakah where the munitions had landed. The odor, he said, was strong, unfamiliar and soon became a painful irritant.

“It smelled like a spicy onion smell,” he said. “It was strange; it wasn’t something I could put my finger on immediately.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He added, “We were there for perhaps 30 seconds when it started burning the nose; more than 90 seconds and the throat started to burn.”

Based on laboratory results provided by Kurdish medical officials in Qamishli, where the afflicted fighters were treated and tested, the research groups said they tentatively concluded that the shells contained phosphine, a chemical sometimes used to fumigate stored grains.

A document from the medical authorities, translated by The New York Times, referred to the laboratory tests but did not describe their methodology or show specific results.

Mr. Bevan also noted that tests so far were not conclusive.

No direct samples of the substance in the shells had been independently gathered, he said, in part because the field investigator, who did not have chemical protective equipment, experienced the onset of symptoms while working near the impact craters and had to leave the area.

Some of the shells’ characteristics from the incidents in Syria, based on photographs of the fragments, did not appear consistent with chemical weapons, including that the shell walls appeared to be thick; chemical weapons often have thinner metal skins than weapons designed to fragment.

But both Mr. Robin and the field investigator said it was possible that the attacks were tests of new weapons from the Islamic State’s makeshift munitions production lines.

The field investigator noted that at Tel Brak, the Kurdish fighters pulled back from the front-line positions after the attack, and that their former squad-sized outpost was now an observation post with fewer fighters.

“My guess is that this is going to happen again,” he said, “because it was effective.”

In an internal report provided to Kurdish officials in Syria, the two research groups recommended that Kurdish forces improve their readiness for chemical warfare incidents.

Kurdish forces “require immediate training and equipment to identify and counter chemical IED threats,” the report noted, using the acronym for improvised explosive device. It continued: “This capacity will be fundamental in maintaining civilian confidence, given the enhanced psychological impact of chemical weapon use.”

U.S. Sought ‘El Chapo’ Extradition Before Escape // NYT // Azam Ahmed – July 17, 2015

Less than three weeks before Joaquín Guzmán Loera, the infamous drug kingpin known as El Chapo, escaped from Mexico’s highest security prison, the United States issued a formal request for his extradition, according to a statement by the Mexican attorney general late Thursday night.

The request, issued on June 25, was made public after testimony by the attorney general, Arely Gómez González, before senators and representatives of the country, raising fresh questions about the relationship between the two nations.

The United States government has been frustrated by the Mexican authorities, who have delayed a decision on whether to accept an American offer of unconditional support to track down Mr. Guzmán — including the use of drones, advanced intelligence equipment and a special task force.

Long before the escape, Mexican officials also appeared resistant to the idea of extraditing Mr. Guzmán, who faces indictments in at least seven American federal courts on charges that include narcotics trafficking and murder. In October, a new indictment in Federal District Court in Brooklyn linked him and his associates to hundreds of acts of murder, assault, kidnapping and torture.

But the Mexican government indicated it would keep the prisoner in its custody, wanting to prosecute and imprison Mr. Guzmán in what many viewed as a show of sovereignty. In January, Mexico’s previous attorney general, Jesús Murillo Karam, suggested that Mr. Guzmán would never serve time in the United States.

“El Chapo must stay here to complete his sentence, and then I will extradite him,” Mr. Murillo Karam was quoted as saying at the time. “So about 300 or 400 years later — it will be a while.”

Mr. Guzmán escaped from prison on the night of July 11, using a mile-long tunnel burrowed into the floor of his bathroom that experts says took more than a year to dig.

The Mexican government has struggled to explain how Mr. Guzmán managed to pull off such an elaborate prison break from what was meant to be the country's most secure facility. The Mexican president, Enrique Peña Nieto, said last year following the drug lord's arrest that losing him again — Mr. Guzmán had escaped Mexican custody once before — would be unforgivable.

Whether Mr. Guzmán had been warned about the American extradition request, or whether that had any influence on the timing of his escape, is unclear. Extraditions can take years to occur.

The Americans did not formally request the extradition of Mr. Guzmán after his arrest in February 2014, an operation conducted by Mexican forces with American help.

It is unclear why, nearly a year and a half later, the American government decided to formally request Mr. Guzmán's extradition.

"It is the practice of the United States to seek extradition whenever defendants subject to U.S. charges are apprehended in another country," said Peter Carr, a Justice Department spokesman.

The statement from the Mexican attorney general's office indicated that Ms. Gómez González gave orders for her office to review the extradition request to ensure that it complied with all legal requirements and then submit them to the nation's Justice Department for consideration.

Blast from the Past:
Riddle: If McCain is "all of the above" with offshore drilling, nuclear, clean coal, and wind, tide and solar, but he's not for wind, tide and solar; what's he for?
JOHN MCCAIN: "When you say wind solar and tide, most every expert that I know says that, if you maximize that in every possible way, the contribution that that would make given the present state of technology is very small, is very small. It's not a large contribution. It's wonderful, it's great to have it, I encourage it everywhere. I hope everyone will, for Christmas, buy their family a solar panel. But, that would be exciting. But they, but, I'd be glad to send you the figures that there's the amount of--even if we gave it the absolute maximum, uh, wind, solar and tide, uh, etc. The clean tech - the truly clean technologies don't work."

VIDEO with FULL TRANSCRIPTS
McCain: Gitmo "May Be One of The Nicest Places In the World To Live In"
WALTER ISAACSON: Are you historically in favor of closing Guantanamo?

JOHN MCCAIN: Yes I am. [...] So I'm for closing Guantanamo Bay because it's become a symbol. It, it may be one of the nicest places in the world to live in, but it has become a symbol and we need to close Guantanamo.

ISAACSON: Then why were you so furious at the Supreme Court decision saying that they had the rights to appeal to courts?

MCCAIN: Because I think they have certain rights. And I think we've just seen in this most recent case that the process can move forward. And it's years too late, and the process should have moved forward. And I wasn't happy, frankly, with the decision. [...] From what the evidence that I had, he probably should've spent more time in prison. But we had a system set up [...] There's a tradition for that--the Nuremberg trials and other war crimes trials--where they're given a trial and a judicial proceeding but it is not all of the rights that are guaranteed American citizens. Because under the Geneva Conventions, they are defined as illegal combatants.

MCCAIN: I think what the Supreme Court said was that they deserve certain rights, and, actually, also wanted to go back to Congress for more clarification in their decision.

ISAACSON: But you called that the worst decision in history?

JOHN MCCAIN: No I didn't. No, no-- Sometimes I'm given to a little hyperbole as you--

ISAACSON: Ok, Ok, I'll let you off the hook then.

MCCAIN: --As you, as you've already noticed. I thought it was a bad decision. But I also think we can fix it, and I think we may have been able to prove to the courts, if we can move forward with these judicial proceedings--which some in the media described as a "blow to the Bush administration" because it was a light sentence. I thought it was justice. And so I hope we can move forward with more trials and that way convince the Court. [...] I do believe that the Court voiced frustration in their decision that we hadn't moved forward with these cases, that here these people had been sitting in a prison for five, six, whatever number of years that it's been. And I hope we can show the courts that by moving forward with this process that we can--and maybe with additional legislation, in a bipartisan nature for a change--we can fix this problem.

McCain: Social Security "Isn't That Complicated!"
McCain: Social Security "Isn't That Complicated!"
WALTER ISAACSON: This is the 73rd anniversary of Social Security... you called the funding mechanism a disgrace recently. How would you change it?

JOHN MCCAIN: ... It's a pay as you go system. [...] As you know, we have the trustees of the Social Security system. And they are the people appointed to give us an evaluation every year of the condition of Social Security [...] and the trustees have stated repeatedly, and David Walker, who now works for the coalition, who was once head of the government accountability office, I think is the best talking about this. There's gonna come a time, and there's argument about when that year is, but it's not that far away. When there's more money goin out than comin in. And when there's no money left. [...] The situation today is that younger workers who are contributing to the system, the way it was designed, will not receive the same benefits as present day retirees. That's not fair. [...] [...] Congress is at a gridlock on everything [...] One of our earliest memories was 1983, Ronald Reagan and Tip O'Neil, the liberal Democrat from Massachusetts,[...] And Ronald Reagan sat down together with the benefit of a Greenspan study. And they said "Okay, we're gonna fix social security." And they walked out in the rose garden, stood next to each other. Now it may not have been the solution that I wanted, [...] or anyone else, but it was a solution, and we saved Social Security for about 25 or 30 years. It was about to go bankrupt. Now, why can't we do that again? [...] It isn't that complicated. A little straight talk. Medicare is complicated, my friends, it's a complex issue, credibly complex. Social security- there have been study after study after study. And we have to do this.

ISAACSON: But shouldn't it be like the energy policy, where everything is on the table, we do a little of everything?

MCCAIN: Yes, and as you know, I am opposed to tax increases [...] I think we can fix this without it. And I am confident that I can convince the people on the other side of the table that we do not need tax increases.

ISAACSON: […] Does that mean tax increases, though, are on the table? I'll do the follow-up. You opened it up. You gotta put it on the table in order to argue against it.

MCCAIN: I have to be against tax increases, as you know. Just as people go in with positions. Anyway.

WALTER ISAACSON: [...] Tom Friedman's column mentioned that you haven't been there supporting the tax breaks that need to be extended for wind and solar. Do you support those breaks, and will you keep pushing for--will you push for it at some point?

JOHN MCCAIN: Yes, and I have, and I have a long record of that support of alternate energy. [...] I've always been for all of those and I have not missed any crucial vote. But my citizens in Arizona know that when I'm running for the President of the United States I have to be out campaigning. [...]

Alzheimer's McCain?: "In the 21st century, nations don't invade other nations":
QUESTIONER: [...] You said that heightened security for the Baltic states and Poland might be in order. Can you talk a little bit more about what shape that might take?

JOHN MCCAIN: Well, [pauses] when I say that I, I think that we need to make sure that our NATO allies are work closely with us. I think it's important that everyone recognize throughout the world that in the NATO alliance, an attack on one is viewed as an attack on all. But I, I don't think we're gonna reignite the Cold War here with Russia. I think this is a very serious situation. But I don't see this as a return to nuclear standoffs, et cetera et cetera. I want to have a dialogue with the Russians, I want them to get out of Georgian territory as quickly as possible. And I am interested in good relations between the United States and Russia. But in the 21st century, nations don't invade other nations. And we, we will decide in subsequent days as whether degree of provocation and what, who was right and who was wrong. But you cannot justify the extent and the degree of the Russian intervention in Georgia. [...] So my point is that all of us show solidarity together and do whatever we can to make sure that behavior in the 21st century is one of respect for the sovereignty and independence of nations. And that includes the country of Georgia. That's what I meant by that in my response. Yes, sir. Yes, maam.

McCain Says "We've Never Had a Serious Accident" On a Nuclear Sub, Brushes Off Three Mile Island and Chernobyl
JOHN MCCAIN: I want to say a word about nuclear to you. And I'm very familiar with Three Mile Island, and I'm very familiar with Chernobyl. But I'm also familiar, as I hope you are too, that we've been sailing Navy ships around the world for 60 years with nuclear power plants on them, and we've never had an accident. We've never had a serious accident! So we need to store spent nuclear fuel, and we need to reprocess.

[...] You know, you pick up the paper and you listen to these various pundits and all that, and they says we can't solve the nuclear problem, we can't reprocess, we can't store it; we can't develop a electric car that'll take someone 200 miles or 100 miles before you have to plug it in. We can't. Everybody's saying we can't. That's not America! America's a country that has met and overcome every challenge we have ever faced, and we can do this one. We have the ability, innovation and the technology that we will become independent of foreign oil.

McCain Says "I Will Bring the Peace," We Will Be "Largely Out" Of Iraq In Four Years
QUESTIONER: For those of us who are headed into military service, how will our benefits look for the next four years?

JOHN MCCAIN: Pardon me?

QUESTIONER: For those of us headed into military service . . . how are things going to look for us for the next four years?

MCCAIN: . . . in the end of the next four years we will be largely out of Iraq and we will be out because we have won [cheers] not because of a date for withdrawal. We will have won in Iraq [ovation becomes standing]. But that withdrawal will be based on conditions on the ground, not according to a set date for withdrawal [applause]. That's the important point here.

MCCAIN: Now, one of the big differences between myself and Sen. Obama is that Sen. Obama said the surge wouldn't work, voted not to fund the men and women who were serving and fighting over there. He said it wouldn't work, couldn't work and incredibly, still fails to acknowledge that the surge succeeded. Remarkable. And, he hadn't been there in over 900 days. And he gave a speech announcing his policy before he left. Before he left. That's hard to believe. [grumbling] So, there is a significant difference between myself and Sen. Obama. He wanted us out by last March, his original plan. The surge has succeeded. Gen David Petraeus is one of the great military leaders in history [applause]. [...] And finally, let me say again, we have succeeded. It's not 'we are succeeding'-- we have succeeded and we are winning. And we have other challenges. And my friends, if we had had this conversation two weeks ago, we probably wouldn't have consumed the beginning of our conversation about a little country that most Americans had never heard of. My point is, we live in a dangerous world, we live in a world where we're not sure what's going to happen around in the future and it's hard to see around the corner of history. But, I have been in wars, I know how to win wars, I hate war, no one hates war more than the veteran because no one feels more keenly the loss of a comrade than the veteran. So I will, at the end of four years, bring the peace. Bring the peace to America. Thank you.

McCain Flips, Now Says Gas Prices Will Not Decrease, Due To Demand From India And China
QUESTIONER: Well, I just had a question about the mass transit in this country like high-speed rail, electric, this kind of stuff that families could use to commute east and west, north and south and do it cheaply.

JOHN MCCAIN: "[...] I think what you're doing here [at GE] is a natural extension of what you're going to see as an explosion of mass transit in America. Yeah. I can't tell you that I think the price of a barrel of oil is gonna come down dramatically. I'm happy to see, as you are, that it's come down some recently, but, to somehow think that the price of a barrel of oil is gonna be very inexpensive again, ignores the reality of two major economies--China and India--that are also competing for a finite resource. I mean, it's just a fundamental of economics and so I think that mass transit is gonna be a very, very big factor. A lot of the cities are doing it.

McCain Warns "Important Strategic Interests At Stake In Georgia" Like the BTC Pipeline
JOHN MCCAIN: "We have other important strategic interests at stake in Georgia, especially the continued flow of oil through the Baku-Tblisi-Ceyhan pipeline, which Russia attempted to bomb in recent days; the operation of a critical communication and trade route from Georgia through Azerbaijan and Central Asia; and the integrity and influence of NATO, whose members reaffirmed last April the territorial integrity, independence, and sovereignty of Georgia."

McCain Spends 7 Minutes Explaining Situation in Georgia at PA Town Hall:
JOHN MCCAIN: I want to speak briefly to your about the issues that are at stake in this election and about the events that took place this week. And we have to be serious for a few minutes [...] as you know, over the past several days, we have seen that international aggression is tragically not a thing of the past. We thought we'd put a lot of that behind us in the 20th century but we see it rearing its ugly head in the 21st. The small nation of Georgia has been subject to Russian attacks that threaten its very existence. Americans [...] may wonder where Georgia is, or why we should care [...] it's after all a small and remote and obscure place but history is often made in remote, obscure places [...] Georgia itself, my friends, has a long and remarkable history [...] it's been part of the grand sweep that compromises western civilization [...] their history hasn't been easy. Through the centuries, it's seen invasions and attacks [...] the were part of the Soviet Union [...] and were able to achieve their independence when the Soviet Union disintegrated [...] they're at a strategic crossroads. There's a pipeline, an oil pipeline, Baku-Tblisi and Ceyhan. It brings oil from the Caspian to points west and traverses Georgia. That's the very pipeline that the Russians tried to bomb. And I don't have to tell you about the price of oil and disruption of oil supplies. In this country, it's that little country, a country's territorial independence, integrity and sovereignty, NATO countries reaffirmed at their summit in April that terrible violence has occurred. On Friday, Russian tanks and troops moved through the Roki Tunnel, across an international recognized border and into the Georgian province of South Ossetia. Two years ago, I traveled to South Ossetia, my friends, and we went through this barricade [...] there was this huge billboard and it said, "Vladmir Putin, our president." Have no doubt about Russian ambitions in this area. The Russian government stated it was acting only to protect Ossetians and yet on Saturday, it's bombing campaign encompassed the whole of Georgia [...] yesterday, before the weekend ended, Russian troops drove the Georgians out of South Ossetia and stepped up their offensive in the region of "Kabkazia" [Abkhazia]. Abkhazia is another area that the Russians have controlled in violation of Georgian territorial integrity and Georgia asked for a cease fire and Russia responded by bombing the Tblisi airport [...] in 2006, I visted Senaki and reviewed the Georgian troops who had served with honor beside American soldiers in Iraq [...] President Medvedev has stated he has halted the offensive but reports indicate that Russian military forces have continued attacks [...] Foreign Minister Lavrov announced that Russia seeks regime change in Georgia [...] it's the responsibility of the leading nations of the world to ensure that history continues to reform and make progress towards respecting the values and security of all free people. This is the situation in Georgia as we meet here [...] the impact of Russian actions goes beyond their threat to a Democratic Georgia. Russia has used violence against Georgia to send a signal to any country that chooses to assciate with the west and aspire to our shared political and economic values. My friends, we learned at great cost the price of allowing aggression against free nations to go unchecked [...] we must stand in united purpose to ask the Russian government to withdraw its troops from Georgia. There must be an independent, international, peacekeeping force in the separatist regions [...] and we must make clear to Russia leaders that the benefit they enjoy from being part of the civilized world require their respect for the value of stability and peace for that world. [applause] [...] I know from speaking this morning to the President of Georgia [...] who I have known for many years, that he knows that the thoughts and prayers and support of the American people are with that brave little nation [...] he wanted me to say thank you to you [...] [applause] [...] I told him I know I speak for every American when I told him that today, we are all Georgians. [applause] [...] the energy crisis that we're in derives in part from the fact that we get much of our energy from that part of the world. The small nation of Georgia has an oil pipeline that delivers oil from the Caspian sea to other markets [...] another reminder that we get serious about our energy crisis and stop sending $700 billion a year overseas [applause] to countries that don't like us very much and stop this massive transfer of wealth. [standing ovation]

McPander Tells GE Crowd He Will "Do Everything In [His] Power" To Get A New Amtrak Order AUDIENCE MEMBER: We could use another Amtrak order.

JOHN MCCAIN: Another Amtrak order. Yessir. We'll--I will do everything in my power [laughter from the audience] because I would like to tell you that, in all due respect, to the airlines, if you're trying to get from our nation's capitol to New York City, as happens to me quite frequently, and you have to try to get on the shuttle, if there's a could in the sky, it's very likely that it's gonna be a long time about sometimes for many, many hours. Our air traffic control system, as you know, is broken and it's gotta be fixed. It just has to be fixed.

So I believe that you're gonna see Amtrak and the Acela, before its time, was a good technological step forward. Now it's time for another one. Now it's time for another one.

McCain: Both Candidates "Pledge To End This War And Bring Our Troops Home... I Intend To Win It First"
JOHN MCCAIN: Though victory in Iraq is finally in sight, a great deal still depends on the decisions and good judgment of the next president. The hard-won gains of our troops hang in the balance. The lasting advantage of a peaceful and democratic ally in the heart of the Middle East could still be squandered by hasty withdrawal and arbitrary timelines. And this is one of many problems in the shifting positions of my opponent, Senator Obama.

With just three months to go before the election, a lot of folks are still trying to square Senator Obama's varying positions on the surge in Iraq. First, he opposed the surge. Then he confidently predicted that it would fail. Then he tried to prevent funding for the troops who carried out the surge. Not content to merely predict failure in Iraq, my opponent tried to legislate failure. This was back when supporting America's efforts in Iraq entailed serious political risk. It was a clarifying moment. It was a moment when political self-interest and the national interest parted ways. For my part, with so much in the balance, it was an easy call. As I said at the time, I would rather lose an election than lose a war.

Thanks to the courage and sacrifice of our soldiers, sailors, airmen, and Marines and to brave Iraqi fighters the surge has succeeded. And yet Senator Obama still can't quite bring himself to admit his own failure in judgment. Instead, he commits the greater error of insisting that even in hindsight, he would oppose the surge. Even in retrospect, he would choose the path of retreat and failure for America over the path of success and victory. Behind all of these claims and positions by Senator Obama lies the ambition to be president. What's missing is the judgment to be commander in chief.

In short, both candidates in this election pledge to end this war and bring our troops home. The great difference is that I intend to win it first.(Speech; Las Vegas, NV 08/09/08)

Dear Jake,

But I am very concerned that a complete embrace of this deal, without any expression of reservations, will leave her open to serious attack not just from Republicans, but from many Democrats, and from many of the key signatories of the Washington Institute letter, including Howard Berman, Dennis Ross, and people whose opinions on nuclear issues one needs to respect, like Robert Einhorn, and other non-proliferation experts like David Albright. She can certainly make clear her opposition to Congress overturning the deal, which would weaken the President greatly.

Best wishes,

I took some of your concepts but left out the specifics.

The deal between six world powers and Iran offers the best path forward to prevent Iran from acquiring a nuclear weapon, despite its deficiencies. With vigorous enforcement, unyielding verification, and swift consequences for any violations, this deal will make the United States, Israel, and the region safer and more secure. I applaud President Obama and Secretary Kerry for this important accomplishment.

[I would have preferred an agreement that provided access to all of Iran's nuclear sites, including its military facilities; that allowed the IAEA inspectors the opportunity to interview all people they believe necessary to establish Iran's past and ongoing Possible Military Dimensions; and that sequenced sanctions relief to documented performance of Iran's obligations. However, this agreement is better than no deal at all, which would leave Iran the unfettered opportunity to a full-scale march to a nuclear weapon, without any of the constraints of this agreement in place.]

As President, I would use every tool in our arsenal to compel rigorous Iranian compliance. Neither Iran nor any other country would have a veto over our enforcement. And I would never permit Iran to interpret this deal to allow it to evade its obligations to the IAEA or to place any suspicious site off limits to inspectors. The response to any violation must be immediate and overwhelming -- starting with the return of sanctions but taking no options off the table, including, if necessary, the use of force.

The message to Iran should be loud and clear: We will never allow you to acquire a nuclear weapon; not just during the term of this agreement – never.

Today's agreement is the culmination of an effective strategy of pressure and engagement executed over many years. By the end of the Bush administration, Iran was rapidly expanding its nuclear centrifuge capacity despite unilateral American sanctions. The Obama administration took a different approach, working with Congress and our allies and partners around the world. As Secretary of State, I logged tens of thousands of miles and twisted a lot of arms to build a global coalition to impose the most crippling sanctions in history. That unprecedented pressure shattered Iran's economy and forced its representatives to the table – starting in Oman in 2012 -- to negotiate a deal that can put a nuclear weapon out of reach.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Going forward, we have to be clear-eyed when it comes to the broader threat Iran represents. Even with an agreement that cuts off its nuclear ambitions, Iran still poses a direct challenge to the United States and our allies, especially Israel. It continues to destabilize countries from Yemen to Lebanon, while exacerbating conflict in Syria. It is developing missiles that can strike every country in the Middle East. And it fuels terrorism throughout the region and beyond, including through direct support to Hamas and Hizballah. We have to oppose and raise the costs for Iran's destabilizing activities, insist on the return of U.S. citizens being held in Iranian prisons, and strengthen security cooperation with our allies and partners. Sanctions for terrorism, and other non-nuclear sanctions, should remain in place.

Israel has to be confident that the United States will always defend its security and ensure its Qualitative Military Edge in the region. I would invite the senior Israeli leadership to Washington for early talks on further strengthening our alliance. We should also deepen our security relationship with Arab partners who are threatened by Iran's ambitions.

I support this deal because it blocks Iran's pathways to a nuclear weapon and gives us tools to catch Iran if it tries to cheat. Ultimately, the alternatives were worse for America. Imposing new, unilateral sanctions, or engaging in military force at this juncture, would risk fracturing the world consensus we have painstakingly built, undermining our maximum leverage at a time when Iran is at its most vulnerable.

So we should proceed with wisdom and strength in implementing a deal born out of strong American leadership.

VETERANS LAUNCH NEARLY $1 MILLION IN ADS IN PENNSYLVANIA, CRITICAL OF TOOMEY, FITZPATRICK ON FAILURE TO SUPPORT TROOPS AND VETS

Ads call for defeat of Toomey, Fitzpatrick for voting against troops and veterans

PHILADELPHIA, PENN. – VoteVets.org, a national veterans organization, is today launching nearly $1 million in hard-hitting broadcast and cable ads in Pennsylvania, critical of the veterans' record of Senate candidate Pat Toomey and Eighth House District candidate Mike Fitzpatrick. Each of the ads features veterans from the state.

The Toomey ad can be viewed here: http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=j48SB88Prtw

The Fitzpatrick ad can be viewed here: http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=CmIsJ2uxKME

The scripts of both ads are below.

TOOMEY AD – "EXPECT"

The ad on Toomey hits at his vote against a $1500 combat bonus for troops serving in Iraq and Afghanistan. It features Anthony Rakoczy, a Marine veteran from Levittown, John Hanczaryk, an Army veteran from Yardley, and Bruce Gerstemeier, an Army veteran from Scranton. All three served in Afghanistan.

In the ad, the veterans rotate lines, saying, "As a soldier in Afghanistan, I was trained to expect the worst. At home, I thought it would be different. But, Congressman Toomey voted against a $1500 combat bonus. And, Congressman Toomey supports letting Wall Street execs keep every penny of their bonuses. Toomey said that money for troops was 'wasteful spending.' Bonuses for Wall Street are fine? But bonuses for troops are wasteful? I expected the worst in Afghanistan. I expected better from Congressman Toomey."

Indeed, Toomey did vote against an amendment offered by Rep. Bart Stupak in 2003 that would have given combat troops a $1500 bonus for their service in war. This June, when asked, Toomey said at a press conference of that vote, "Now there are times when some of these measures are [used] as an excuse to undermine the fiscal stability of our country. That's very bad policy. And, we shouldn't hold military and veteran needs hostage to wasteful spending."

VoteVets.org says it is spending $400,000 on airing the ad on broadcast and cable. It comes on the heels of a $500,000 canvassing effort in the state supporting Joe Sestak, announced earlier in the month.

FITZPATRICK AD – "SACRIFICE"

The ad on Fitzpatrick is critical of his vote to allow families of the fallen to claim their rightful survivor benefits from the government. The ad features Jared Baker, an Army Iraq veteran from Doylestown.

In the ad, Baker says, "I proudly served as a soldier in Iraq. Thousands of American troops lost their lives and we counted on our leaders back home for support. But, we didn't get that kind of support from Congressman Mike Fitzpatrick. Fitzpatrick failed those who sacrificed their lives for our freedom. He actually voted against giving rightful survivor benefits to families of fallen service-members. Mike Fitzpatrick voted against our troops, and their families. Now, it's time to vote against him."

In 2006, when in Congress, Fitzpatrick voted against a motion to stop the Department of Defense from reducing military death benefits for surviving spouses by the amount received in Veterans Affairs dependency and indemnity compensation. That vote affirmed a policy that cuts Survivor Benefit Plan annuity payments by the amount of VA compensation.

VoteVets.org says it is spending $500,000 to air the ad on broadcast and cable in the Philadelphia market.

VoteVets.org is a pro-military organization of Iraq and Afghanistan veterans, dedicated to the destruction of terror networks around the world, with force when necessary. It primarily focuses on education and advocacy on issues of importance to the troops and veterans, and holding politicians accountable for their actions on these issues.

VETERANS BACK HARRY REID IN MOVING NEW TELEVISION AD

LAS VEGAS, NV – VoteVets.org, a national veterans organization, is launching a moving new television ad today, narrated by a veteran from the state, urging Nevadans to re-elect Senator Harry Reid. The group said it was spending $400,000 to air the ad on statewide broadcast and cable.

The ad can be viewed here: http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=xa3fRarzoIQ

Titled "Highway," the ad shows a young man hiking along the road, just as Harry Reid did once a week as he went back and forth to school. Narrated by Anthony Funches an Air Force veteran from Las Vegas, the ad chronicles how Harry Reid has always beat the odds, including his leadership to provide care and benefits to our nation's veterans. The full script of the ad is below, with backup.

"Harry Reid has always been there for us," said Jon Soltz, Iraq War veteran and Chairman of VoteVets.org. "This ad truly encapsulates how we feel about him and the dogged leadership he's provided, especially when it comes to veterans. In very many ways, veterans coming home face the same kind of challenges that Harry Reid has always conquered – getting an education, working our way up the ladder. So not only are we thankful for his leadership, and respect it, but we identify with his character. That's why we've chosen to run an ad like this."

Ad Script	Script Back-Up
High school was forty-six miles away, they said going would be impossible. So, he walked & hitched his way. Forty-six every Monday, forty-six back come Friday.	"Finding someplace to go to high school took money some people just didn't have. Some young men kicked around or went into the mines or other such jobs. Others went to school in Needles California, some to Boulder City or Las Vegas. Following the good example of my brothers Don and Dale, who had both gone to Basic High School, I stuck my thumb at age thirteen and hitchhiked the 45 miles north to Henderson." [Harry Reid, The Good Fight, p.100]
Asked his girlfriend's father for her hand, he growled; and said impossible. Five children and sixteen grandchildren later, he and his girlfriend are still holding hands.	"'We're married,' Landra told [her parents]. 'I wanted to give you the address of where we're going.' 'This is not what we wanted. I did everything I could to stop it, and that was my right,' Earl Gould told his daughter. 'But now it's done. You are our only daughter. We're going to try and make this thing work.'" [Harry Reid, The Good Fight, p.125] "In 1961, their first child and only daughter – Lana – was born. Son Rory was born in 1962, and three more brothers followed - Leif, Josh, and Key…Today, Senator Reid and Landra are the proud grandparents of 16 grandchildren." [Official Biography, Reid.Senate.gov, accessed 10/11/10]
Everyone knows a nobody could never get elected to office. Impossible? He proved 'em wrong again.	"As a small boy he would accompany his father, Harry Reid Sr., for long days deep underground in the mines. His father was a hardrock miner with an eighth grade education and his mother never completed high school; yet the youngest of Harry and Inez Reid's four sons would go on to achieve the American dream." [Official Biography, Reid.Senate.gov, accessed 10/11/10]
A nobody from Nevada could never become the most powerful man in the Senate.	"Reid became the most powerful man in the Senate after Democrats won the Senate majority in 2006." [Washington Post, WhoRunsGov.com Sen. Reid profile, January 2007]

Never single-handedly stop Yucca Mountain.	"Reid is surely the most influential senator Nevada has sent to Washington since it became a state 146 years ago. He has delivered millions of dollars in aid and almost single-handedly blocked the federal government from turning Yucca Mountain, 90 miles northwest of Vegas, into a national nuclear-waste repository." [New York Times, 1/12/10]
Never bring Nevada thousands of jobs…	HIRE Act – 69,254 Jobs "The Senate on Wednesday easily approved a $15 billion plan to spur job creation, a vote that lawmakers hoped would show that they were taking steps to improve the nation's employment outlook." [New York Times, 2/24/10] "Some 69,254 people in Nevada were hired under an incentive program that provides tax breaks for hiring unemployed workers [the HIRE Act], the Treasury Department said Monday." [Las Vegas Review-Journal, 8/3/10 , emphasis added] CityCenter – 22,000 Jobs "Last year, MGM Resorts International was close to shuttering CityCenter, the largest private construction project in the nation's history. Financing had dried up in the wake of the financial industry's collapse. At MGM's request, Reid and his Republican counterpart Sen. John Ensign called the CEOs of the company's lenders urging them not to ignore the project. Without that intervention, Reid argues, 22,000 workers would be without jobs and the Strip would be stuck with a cluster of partially built hotels." [Las Vegas Sun, 7/9/10 , emphasis added] Wind Turbine Plant – 1,000 Jobs "A consortium of companies announced plans today to develop a plant in the Las Vegas area that would employ about 1,000 people for manufacturing wind turbines…In today's announcement, the partners credited Sen. Harry Reid for their decision to locate the plant in Nevada. They also cited affordable real estate in Nevada, the state's skilled workforce and Nevada's business-friendly climate." [Las Vegas Sun, 3/11/10 , emphasis added] Travel Promotion Act – 40,000 Jobs

	"President Obama Thursday enacted legislation to promote international travel to the United States by establishing a national tourism board that would coordinate advertising and other efforts to encourage foreigners to visit the United States…Advocates of the law say it would help attract 1.6 million new international visitors, $4 billion in new spending and more than $300 million in tax revenue each year. Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (Nev.), who faces a tough re-election battle this year, was a strong backer of the bill…" [Washington Post, 3/4/10] "'It's been a tough year, particularly for domestic U-S travelers to come to Las Vegas,' says Gary Selesner, the President of Caesars Palace. 'The one segment growing has been international.' But international tourists are in high demand. Since 9-11, 68 million fewer visitors have come to this country. That's partly why the travel promotion act was created, so the U-S can market itself. 'We collectively can no longer leave it to the states or corporations,' says MGM Mirage Marketing Director Bill Hornbuckle. 'Everyone needs to participate.' 'This is a great assist for us, because we're going to have millions of dollars of advertising helping convince tourists to come to this country and by extension, Las Vegas,' adds Selesner. Local politicians like Senator Harry Reid and Senator John Ensign were instrumental in pushing this bill through Congress. They say attracting 1.6 million more visitors a year should result in 40,000 new jobs nationwide." [Las Vegas Review-Journal, 3/9/10 , emphasis added]
… or be the one to demand that our veterans be treated with dignity and honor. For those would be impossible.	"Today, the Veterans of Foreign Wars Political Action Committee announced its endorsement of Nevada Senator Harry Reid for his tireless commitment on behalf of Nevada's veterans such as securing the $540 million in funding needed to complete a new VA Hospital in Southern Nevada, passing the 21st Century GI Bill of Rights and supporting the end of unfair concurrent receipt policies." [VFW-PAC endorsement via Harry Reid.com, accessed 10/11/10 ; VFW-PAC endorsement list, 9/24/10]
Re-election? Some say darned close to impossible, throw 'em all out. But in this day, this time of worldwide distress, we think Nevada needs him and that determination more than ever.

Subject: [big campaign] Tracking Update: McCain Environmental Round Table in North Bend, WA

Hello Big Campaign,

Unfortunately, we were not able to get a tracker into today's Environmental Round Table in North Bend, WA today. The event was closed to the public and staffers were checking a pre-made list.

The good news is we were able to capture video of the event from online streaming video and we have that available upon request. Below are the notes we took from that video.

NORTH BEND, WA: McCain Environmental Round Table

Highlights: McCain was asked whether his age is a legitimate political issue and responded "anything is fair." McCain also staked out his differences from Bush on the environment, and he said that Hagee's apology--and his coming-together with Bill Donohue to help reconcile with the Catholic community--are "laudable."

BACKGROUND DETAILS:

- Roundtable held at the Cedar River Watershed Educational Center
- Panelists include
  - Lands Commissioner Doug Sutherland
  - Bruce Williams, chairman and CEO of HomeStreet Bank and vice chairman of Cascade Land Conservancy,;
  - Jim DiPeso, policy director of Republicans for Environmental Protection;
  - REI CEO Sally Jewell;
  - West Mathison, a fifth-generation farmer with Stemilt Growers, Inc.;
  - Chris Bayley, the former Republican King County prosecutor and chairman of Stewardship Partners;
  - Eagle Scout and high school senior Will Mentor;
  - Mercer Island City Councilman Steve Litzglow.
  - Former Gov. Dan Evans is the moderator.

INTRO: from moderator, former Gov. Dan Evan thanks Governor – Native American issues – they're stewards of large amounts of land, so we need to have their "active partnership" in environmental initiatives

thanks Slade Gorton, …, Rob McKenna

not new to this issue, but I'm always learning on this issue

"I traveled, I traveled around the globe - usually at your expense" to learn about climate change: the Artic, Greenland's erosion of the ice pack, Brazilian rain forest, Great Coral Reef – "these are the miners' canaries of what's going to happen to our planet" cap-and-trade. Other option is carbon tax – just going to be passed onto consumer. Europeans have a cap and trade system, so we're not inventing the wheel here – we're trying to put free-enterprise, market-based incentives for how to deal with this great threat to Americans.

Citing Blair, suppose all we think we know about climate change is wrong and we accept green technologies, then all we've done is handed off a cleaner world to young Americans. But if we are right, this will stoke innovation and we must stewardship. Wind energy. Firmly and fastly rejects the notion that this will be somehow harmful to the economy. We can use alternative-energy technologies to reduce greenhouse gases. "Do I have some passion about this? Yes" younger Americans are largely on my side; "we've got a few old geezers we've got to convince."

ROUNDTABLE

MCCAIN: Tees off roundtable with Will, congratulates Eagle Scouts.

- WILL MENTOR: Has seen the effects of climate change on his hikes as a Boy Scout and if we don't combat this issue, it has the potential to destroy a lot of things Northwesterners hold important: streams, salmon. If there were more of an opportunity for people his age to get involved in all this, it would make a big difference.

- MCCAIN: If I were to make an obvious suggestion, best thing to do is plant another tree. Best way to lower CO2.

MCCAIN asks SALLY JEWELL: How does REI contribute to this fight?

- SALLY JEWELL: We have to lead. Business and private enterprise have to take a significant role. REI launched a goal to be climate neutral. It's difficult but it's important. Part of the problem is that children have a lack of connection to the outside world (too much time inside) – a concern. Working with Retailers like WalMart, Target, BestBuy and Loews. Working on sustainable packaging coalition. Working with paper companies to make sure they're coming from responsible sources. Using recycled materials in REI's products.
- MCCAIN: give you a comparative disadvantage?
- SALLY JEWELL: it's expected to be green but people don't want to pay more.

MCCAIN: What do you want me to do?

- SALLY JEWELL: there's no federal incentives to be green. Find ways to incentivize businesses and individuals to reduce
- MCCAIN: If you can sequester carbon and cut down on methane—we've got to provide those incentives. Research and innovation. Once you've developed it, you hand it off to private enterprise.
- MCCAIN: Education. We've had some on recyclable (struggles with word) materials. Recycling is a very important aspect. Public education problem on how important these small steps are.
- "I'm a little wary – I have to give you some straight talk—about government subsidies… I opposed the [ethanol] subsidies because I thought they'd distort the market" b/c of unintended consequences. In the 70s- the last time there was a gas crisis- we over-subsidized some of the solar industry and we turned out to have some pretty shoddy material, incl. in AZ. Americans will respond, as they have to
- SALLY JEWELL: if not subsidies, then find ways to do the right thing and penalize those doing the wrong thing. Then these cleaner energy sources will take off.

DOUG SOUTHERLAND— as federal govt starts national cap-and-trade program, make sure local/ regional systems aren't penalized.

- MCCAIN: in other words, you want us to establish a system where you get some credit for systems you've established in the past, rather than have everyone start at same point?
- DOUG SOUTHERLAND: I think each of the states should be able to make some decisions on how it's going to be run.
- Forest health is also a problem (i.e. strategic burning to minimize risk of fire). MCCAIN agrees – forest fires have been devastating.

STEVE LITZGLOW: issue of money. We're trying to move to hybrids, but how do you kickstart to get over that level to get to the hybrids? Battling priorities – wants to be green, but... Says he has sinking fund, which helps, but hard to get to long-term goal.

- MCCAIN: Got an idea, Chris?

CHRIS BAYLEY: Government should give money to landowners who know how to take care of their land. From regulatory paradigm. landowner-based and cooperative paradigm.

MCCAIN: What about PILT (payment in lieu of taxes)? That's a good one?

- DAN EVANS: As former county exec, PILT, especially in those communities that have been affected by the loss of harvesting on federal lands – those communities that are dependent on forest industry don't have funds to meet their needs – education, etc. either we have to get out of our analysis paralysis or find a way to help them survive. PILT has been one of those issues.

BRUCE WILLIAMS:

- (1) land use – may sound like a local issue removed from fed govt, but has an impact in terms of climate change. When we did a carbon footprint of our bank, a lot of it came off of employees commuting – need to be aware of it in developing great cities.
- (2) waste management – we don't have a good national plan and we'd like to see that taken care of before we create more of it. Hantford.
- (3) worry that cap-and-trade system will penalize hydropower.
  - MCCAIN – would need to be accounted for in credit system.
  - MCCAIN – maybe make mass transportation green.
  - MCCAIN – on nuclear power, BRUCE WILLIAMS, why have European countries come up with solutions that people approve of? E.g. France – they re-process. We have to do both. I understand the dangers. We have a whole lot more to do than we thought we had to do at the beginning of the exercise. We don't have the capability or certainly anything that's affordable. If other countries are able to make use of nuclear power and address the issues of spent nuclear fuel, I don't understand why USA can't do it. We've never had a nuclear accident when we've sailed ships around. We ought ot be able to address the issues of transportation, storage, reprocessing and new technologies which reduce the amount of spent nuclear fuel. I'm all for clean coal technology – right now it's too expensive, but I'm confident it will become less expensive. In the meantime, we can't afford an increase in greenhouse gases.

SALLY JEWELL (REI): on transportation. Worst is airplane travel – we can buy offsets, but not ideal. Electricity consumption – we've been able to buy from more responsible compnaies. On employee commuting – one of the things the fed govt has done and I would encourage it - the provision and transportation funding for alternative forms of transportation, e.g. connected bike path. One of the positive consequences of gas hike has been threw-the-roof sales of bicycles. If you find ways to support bike routes, e.g., people will use it and it'll have positive consequences. But if you don't have support from state, local and federal, not going to happen.

MCCAIN – anecdote – Meg Whitman asked employees how to reduce impact. Suggested that have cleaners come in and clean during the day and shut down completely at night – saved on energy costs. So we should ask Americans how they think we should help.

WEST MATHISON – I've had retail execs say they hear "sustainability" and reach for their wallet. But global marketplace is full of low-cost producers. In American agriculture, we've applied technology (organic, microirrigation) that any way we can help support agriculture in the USA – keep food in US, not outsource. MCCAIN quips, "which means you're in favor of free trade?"

MCCAIN to WEST MATHISON: how have gas prices affected your business?

- WEST MATHISON: the only way we'll be sustainable is market-based solutions. Maybe tax incentives with pre-determined sunsets will help. We're starting to see trend of businesses asking question how can we be profitable and how can we do right? We're just scratching the surface – so anything we can do to incentivize that is going to be great. Keep economic stimulus in this country with the production of food, agriculture is a great way to sequester carbon…

MCCAIN to SALLY JEWELL: is there a concern that people worry they're not getting the best quality product with recycled materials?

- SALLY JEWELL – our competitors aren't other sustainable orgs but TV, video games and overscheduled people. Sustainability is a team sport, it is not competitive advantage. We're trying to create a market – we're trying to create the demand.

MCCAIN to CHRIS BAYLEY: how can we help at fed level?

- Landowner incentive programs fuel voluntary work and the agricultural production. Fed govts role in enviro should be incentive-based, using the engine of volunteers and the power of landowners who want to save their land and create new habitat.

Steve – you want to keep the fed govt from inhibiting people from finding solutions. We don't need govt to tell us what we need to do – but to encourage people to find systems that work. Like internet 10 years ago – a lot of options look good right now, but you need to let the marketplace figure out what's going to work. E.g. biodiesels and plug-ins – don't know which is going to work, and so natural selection is critical in finding best what's going to work.

MCCAIN – enviro not just green thing – it's a national security and an economic concern (fillin up gas tank of fixed income people). Natl security since we are dependent on more than $400b / year in imported oil to countries that don't like us very much and some of that money ends up in hands of terrorists. Trade deficit - we're borrowing from China. Needs to be bipartisan issue – sit-down with bankers and consuemrs and all of us as Americans and address this issue. Honored to be in presence of Slade Gordon and to be at this facility that does so much to provide arguably cleanest drinking water in the world and I promise not to do anything that would affect this state and local govt working together to provide this service. You renew my enthusiasm in the lord's work in the city of Satan.

MEDIA AVAILABILITY

- MCCAIN: Cedar River Watershed is beautiful. The environment here and in AZ important. I will be a Pres for the environment, I have a long record of advocacy for environment. I have a plan of action that will restore our environment, reduce greenhouse gas emissions and relieve our dependence on foreign oil. We can have good environmental record and a good economy, namely through innovation and green technology. This can be a bipartisan effort. It is a nexus of compelling issues.

- Q: – Obama and Clinton have nearly identical cap and trade plan but more modest goals. Why should voters listen to your plan versus theirs?
    - MCCAIN: I have a long history in this – they don't. People will trust my stewardship not only because of my background and knowledge but also my vision for the future. My plan is doable. You can dictate a lot of things, but you have to unleash the entrepreneurial power of Americans in order to accomplish these things. This is one element of my environmental record and plan of action.
- Q: did you influence or support Hagee's decision to issue letter of apology to Catholics? How will this change? Will it be enough to silence his critics?
    - MCCAIN: Hagee and Donohue are joining together and reconcile with the Catholic community. I have long sought to reconcile – with antiwar movement, with David Ifshin, with the Vietnamese in interest of healing the wounds of war. Donohue's and Hagee's coming together is a "laudable thing and a testament to their Judeo-Christian values."
- What do you say to people who say global warming isn't real?
    - MCCAIN: I'll be glad to continue the debate. We continue to amass scientific evidence, e.g. from NASA. I pose the question again: the consequences if we're wrong vs. consequences if we're right about climate change happening.
    - I've made some Republicans mad – but my duty is to do what I think is right.
- Do you feel more comfortable accepting Hagee's endorsement now?
    - I again say that I accept his endorsement but not everything he says. The fact that he apologized was helpful. I think it's always laudable for someone to apologize for something they did that was wrong.
- Q: Given mounting evidence of harmful effects of military sonar testing on marine animals, are you going to take away the military's practice of that?
    - MCCAIN: there's a balance that can be achieved of conducting these tests so they're not harmful. I'd be glad to continue to work on that.
- Q: GOP base would like to know – do you believe that climate change is manmade or natural occurrence?
    - MCCAIN: I think evidence has indicated that human activity has had major impact on buildup of greenhouse gases. I trust the assessment of National Assoc of Science
- Q from European journalist: Are you going to present different approach then what we've had?
    - MCCAIN: Yes the President and I have had a "long-standing, significant, deep" difference between Pres and I in our policies on this. Going back to 2002. We can learn from the Europeans, from their mistakes (e.g. with cap and trade).
- Q: Fair for your age to be an issue?
    - MCCAIN: "Oh, anything is fair. This isn't beanbag." [How old is John McCain?? Beanbag??] This is a question that was raised in the primaries. I look forward to that. I look forward to bringing my 96-year-old mother everywhere I go. Maybe hiking too.
- Q: why weren't you in DC for vote about cutting off deliveries for petroleum reserve? Obama and Clinton were there.
    - MCCAIN: Because I'm out campaigning. With a 97-to-1 vote it doesn't matter. The people of AZ understand.
- Q: Points out examples of problems with nuclear, e.g. Hantford. Why should we trust anyone who advocates nuclear?
    - MCCAIN: I understand the enormous challenges we've faced in trying to clean up, I understand the skepticism. I'd like to point out the European example. They've dealt with problems, they've made progress. I will have to make sure Americans convinced that nuclear power will be safe and secure and we will avoid these problems.
- Aide says we're out of time. MCCAIN asks if he can take a few more questions.
- Q: Were you or your campaign involved in brokering Donohue-Hagee peace?
    - MCCAIN: I certainly wasn't.
- Q: How do you respond to protests about hurting Boeing?
    - I have the greatest respect for Boeing workers. I was part of investigation that ended up with Boeing workers in prison and costing Americans money. I did everything possible to make sure everything after that was a fair and open process. I'm open to Air Force review. But my first obligation to the American people is the careful stewardship of their dollars. And I'm proud of my record there.
- Q: Would you make cap and trade bill a priority in your first 100 days? Is it important to make progress on this bill even if it doesn't pass?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

  - o MCCAIN: Lieberman-Warner is a good bill but doesn't go far enough with nuclear. It will be a top priority.
- Q: If elected, would you commit to attending the next round of UN climate talks?
  - o MCCAIN: I'd have to assess where other countries are. But I will lead this country and the world to address this issue. America can lead and not obstruct.

"The most obvious way to neutralize this advantage is for the Republicans to nominate a woman for president. Nominating a woman for president is something very different from finding a previously obscure female politician, putting her on the ticket at the last minute and hoping for the best. This is what John McCain did in 2008 and what the Republican nominee, whoever he is, will likely do in 2016. This strategy will not work against a Democratic ticket that will be led by a woman, particularly a woman with the experience and appeal of Hillary Clinton."

Will Republicans Stand by the Benghazi 'Stand-Down Order' Conspiracy?

Lucia Graves

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

July 11, 2012

One of the many threads in the tapestry of Benghazi conspiracy theories is the contention that, faced with a terrorist attack on the U.S. Consulate there, the American military didn't do what it could have to save lives. Specifically, that a "stand-down order" was issued from on high that prevented the use of military assets that could have saved the four Americans who died the night of Sept. 11, 2012.

But hours of transcribed interviews with nine military leaders, conducted by the House Armed Services and Oversight and Government Reform committees—and made public for the first time Wednesday night—have yielded some news. Namely, that this contention appears to be a bunch of hooey, according to a close examination by the Associated Press.

"The senior military officer who issued the instruction to 'remain in place' and the detachment leader who received it said it was the right decision and has been widely mischaracterized," the report found. (More details about why that's the case are laid out nicely in the AP's report.)

The White House is pleased with the news, because it backs up the view that the military's decision to remain in Tripoli and protect Embassy personnel there, rather than fly to Benghazi after all the Americans had already been evacuated, made a whole lot of sense. What's more, it makes GOP Rep. Darrell Issa, who has suggested Hillary Clinton personally gave this alleged conspiratorial "stand-down order," look particularly silly. (As secretary of State at the time, Clinton wasn't even in the chain of military command.)

But it isn't just Issa and pundits on Fox News who've bolstered this theory. It's also been promoted by serious-minded Rep. Trey Gowdy, R-S.C., chairman of the somewhat newly minted select committee investigating Benghazi, along with the majority of Republicans serving on it.

Rep. Jason Chaffetz of Utah, who has discussed the "stand-down order" as if it were fact, is perhaps the most pronounced example of this. "We had proximity, we had capability, we had four individuals in Libya armed, ready to go, dressed, about to get into the car to go in the airport to go help their fellow countrymen who were dying and being killed and under attack in Benghazi, and they were told to stand down," Chaffetz said over a year ago. "That's as sickening and depressing and disgusting as anything I have seen. That is not the American way."

Politifact rated that claim as patently false in May of 2013.

But it didn't stop Gowdy, who has been praised by House Speaker John Boehner for his "zeal for the truth," from alluding, albeit more cryptically, to the same unsupported points later that same month. "I think I'm asked about [Benghazi] because it kind of involves what we believe about our Republic," he explained in an interview with the Daily Caller, "which is that we're not gonna send anybody into harms way, under our flag without adequate protection, and if they get in trouble we are gonna go get 'em. We're gonna save 'em. Or at least we're gonna make a heck of an effort to do it. So Benghazi kinda undercuts that."

And it didn't stop Rep. Mike Pompeo, R-Kansas, from suggesting to Hugh Hewitt that the military "had the opportunity" to take action, but didn't. Nor did it discourage Republican Rep. Peter Roskam of Illinois from suggesting in a press release that the military was up to something fishy.

"We all want to believe that our government would do everything to come to the aid of Americans under threat abroad," said Roskam, before transitioning to why he couldn't.

Another member of the Benghazi select committee, Rep. Jim Jordan, R-Ohio, suggested that during the attack, there was little effort to fight back, according to The Columbus Dispatch. "Why weren't we running to the sound of the guns?" he asked.

Never mind that a House Armed Services subcommittee report from several months earlier had found there was no way the U.S. military could have responded in time to save the four Americans killed in Benghazi. GOP Rep. Martha Roby of Alabama still delivered the subcommittee's report—which, by the way, also found that no "stand-down order" was issued—with a hint of conspiracy. "We did a very thorough job," she told the Montgomery Advertiser, "but we did leave the door open when we said this was an interim report and that if information surfaced that there were others we needed to talk to, we would."

Asking whether these new military testimonies (which largely just confirm what's been found previously) will change these Republicans' rhetoric feels something akin to asking what it takes to end a conspiracy theory. A better conspiracy, perhaps?

AP: WHAT THE MILITARY DID WHILE BENGHAZI POST BURNED

By Connie Cass

July 12, 2014, 9:41 AM

One by one, behind closed doors, military officers explained what they did and didn't do the night the U.S. diplomatic post in Benghazi, Libya, burned.

Together their 30 hours of testimony to congressional investigators gives the fullest account yet of the military's response to the surprise attacks that killed the U.S. ambassador and three other Americans the night of Sept. 11, 2012, and early the next morning.

Transcripts of the interviews, with some names and classified information blacked out, were released Wednesday

The nine officers, including retired Gen. Carter Ham, then the head of the military's U.S. Africa Command, described making on-the-fly decisions with only sparse information about the crisis unfolding at a diplomatic post and the nearby CIA compound.

None of them was in Benghazi. The closest? Some were 600 miles away in Tripoli, the Libyan capital; others gave orders from command headquarters in Germany or Washington.

They did not witness what went on in the White House or at the State Department. Ex-Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton, former Defense Secretary Leon Panetta and others have testified about Benghazi. More hearings are coming.

The nine officers shed light on the nature of the attacks; speculation that the military was ordered to "stand down" from helping Americans; suggestions that the U.S. should have rushed jets or a special operations team to Benghazi; and early misperceptions that the attack began as a protest over an anti-Islam video.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Some lingering questions about the Benghazi attacks and what the officers told the House Armed Services Committee and the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee this year:

DID MILITARY LEADERS INITIALLY BELIEVE THE TROUBLE RESULTED FROM A STREET PROTEST?

Some heard that, some didn't; nothing was clear about events on the ground at first.

One of the earliest reports came from Ambassador Chris Stevens, who told his deputy in a phone call cut short: "We're under attack."

"We started calling it an attack from inception," said Army Lt. Col. S.E. Gibson, who was at the U.S. Embassy in Tripoli. "We never referred to it as anything else."

Another military official in Tripoli, whose name was withheld, said he wasn't sure how to interpret that word — "attack" — at first.

He had heard about protesters who scaled the walls of the U.S. Embassy in Cairo earlier that night. "It could be, you know, vandals are attacking," he said.

Retired Vice Adm. Charles "Joe" Leidig Jr., deputy commander of AFRICOM, said he was awoken in the night at his headquarters in Germany with word that "there had been protesters, and they had overrun the facility in Benghazi."

But Ham, who was alerted while visiting the Pentagon, said he heard no mention of protesters.

So he's sure he didn't pass on anything like that when he informed Panetta and Gen. Martin Dempsey, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, of the attack. Dempsey and Panetta personally took word to President Barack Obama at the White House.

Speaking for the Obama administration, then-U.N. Ambassador Susan Rice appeared on Sunday talk shows five days later and suggested the attacks were born from regional protests against an anti-Islamic video. The administration later recanted that position but never thoroughly articulated what they believe happened. Republicans say Obama soft-pedaled a terrorist attack to protect his re-election.

Over the two days when the attacks were occurring, there was "very, very little discussion that I can recall about why did this happen." Ham said. "There just wasn't time for that, frankly."

WAS A FOUR-MAN TEAM HEADED FOR BENGHAZI ORDERED TO STAND DOWN?

Technically, no, the team was not ordered, as some have asserted, to stand by as militants attacked Americans 600 miles away. But they were told not to go to Benghazi and instead to stay and protect personnel in Tripoli. In hindsight, the attacks were over by then, anyway.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The special operations officer leading that team and the commander who gave him the order both told investigators that it was the right decision.

The team, led by Gibson, was in Tripoli to help train Libyan special forces. When the Benghazi attack began, Gibson's first duty was to protect the embassy in Tripoli amid fears that it also would be targeted. He helped evacuate the staff to a classified, more-secure location. Once he felt they were safe on the morning of Sept. 12, Gibson was ready to rush to Benghazi to help.

One Libyan plane carrying a six-man U.S. security team already had taken off. Gibson wanted his group on the second chartered flight. He called the special operations command center for Africa to say they were heading to the airport.

He was told, "Don't go. Don't get on that plane."

"Initially, I was angry," he recalled. "Because a tactical commander doesn't like to have those decisions taken away from him. But then once I digested it a little bit, then I realized, OK, maybe there was something going on. Maybe I'm needed here for something else."

Rear Adm. Brian Losey, who gave the order, said he needed Gibson's team in Tripoli in case trouble started there.

Although some Republican lawmakers have suggested the team might have helped repel attackers in Benghazi, their flight would have arrived after the final assault that killed two CIA contractors.

Losey dismissed the notion that the foursome could have been much help in Benghazi, where Americans already were moving to the airfield for evacuation with the aid of Libyan forces and the U.S. security team from the first plane. Losey noted that Gibson's group consisted of a communications specialist, a medic and a weapons operator with his foot in a cast.

"That's not a security team," Losey said. Sending them in "didn't make a lot of sense."

Gibson said if his group had flown to Benghazi, their flight would have crossed paths with the first plane as it returned bearing wounded Americans. Because they stayed, his medic was there to meet two seriously injured people at the Tripoli airport. The medic is credited with saving one's life.

RIGHT OR WRONG, WASN'T THAT AN ORDER TO "STAND DOWN"?

Not according to Losey and Gibson.

Civilians might say that Losey ordered Gibson to stand down from his race to the scene. But Losey and Gibson say in their military parlance, standing down means ceasing operations.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"It was not a stand-down order," Gibson said. "It was not, 'Hey, time for everybody to go to bed.' It was, you know, 'Don't go. Don't get on that plane. Remain in place.'"

"It was never an order to stand down," Losey said. "It was an order to remain in place and continue to provide your security role in Tripoli."

DID CLINTON GIVE A "STAND DOWN" ORDER, AS SOME REPUBLICANS HAVE THEORIZED?

"No," said Losey.

"I never received any orders from the secretary of state or heard of any orders from the secretary of state," said Leidig, also based in Stuttgart, Germany.

"No," said Ham, who commanded the Africa operations. "And we would not receive direct communications from the secretary of state."

Ham said no one else ordered him to stand down, either, and no one tried to stop him from helping the Americans in Benghazi any way he could.

"The conversation really was more along lines of, you know, 'What do you need? What can we do?'" he said. "And every request for forces that I asked of the secretary of defense was approved."

WHAT DID THE MILITARY DO TO HELP?

Following the first report of trouble about 9:40 p.m. local time on Sept. 11, officials began looking for military planes that could head to Benghazi for evacuations. None would be available for hours.

An unmanned drone already in Libya was quickly sent to survey the situation at the diplomatic post. Nighttime darkness limited its usefulness.

Two military members — both from Special Forces — were in the six-man team that flew from Tripoli to Benghazi aroundmidnight and aided with the defense and evacuation of the CIA base.

An Air Force C-17 transport plane flew the Benghazi evacuees from Tripoli to Germany the night of Sept. 12, about 24 hours after the attacks began.

A U.S. anti-terror team sent from Spain arrived in Tripoli after the evacuees had gone.

Two military teams — one in Croatia and the other in the U.S. — prepared to go but, as the situation changed, weren't brought to Libya. They would have arrived too late.

Not until the morning of Sept. 12 was the 31st Fighter Wing in Aviano, Italy, ordered to get four F-16 jets and four pilots ready to respond if needed. The call to Benghazi never came.

WHY DIDN'T THEY SCRAMBLE THE F-16 FIGHTERS?

Military leaders decided early on that jets armed with 500-pound bombs were unsuited for the chaotic crisis in an urban area.

"Ultimately, it was my decision that said no, not the right response in this circumstance," Ham said.

He didn't have anyone on the ground to provide target information for airstrikes. He didn't want to harm innocent people or risk inflaming more Libyans to join the attack. He believed some militants had missiles capable of downing a plane.

"Had I made a different decision, had strike aircraft deployed, we don't really know what the outcome would have been," Ham said. "Maybe it would have been positive, but maybe it would have got shot down. Maybe it would have killed civilians."

Brig. Gen. Scott Zobrist, then the wing commander at Aviano, had similar worries. He said that, even if called right away, it would have taken 20 hours to get jets to Benghazi from the base in Italy normally used for training flights.

Pilots would have to be recalled from their homes, bombs loaded onto planes, the 1,000-mile route planned. The jets would need refueling along the way, which meant coordinating with tanker planes stationed in England — something that typically takes days to plan.

COULD THE MILITARY HAVE DONE MORE?

Perhaps.

In hindsight, Ham said, he should have reached out to his Libyan contacts and other U.S. officials to get Americans evacuated from Benghazi faster. That might have saved the two lives that were lost hours after the first attack at the diplomatic post.

While the evacuation from Benghazi was being planned by the embassy and the CIA, Ham said, he switched his focus toward gearing up a possible hostage rescue mission, because the ambassador was still missing.

Meanwhile, surviving U.S. personnel were gathered at the CIA base in Benghazi. Ham said he believed they were relatively safe. He and other military leaders said they weren't told that the CIA compound already had come under gunfire and rocket-propelled grenade attacks in the middle of the night.

The U.S. security team that arrived at the Benghazi airport after midnight was detained by Libyan officials for several hours. That delayed the evacuation, Ham said, and "allowed sufficient time for the second attack to be organized and conducted."

During that attack, around 5 a.m., mortar fire killed two CIA security contractors on the roof and wounded other Americans.

Less than an hour later, the evacuation of all American personnel from Benghazi began.

Clinton's Potential 2016 Rival: We Can't 'Send Children Back to Death'

By Zeke Miller

July 11, 2014

Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley broke publicly with President Barack Obama and former Secretary of State Hillary ClintonFriday, calling for a more humane policy toward the tens of thousands of unaccompanied minors who have illegally crossed into the United States.

"It is contrary to everything we stand for to try to summarily send children back to death," the Democratic lawmaker told reporters. O'Malley also criticized the "kennels" in which those who have been detained are being kept and calling for the children to be placed in "the least restrictive" locations, including foster homes or with family members in the U.S.

"Through all of the great world religions we are told that hospitality to strangers is an essential human dignity," O'Malley said. "It is a belief that unites all of us. And I have watched the pictures of young kids who have traveled for thousands of miles. I can only imagine, as a father of four, the heartbreak that those parents must have felt in sending their children across a desert where they can be muled and trafficked or used or killed or tortured. But with the hope, the hope, that they would reach the United States and that their children would be protected from what they were facing at home, which was the likelihood of being recruited into gangs and dying a violent death."

Speaking to reporters on the margins of the National Governors Association, O'Malley, who is weighing a bid for the Democratic nomination for president in 2016, declined to talk about his political future. Still, his response was a clear effort to distinguish himself from his leading rival and the incumbent president. Clinton told CNN last month that most of those detained should be sent back.

"They should be sent back as soon as it can be determined who responsible adults in their families are," she said. President Barack Obama said Wednesday that the parents of the migrants need to know that "it is unlikely that their children will be able to stay."

O'Malley went so far as to call the children "refugees," a term with legal weight that would allow most of them to remain in the U.S. He called on Congress and the President to avoid modifying the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2008. That measure requires that children who are not from Canada or Mexico who have crossed the border to be given an opportunity to see an immigration judge to make their case for amnesty. Lawmakers on both sides, as well as the White House, are reviewing ways to amend that law to ease deportations of the tens of thousands of migrant children, who are largely from El Salvador, Guatemala, and Honduras.

O'Malley said "the whole world is watching" how the U.S. responds to the humanitarian crisis.

"We have to do right not just by these kids but by our kids and protect the children who are here, put them in the least restrictive settings, get them out of these detention centers and these kennels where they are being cooped up, and operate as the good and generous people that we have always been," he added.

"That's what's at stake here, as well as the lives of these kids."

Rubio: I can beat Hillary

By Rachel Huggins

July 11, 2014, 7:59 PM

Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) believes he can beat Hillary Clinton in the race for the 2016 presidency.

"Multiple people can beat her. Hillary Clinton is not unbeatable," the GOP presidential hopeful told radio host Hugh Hewitt in an interview Friday.

When asked whether he's concerned about Clinton's extensive foreign policy background if he or another Republican candidate ran against her, Rubio quickly slammed the potential Democratic frontrunner.

"I'd ask her: You were the secretary of State during the first four years of the Obama administration, name one significant foreign policy achievement, now or after you left?", he said.

"The reset with Russia has been a disaster, the Middle East is more unstable today than it's been in I don't know when, our relationships with Latin America and democracy have deteriorated…our partners around the world view us as less reliable."

The Florida lawmaker also weighed in on Lebron James' surprise move back to the Cleveland Cavaliers after four seasons with the Miami Heat.

"I read the article he wrote in Sports Illustrated and it's actually very compelling. And I have a lot of respect," he said.

"The way I view it, he gave us four extraordinary years in Miami, a very special experience and on a personal note he allowed me, along with his teammates, to share with my sons memories they'll treasure for the rest of their lives."

CBS News: Hillary Clinton's book sales barely edging out Ben Carson's

By Lindsey Boerma

It's not 2016 yet, but the early frontrunner for the Democratic presidential nomination and one favorite being ardently recruited by Republicans are already contending for the top spot - on the bookshelf.

Despite the hubbub surrounding the release last month of Hillary Clinton's memoir "Hard Choices," new data shows it's barely edging out Ben Carson's "One Nation" in book sales. Nielsen Bookscan figures provided to CBS News for the week ending July 6 show the former secretary of state clocking in at 177,000 copies sold; Carson has sold 162,000 copies.

"One Nation," released May 20, has been on the market about three weeks longer than Clinton's chronicle. But considering the discrepancy in name brand as well as the flourish and fanfare that led Clinton's ultimately tumultuous book tour out of the gate, the marginal sales gap is striking.

Simon & Schuster reportedly shelled out a $14 million advance for Clinton's account of her time at the State Department, which critics have largely written off as safe and "stodgy."

The figures are good news for Carson, the neurosurgeon credited as the first person to successfully separate twins conjoined at the head.

Carson saw his star rise in 2013, when he openly lashed out against President Obama while standing several feet away from him. Ever since, conservatives starved for diversity have been building the case for the African-American doctor as a grassroots option for a 2016 White House bid, going so far as to mount a "Draft Ben Carson" movement.

As for Clinton, who's been unsuccessfully fending off speculation that her book tour is merely a soft rollout for her own anticipated presidential run, the relatively sluggish sales could be an indicator that she's not quite the stimulating public figure she'll need to be if she expects to win the Oval Office.

Another, somewhat ironic, red flag: On Friday, "Hard Choices" was bumped from first to second place on the New York Times bestseller list by Edward Klein's "Blood Feud: The Clintons vs. the Obamas," a garish if sensational telling of the alleged tensions between Bill and Hillary Clinton and the current first family.

Huffington Post Blog: How the Republicans Could -- But Won't -- Beat Hillary Clinton in 2016

By Lincoln Mitchell

Hillary Clinton's increasingly likely candidacy for president in 2016 must be extremely frustrating for Republican strategists. Clinton is a strong candidate, but she is not invincible. If Clinton runs, she will face nominal opposition within her own party, but obviously a Republican will run against her. The most recent polls show her defeating any Republican challenger by between 7 to 9 points.

What makes Clinton's candidacy frustrating for Republicans is that while the formulas for beating her are relatively straightforward, the party is unable to implement them. Much of Clinton's strength comes from her support among white women, a constituency that Mitt Romney carried in 2012. Clinton does not, and probably will not, win a majority of these voters in 2016, but if she comes close, her victory will be all but certain.

The most obvious way to neutralize this advantage is for the Republicans to nominate a woman for president. Nominating a woman for president is something very different from finding a previously obscure female politician, putting her on the ticket at the last minute and hoping for the best. This is what John McCain did in 2008 and what the Republican nominee, whoever he is, will likely do in 2016. This strategy will not work against a Democratic ticket that will be led by a woman, particularly a woman with the experience and appeal of Hillary Clinton.

With the first primaries only about 18 months away, it is hard not to notice that there are no women in the field of likely Republican candidates for president. This reflects the failure of the Republican Party, over the last decade in particular to recruit and elect women to high level offices. For example, of the 20 women in the senate, only four are Republicans. Although there are four Republican governors who are women, none have made any indication of interest in the presidential race. Although a woman might provide the best chance for the Republicans to defeat Clinton, it is unlikely that a strong female candidate will emerge between now and the primary season, meaning that Clinton's vulnerability from another female candidate will almost certainly not be exploited by the Republicans in 2016.

Clinton's second vulnerability is not so much a vulnerability, but a potential Republican strength that is unlikely to be used in 2016. To win in 2016, the Republicans will have to get a lot of things right. One of these will be repositioning themselves by moving away from the far right on every issue and promoting a more libertarian brand of conservatism. There is increasing support among the American people for a less interventionist approach to foreign policy and a great deal of anger at the government that could be harnessed by the right conservative politician. These sentiments are particularly strong among younger voters.

The problem for the Republican Party is that they remain, at least on the surface, dominated by social conservatives. This, if left unchecked, will drag down the Republican Party regardless of its positions on the economy and foreign policy. The party of opposition to marriage equality, draconian drug laws, limiting access to contraception and abortion will have a very difficult time broadening its appeal, particularly among younger voters in 2016 or beyond.

It is unlikely that a Republican candidate will emerge who has the courage and resources to challenge the social conservatives who are so influential in the party. The only candidates among the front-runners who might be able to do this are Chris Christie and Jeb Bush who are, in the context of their peers, moderate Republicans, and Rand Paul. Paul's libertarian views, not surprisingly, do not extend to issues involving women's reproductive health. Christie and Bush will have to exhibit the kind of political courage that Romney could not summon, and take on the social conservatives during the primary season. If they don't do this, they will cede the center, on these issues, to Clinton.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A woman or even a man with moderate views on social issues would be a formidable candidate against Clinton. In that campaign, Clinton's record would be scrutinized more vigorously because of the presence of a legitimate and viable opponent. Finding a candidate like that who at the very least could make a serious bid for the nomination should not be too difficult for the Republican Party, but this Republican Party will not be able to find such a candidate, very likely paving the way for a victory by a strong Democratic candidate, but one who is a creature of the political establishment and conventional policy thinking at a time when anti-government views are quite strong. This will be a missed opportunity for the Republicans, and probably a win for Clinton and the Democrats in 2016.

Clinton takes hit in NH poll, but still leads Dems

Mario Trujillo

July 11, 2014, 7:16 AM

Hillary Clinton remains the favorite for the 2016 Democratic presidential nomination in the early primary state of New Hampshire — but her rating has dropped 15 percent since January, according to a new poll.

A Granite State/WMUR poll released Thursday found 59 percent of Democratic voters there prefer Clinton over other party contenders. That number stood at 74 percent in January, a drop that reflected in other recent polling.

Clinton, who has been making a series of media interviews to promote her new book, is still by far the favorite candidate on the Democratic side. Some 14 percent of Democrats prefer Vice President Biden, and 8 percent favor Sen. Elizabeth Warren (Mass.).

Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) receives 3 percent and New York Gov. Andrew Cuomo receives 1 percent. Another 9 percent say they are undecided.

The race is much closer on the Republican end. New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie leads, with 19 percent of Republicans saying they prefer him. He is trailed by Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul (14 percent) and former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush (11 percent).

All other candidates receive less than 10 percent, including Florida Sen. Marco Rubio (8 percent).

Fifteen percent say they are undecided.

The poll surveyed 669 New Hampshire residents from June 19 to July 1. On the Democratic side, it has a margin of error of 6.1 percent. On the Republican side, it has a margin of error of 6.2 percent.

Subject:	Joe Klein: McCain Soft on al Qaeda

In case anyone hasn't seen this, this was quite a piece by Joe Klein on Time.com today:

http://www.time-blog.com/swampland/2008/02/mccain_soft_on_al_qaeda.html

McCain: Soft on Al Qaeda?

A curious passage from John McCain's victory speech last night:

"Or will we risk the confused leadership of an inexperienced candidate who once suggested invading our ally, Pakistan, and sitting down without pre-conditions or clear purpose with enemies who support terrorists and are intent on destabilizing the world by acquiring nuclear weapons?"

In time, I'm sure, Barack Obama will explain that any meetings with Iranian leaders will be fully prepped by staff in advance, including advance meetings at the ministerial level...but what about the first part of the quote? Utter nonsense. Here's what Obama actually said:

"I understand that President Musharraf has his own challenges. But let me make this clear. There are terrorists holed up in those mountains who murdered 3,000 Americans. They are plotting to strike again. It was a terrible mistake to fail to act when we had a chance to take out an Al Qaeda leadership meeting in 2005. If we have actionable intelligence about high-value terrorist targets and President Musharraf won't act, we will."

And, in fact, Obama was merely saying that he supported current U.S. policy. A month ago, for example, a bomb launched from a CIA predator drone killed the Al Qaeda leader Abu Laith al-Libi in Pakistan. Was McCain opposed to that?

The point is, McCain's loose, inaccurate talk continues a sad pattern he has shown on national security matters, particularly with regard to Iraq, where he is a loose cannon, firing off hot-button words like "victory" and "surrender"--words that his hero General David Petraeus has never and would never use. As it now stands, McCain believes that Iraq, where 150,000 U.S. troops are chasing after 3,500 Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia terrorists, is the "central front" in the war against terrorism--and he is on the record opposed to taking military action against the real Al Qaeda, which is actively working to destabilize Afghanistan, and Pakistan, and may be planning the next 9/11 in the mountains of Waziristan. Indeed, the election results in Pakistan this week may lead to further instability, perhaps a military coup, which could make U.S. action--action, not invasion--to root out Al Qaeda all the more necessary.

A central foreign policy discussion in the general election should be: Are our troops deployed appropriately to meet the threats we are facing? Should we have more in Afghanistan and fewer in Iraq? (McCain, like Bush, has already ceded his authority as Commander-in-Chief on that decision to Petraeus, whom, he says, should have the last word on troop levels in Iraq--an abdication of authority that raises deep questions about McCain's ability to conduct a coherent national security policy.)

In sum, John McCain, who claims to take national security seriously, made a foolish statement to score political points last night. At the very least, I hope he retracts it and joins Obama in the effort to defeat Al Qaeda.

NSN Daily Update: John McCain's Bad Week on Foreign Policy

This week, John McCain's positions on critical foreign policy issues such as Iraq, Iran Afghanistan, and Pakistan have all been undermined by the assessments of our intelligence community and members of the military leadership. In a rejection of McCain's statements that "victory" in Iraq is near, reports indicate that a new National Intelligence Estimate (NIE) has found that security gains are precarious, and long-standing political and ethnic grievances could cause the country to erupt in violence. Moreover, in a speech this week, General David Petraeus contradicted McCain's positions on using our Iraq strategy in Afghanistan and on negotiating with our enemies. Even more damaging to McCain were troubling reports that a second NIE - this one on Afghanistan – will indicate a "downward spiral," further indicting McCain's previous neglect of the issue and his past remarks that it would be enough to "muddle through". Finally, in a damaging critique of the Senator's bellicosity toward Russia, former Secretaries of State Henry Kissinger and George Schultz cautioned that U.S. interests demanded a strong effort to ease tensions with a resurgent Russia. From his premature declarations of Victory in Iraq, to his plan to use the Iraq strategy in Afghanistan, to his refusal to engage with enemies, to his reckless, adversarial approach for dealing with Russia, this week found John McCain on the wrong side of every issue.

National Intelligence Estimate directly undermines McCain's premature proclamations of victory in Iraq. McCain has repeatedly declared victory in Iraq, saying in 2007 "we've succeeded militarily," and more recently that "victory in Iraq is finally in sight." But just this week, McClatchy reported that a new National Intelligence Estimate (NIE) warned "that unresolved ethnic and sectarian tensions in Iraq could unleash a new wave of violence, potentially reversing the major security and political gains achieved over the last year." "The findings seem to cast doubts on McCain's frequent assertions that the United States is "on a path to victory" in Iraq by underscoring the deep uncertainties of the situation despite the 30,000-strong U.S. troop surge for which he was the leading congressional advocate." [John McCain, 11/24/07 . John McCain, 8/17/08. McClatchy, 10/07/08]

Statements by General Petraeus undercut McCain. Earlier this week, General David Petraeus delivered a speech at the conservative Heritage Foundation that undermined several positions held by Senator McCain. Petraeus first undercut McCain's fervent support for using the "same strategy" in Afghanistan that was used in Iraq, by saying bluntly, "every situation is unique." "Petraeus also came out unambiguously in his talk at Heritage for opening communications with America's adversaries, a position McCain is attacking Obama for endorsing. Citing his Iraq experience, Petraeus said, 'You have to talk to enemies.'" Finally, on Pakistan, an area where McCain has criticized rival Barack Obama for stating his intention to strike at al-Qaeda safe-havens, Petraeus addressed "the need to 'take away and hold the strongholds and safe havens' possessed by Al Qaeda in Iraq during 2007 and 2008, saying that without doing so, the rest of the counterinsurgency strategy 'won't work.'" For McCain, who for months has "wrapped himself in the mantle" of General Petraeus, the speech was damaging." [Washington Independent, 10/8/08 . General David Petraeus, 10/08/08]

Grim Intelligence Estimate on Afghanistan warns of dire consequences of American neglect and the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs agrees. Talking about Afghanistan Admiral Mullen said yesterday, "The trends across the board are not going in the right direction. . . I would anticipate next year would be a tougher year." A draft National Intelligence Estimate (NIE) on Afghanistan found that the country is in chaos. The deteriorating conditions addressed in the report extend well beyond those covered by John McCain's simplistic plan to apply the Iraq strategy to Afghanistan. Beyond the escalation of extremist attacks, the report assesses "that many of Afghanistan's most vexing problems are of the country's own making," according to intelligence officials. "[R]ampant corruption within the government of President Hamid Karzai" and "the destabilizing impact of the booming heroin trade, which by some estimates accounts for 50 percent of Afghanistan's economy" have contributed to the deteriorating situation. Afghanistan's "downward spiral" is a direct result of the Bush Administration's obsession with Iraq, a fixation John McCain bolstered when he said in 2001 that "nobody threatens us in Afghanistan," and when he declared in 2003 that we could afford to "muddle through." [NY Times, 10/9/08]

Kissinger-Shultz op-ed contradicts McCain's confrontational approach toward Russia. Following the Russia-Georgia Crisis, John McCain adopted an aggressive posture toward Russia, steadily ratcheting up the rhetoric of confrontation. Instantly taking sides, saying "we are all Georgians," McCain escalated tensions further by calling the affair the most "serious crisis internationally since the end of the Cold War." In the weeks that followed, his running-mate appeared willing to risk war with Russia, and both Presidential debates featured McCain using cold-war language, saying that the country has "basically a KGB apparatchik-run government." This bellicosity was rejected this week by McCain's own advisor, Henry Kissinger, who, in an op-ed written with fellow former Secretary of State George Shultz, argued: "This drift toward confrontation must be ended. However appropriate as a temporary device for showing our concern, isolating Russia is not a sustainable long-range policy. It is neither feasible nor desirable to isolate a country adjoining Europe, Asia and the Middle East and possessing a stockpile of nuclear weapons comparable to that of the United States." Implementation Day Arrives For Iran Agreement

On January 16, 2016, the International Atomic Energy Agency ("IAEA") announced that Iran has fully implemented its nuclear-related commitments described under the Joint Comprehensive Plan of Action ("JCPOA") bringing about Implementation Day under the agreement. The JCPOA is an agreement between the EU, the P5+1 countries (China, France, Russia, the United Kingdom, the United States, and Germany) and Iran under which the EU and the P5+1 countries provided Iran sanctions relief in exchange for commitments from Iran to scale back its nuclear program. Implementation Day, the second stage of the JCPOA, obligates the United States and the EU to cease the application of a number of nuclear-related sanctions against Iran. More »

CNN's New Day: CNN reported extensively on the expiration of key provisions in the Patriot Act this past Sunday, and discussed Rand Paul's role in forcing that expiration. CNN quoted the White House, other Senate Republicans, and interviewed Angus King. Coverage seemed mostly negative of Rand Paul in the early segments. CNN also reported on John Kerry's biking injury, and that he might be unable to participate in key nuclear talks with Iran, and coordinating meetings with allies against ISIS. CNN also mentioned Dennis Haskert's indictment, and Beau Biden's death. Inside Politics focused mainly on Rand Paul successfully forcing key provisions of the Patriot Act to expire: coverage was very critical of Paul, suggesting he was using the Senate floor merely as a way to promote his presidential campaign and raise money. Pundits also discussed Lindsay Graham entering the Presidential race, and O'Malley's inability to outdraw Bernie Sanders in Iowa, and his inability to whip up enthusiasm among Iowa voters so far.

Fox News' Fox and Friends: Phone call with Donald Trump; Trump said Rand Paul got his way; Trump said he didn't know if security was going to be better or not better; Trump said he didn't trust our government unless we were encountering a security situation; Kilmeade pointed out that Paul was blending being a Senator and being a candidate; Trump said what Paul was doing was not politically popular; Trump said he was going to be announcing his 2016 decision on June 16; Trump said his best trait would be security. Report on the Senate's failure to reach a deal on the Patriot Act; used footage of Rand Paul speaking on the Senate floor about the Patriot Act on Sunday; interviewed Mike Huckabee; Huckabee said it was a reflection of a dysfunctional environment in Washington; Huckabee said the President should have engaged; conversation shifted to Paul; Huckabee said that you should do the job you have – and if you want another job then quit your job and pursue the other job; Huckabee refused to impugn Paul, said Paul's been consistent on privacy; Huckabee said the Freedom Act passed by the House was better than the Patriot Act.

MSNBC's Morning Joe: Lindsay Graham is running for president and is launching it later today. He is down in the polls and his home state papers questioned his chances. He comes from the other side of the party as Rand Paul which shows how divided the party is. Martin O'Malley announced his presidential run this weekend as well. Showed footage from announcement of O'Malley saying the president of Goldman Sachs said he'd be okay with Bush or Clinton "royal families." Report stating that Bernie Sanders got a massive turnout in Minneapolis while he's facing questions about a controversial essay he wrote in 1972. New Bloomberg poll shows HRC at 57%, Sanders at 16% and Walker at 17% in the lead although he is still not an official candidate. Hunt says Sanders may prove to be the perfect "protest candidate" and is more trouble to HRC than people realize. Panel said they would not be surprised to see a poll closer to Iowa Caucus with Sanders in single digits of HRC.

Dallas Billionaire, McCain bundler, is anti-Obama group's backer

The spokesman for the American Issues Project , the independent group whose ad is the most negative of the cycle and links Obama to terrorism, says the group just filed a report naming its sole donor.

The donor, spokesman Christian Pinkston said, is Dallas billionaire Harold Simmons, who made his first fortune in chain pharmacies and is now listed as the 73rd richest person in the world, with a net worth estimated by Forbes at $2.1 billion.

Simmons, a major Republican donor, gave maximum $2,300 contributions to Senator John McCain last year, as well as to former Governor Mitt Romney and to former Mayor Rudy Giuliani.

He's listed as a bundler for the McCain campaign on McCain's website , which says he's raised between $50,000 and $100,000 for the Republican candidate.

He's also contributed to Rep. Chet Edwards, the Texas Democrat who has been mentioned as a possible Obama running mate.

Simmons was reportedly a major donor to the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth in 2004.

He's also a backer of a controversial plan to store nuclear waste in West Texas, which his waste management company would administer.

DMR : Endorsement: Hillary Clinton has needed knowledge, experience

If there's one thing Democrats and Republicans agree on this year, it's the fact that the next president will face enormous challenges.

Domestically, this president must work with Congress in confronting the issues of immigration, health care, increased threats to national security, the disappearing middle class, the growing deficit, Social Security solvency, gun control, renewable energy, sentencing reform and more.

On the world stage, this president will have to work with foreign leaders in dealing with ISIS and other terrorists, climate change, the containment of nuclear threats posed in North Korea and Iran, the Russian incursions in Ukraine and foreign trade.

The presidency is not an entry-level position. Whoever is sworn into office next January must demonstrate not only a deep understanding of the issues facing America, but also possess the diplomatic skills that enable presidents to forge alliances to get things done.

By that measure, Democrats have one outstanding candidate deserving of their support: Hillary Clinton. No other candidate can match the depth or breadth of her knowledge and experience.

As first lady, she worked tirelessly on health care reform and, with bipartisan support, created the Children's Health Insurance Programthat provides coverage for 8 million children.

As a senator, she reached across party lines and joined forces with conservatives, including Sen. Lindsey Graham and former House Speaker Newt Gingrich, to fight for job creation and universal health care.

RELATED:A history of Register caucus endorsements

As secretary of state, she helped secure international sanctions against Iran and redefined her job by expanding America's diplomatic agenda to include poverty, women's rights, the environment and other issues.

She is not a perfect candidate, as evidenced the way she has handled the furor over her private email server. In our endorsement of her 2008 campaign for president, we wrote that "when she makes a mistake, she should just say so." That appears to be a lesson she has yet to fully embrace.

Her changing stance on gay marriage, immigration and other issues has invited accusations that she is guided less by personal conviction than by political calculations. She refutes that, and argues persuasively that a willingness to change one's thinking on specific issues, while remaining true to what she calls "the same values and principles," is a virtue, one lacking in most politicians.

Over the course of two meetings, Clinton spent more than three hours with the editorial board, answering questions in a direct and forthright manner. She exhibited an impressive command of the issues, though we'd have liked to hear more fromher on the debt and the future of Social Security. She was somewhat prickly and defensive when discussing her emails, but overall she was gracious, engaging and personable.

Her chief opponent for the nomination, Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont, has proven to be an honorable and formidable campaigner, and it's very likely that without him in the race, candidates in both parties wouldn't be discussing America's growing inequality in wealth and income.

Sanders has tapped into the public's anger and frustration with Washington, without demonizing government and resorting to the cheap demagoguery favored by Donald Trump and others. He has shown himself to be a man of courage and principle who has the ability to rally others to his cause.

But Sanders admits that virtually all of his plans for reform have no chance of being approved by a Congress that bears any resemblance to the current crop of federal lawmakers. This is why, he says, voters can't simply elect him president, but must instead spark a "political revolution."

Easier said than done. Congress has the largest Republican majority since the 71st Congress of 1929-31.

A successful Sanders presidency would hinge on his ability to remake Washington in his own image. It's almost inconceivable that such a transformation could take place, even with Democrats controlling both chambers of Congress.

As for Martin O'Malley, the data-driven, wonkish former Maryland governor who has gained little traction in the campaign so far, he seems better suited to a Cabinet-level job in a Clinton White House.

In the final analysis, Iowa Democrats will have to choose between the lofty idealism of Bernie Sanders and the down-to-earth pragmatism of Hillary Clinton. For some, this will be a choice of whether to vote with their hearts or their heads.

Clinton has demonstrated that she is a thoughtful, hardworking public servant who has earned the respect of leaders at home and abroad. She stands ready to take on the most demanding job in the world.

Roll Call: Burns Strider: Attacking Hillary's Strengths: Lame Duck GOP Oughta Take a Holiday Break

By Burns Strider
Dec. 4, 2014, 5 a.m.

The holiday season has arrived and Americans are decorating trees, taking toys for their children out of layaway and planning holiday parties. Former Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton will be celebrating the holidays for the first time with her brand new grandbaby. 'Tis the season for family, reflection and worship. Republican operatives, though, are busy attacking Hillary Clinton. They are stuffing their stockings with hopes that Clinton will decide not to run for president.

They oughta take a holiday break.

Clinton's decision-making process is demonstrative of the leadership she will bring to our presidency if she decides to run: thoughtful, critical and with the best interest of our country in her heart. We know this because she has approached her entire lifetime of public service in such a manner.

She deserves and requires the space to make this decision on her own. And, really, the American people deserve this type of thoughtful and sincere leadership.

But the right wing has set itself to attacking her during this lame-duck session of Congress following the midterm elections and the new Republican congressional majorities.

Potential Republican presidential candidates, including those in Congress, are attempting to disparage Clinton's enduring and resilient strengths. The right wing is propping up lines of attack attempting to tear down Clinton's message of renewing American upward mobility. These attacks, which lack any substance, derive from their fear of Clinton's ability to connect to the middle class and their lack of any coherent message.

Clinton's passion for ensuring the American dream is alive and well for every person comes from her own personal journey and fundamental understanding that opportunity and upward mobility must be real in the lives of Americans. The approaching Republican Congress would do quite well to join in this message instead of unleashing its hounds with more petty, partisan politics.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton made 45 campaign stops for Democrats in the last 60 days before the 2014 election. She proudly fought for and stood with Democrats in every region of our nation because she believes in her fellow Democrats and embraces the values and principles of the Democratic Party as being distinctly good for America, distinctly American.

With so many people excited about a potential Clinton presidential run, the crowds at her events were huge. More importantly, Clinton's message and commitment to building a strong middle class, where work is rewarded with opportunity, resonated. Women, for example, supported Democrats more in 2014 than they did in 2010, and in many states — including Colorado, Louisiana, Michigan, Minnesota, New Hampshire and North Carolina — the increase in women's support for Democratic candidates occurred after Clinton campaigned for those candidates.

Americans know her mission is one of empowering families, valuing our communities and making the American Dream real for every single citizen. Hillary Clinton works hard, stands up for families and communities, seeks common ground for the common good and believes in a Democratic Party that is empowered to be as strong and good as the America we all want to build.

Clinton will make a decision based on what is best for her family and her country; for our future. Americans applaud real leadership like this. And, as is the usual case, our fellow Americans are correct.

'Tis the season for hope.

The Hill blog: Ballot Box: "Pro-Clinton group hits back against paid speeches attacks"

By Peter Sullivan

December 3, 2014, 2:22 p.m. EST

A pro-Clinton group is hitting back against a focus on Hillary Clinton's paid speeches and lifestyle, arguing that she is in fact a champion of the middle class.

The memo, from Correct the Record executive director Isaac Wright, indicates that some Clinton supporters feel the need to respond to the talk of Clinton's speaking fees and travel requirements.

"It is important, now more than ever, not to cede one of Clinton's greatest strengths—her passion for advancing the middle class and renewing American upward mobility—to the right-wing talking points factory and its efforts to sow seeds of mistrust on the left," the memo states.

Clinton has faced scrutiny over paid speeches and the travel requirements around them. The Washington Post reported last week on the details of Clinton's speech to UCLA in March, where she was paid $300,000, a sum that went to the philanthropic Clinton Foundation.

The report detailed that Clinton's staff had detailed requirements, rejecting the podium the university first planned to use and calling for hummus and sliced fruit backstage.

BuzzFeed reported last month that Democrats spent at least $700,000 to fly Clinton on a private jet to her midterm campaign appearances this year.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Conservative groups like America Rising PAC have seized on these reports to paint Clinton as out of touch, and the narrative could fuel calls on the left for a more populist candidate like Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.).

"The right wing is propping up lines of attack on Clinton's speaking engagements and other points in an attempt to tear down Hillary Clinton's message of renewing American upward mobility," the memo states. "This is a classic Karl Rove strategy of attacking an individual's strength, rather than a weakness."

A major question ahead of a likely Clinton campaign is what her central message will be. The memo points to Clinton's "emerging themes of economic opportunity and advancing the middle class."

It points to Clinton's work on expanding health insurance as first lady, and support for measures like raising the minimum wage and progressive tax policies as a senator.

"Hillary Clinton was raised in a middle-class, suburban home in Illinois," the memo states, pointing to a life story that Clinton herself also highlighted on the midterm campaign trail.

In June, after Clinton came under fire for saying she was "dead broke" upon leaving the White House, former President Bill Clinton defended her.

"She's not out of touch," he said.

Washington Post blog: Post Politics: "As Hillary Clinton ponders 2016, Clinton-themed super PACs seek a piece of the action"

By Matea Gold

December 4, 2014, 7:00 a.m. EST

Hillary Rodham Clinton may not yet be ready to announce whether she'll launch a bid for the White House in 2016 just yet, but a growing crowd of political operatives are ready to to get in on the action of her expected candidacy right now.

Along with high-profile outside groups being run by Clinton allies such as Priorities USA Action and Ready for Hillary, there are more than a dozen other Clinton-specific super PACs registered with the Federal Election Commission – including three set up in the past six weeks.

Most have raised paltry sums or have not filed finance reports, but several are pulling in sizable donations and mobilizing supporters in support of -- or opposition to -- her potential presidential bid. Some have launched slick websites and started selling Clinton-themed merchandise, giving them the trappings of other well-established groups.

Their independent activities could contribute to a chaotic political environment for Clinton, who as a candidate would not be able to coordinate with super PACs working on her behalf.

Clinton spokesman Nick Merrill declined to comment.

The expanding cottage industry of pro-Clinton super PACs includes groups such as Faith Voters for Hillary, Hillary 2016 and Hillarypac.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The latest entrant, Stand With Hillary, says it will use social media to promote her image with Latinos and working families.

The California-based group is the project of Daniel Chavez, a longtime Democratic political operative, and media producer Miguel Orozco, who wrote a series of Latin-flavored songs celebrating Barack Obama in the 2008 election.

The super PAC's Web site features a three-minute music video of a country ballad called "Stand With Hillary," written by Orozco. In the video, a young cowboy plays guitar and gazes lovingly at his wife and young daughter, as images of Clinton through the years flash by. At one point, he sings, "Let's smash this ceiling," and takes a sledgehammer to a large glass panel spray-painted with "2016."

Chavez, who worked as a field organizer for Clinton's 2008 campaign, said that he was inspired to start the super PAC by his wife and 32-year-old daughter, who are both also huge Clinton fans.

"She motivates my daughter to look for greater avenues to have a voice — that kind of inspiration is priceless," he said.

Chavez said he also supports groups such as Ready for Hillary, but wanted to have his own venture.

"I'm pretty independent in how I like to work," he said. "We just thought we could control our message."

The operatives behind some of the other new Clinton-themed groups remain a mystery.

On its website, Blue Answer calls itself "a rapid-response communications PAC" set up by "a team of experienced marketing and communications professionals" to "combat the lies being spread by the conservative media."

Its only apparent project is "Hillary Today" — a page featuring a large photo of Clinton and a request for supporters to donate between $20 and $500.

"Your contribution will be used to reach thousands of people and to help get Hillary elected," says a statement on the donation page.

The super PAC's treasurer, Jennifer May, declined to comment on who is running the group and what it plans to do. Blue Answer's founders did not respond to requests for comment The Washington Post relayed through May.

Blue Answer appears to be trying to fashion itself as a version of Correct the Record, a project of the Democratic super PAC American Bridge.

Adrienne Elrod, a spokeswoman for Correct the Record, declined to comment on the new group.

"Organizations in support of Hillary Clinton and her vision of how to move our country forward have come together organically in an unprecedented and united front," she said in a statement. "The right wing has certainly made early and intense efforts to dissuade her from running, because they know that Hillary Clinton's focus on advancing the middle class and moving our country forward is one that excites Americans."

A large share of the early super PAC activity hasn't sprung from Clinton's supporters -- it's being driven by the deep animosity on the right toward the former Secretary of State. A new group, Veterans Against Hillary, was formed on Nov. 25, set up by a well-known GOP political compliance firm based in Georgia.

"There is nothing better for the conservative movement than Hillary Clinton, because she is such a robustly disliked character," said Dan Backer, a Republican campaign finance attorney who is helping run one of the biggest anti-Clinton groups, Stop Hillary PAC.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The super PAC, which formed last year, has raised $1 million so far and says it has a database of 600,000 activists.

“Our whole focus has been to build a massive digital army to keep her from getting the nomination or winning the election,” Backer said.

Washington Post: Mary Landrieu, Deep South’s last Senate Democrat, must fend for herself

By Sean Sullivan and Karen Tumulty
December 3, 2014

BATON ROUGE — There remains the formality of a runoff election on Saturday — but as far as the national Democratic Party is concerned, three-term Sen. Mary Landrieu of Louisiana is presumed dead.

The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee canceled its plans to buy ads and is not lifting a finger — or writing a check — to save her. Nor are any of the heavy-hitting Democratic outside groups.

“I am extremely disappointed,” she said Tuesday of the DSCC’s decision. “You know, they just walked away from this race.”

So with the odds stacked heavily against her, Landrieu soldiers on virtually alone — this year’s political equivalent of those holdout Japanese infantrymen who were discovered waging war on remote Pacific islands decades after World War II had ended.

“The political true bloods have moved on to 2016,” said Brad Dayspring, a spokesman for the National Republican Senatorial Committee.

It wasn’t supposed to be this way. There was a time when both parties thought control of the Senate might hinge on the results of the Bayou State runoff election.

But whatever happens Saturday will not change the balance of power on Capitol Hill. By comfortably winning a majority on Election Day, Republicans turned the contest between Landrieu and her challenger, Republican congressman Bill Cassidy, from a campaign firefight into a footnote.

And whether she wins or loses, her Energy Committee chairmanship — the gavel she touted as Exhibit A of her indispensability to this oil-producing state — will be handed to the Republicans in January.

Emphasizing her clout as a chairman “was a short-sighted strategy, and when it was removed, they were left with nothing,” Dayspring said.

Her expected defeat would mark the end of an era. Landrieu — whose father is a former mayor of New Orleans and whose brother is the current one — is the last statewide Democratic elected official in Louisiana, a state her party once was presumed to own in perpetuity. If she loses, there will be no Democratic senator from the Deep South in the new Congress.

Landrieu’s home-state supporters are doing their best to gin up enthusiasm.

“It’s the fourth quarter!” bellowed Louis Reine, a feisty union leader rallying support for Landrieu as dusk settled over this city Tuesday evening. “We’re on the 10-yard line! We have a great quarterback! Will you call in the reserves? Will you get the team on the field?”

Landrieu dropped her right arm back and brought it forward as if to throw a football down the field. Supporters assembled steps from City Hall that crisp evening cheered her on.

But national Democrats speak — not for attribution, of course— as though they have already left the field and headed for the locker room. Their dispirited donors, they say, are tapped out and unwilling to open their wallets for a lost cause.

All along, Landrieu’s biggest hurdle has been the political climate, which helped the Republicans take eight other Democratic-held Senate seats.

Party strategists also fault her campaign for disregarding advice from Washington and spending virtually all of its war chest on the November election, in hopes of avoiding a runoff. She got just over 42 percent of the vote in the eight-candidate field — eight percentage points shy of the showing she needed to win outright.

Now Cassidy is expected to consolidate most of the support of those who voted for the other six candidates.

Turnout could also be a problem for the Democrat. African American voters supported Landrieu overwhelmingly in the Nov. 4 all-party primary. But early-voting tallies suggest that the electorate will be whiter and more conservative in the runoff.

The DSCC canceled its reservations for ad time in Louisiana shortly after the Nov. 4 sweep. Senate Majority PAC, which spent millions trying to save Democrats, has not run a single spot in the runoff. Landrieu’s only reinforcements have come from some modest ad buys by a handful of groups, and some individual fundraising efforts, including one in New York on Monday headlined by former secretary of state Hillary Rodham Clinton.

Though Republicans have also scaled back their efforts in Louisiana — in their case, a sign of confidence — Landrieu is still being heavily outspent.

Pro-Cassidy groups are on pace to air more than $5.65 million worth of ads in the runoff, including more than $1.4 million from the National Republican Senatorial Committee, records show.

An analysis of data by Kantar Media/CMAG for the Center for Public Integrity found that outside groups allied with Cassidy have put up about 6,000 ads during the runoff period. That compares with fewer than 100 by those supporting Landrieu, whose most active supporter has been the Humane Society Legislative Fund.

The lack of a national rallying cry has driven Landrieu to frame the race as a local contest, highlighting her record on jobs, education and disaster relief.

At a sun-soaked rally across the Mississippi River from New Orleans on Tuesday morning, with the sound of pile drivers echoing in the background, Landrieu's standard stump speech — delivered partly in the past tense — seemed to sound an almost elegiac note. "It has been my joy to represent you, to fight for you and to win for you in Washington," she said.

"When we heard that the national Democratic Party pulled out, it really kind of stunned us," said Harriet Jones of Baton Rouge, who backs Landrieu. "When we thought about it, we thought, you know, they've just given up on us. It's disappointing."

On her own, Landrieu has flailed, veering from one issue to another. Last month, she spearheaded a push to pass a measure pressuring President Obama to construct the Keystone XL pipeline. It fell short in the Senate by one vote thanks to her own party's opposition. But it passed in the House, where Cassidy's name was strategically attached to it.

More recently, Landrieu has been hammering Cassidy over his work as a part-time physician and teacher at Louisiana State University. After a local blog revealed details about Cassidy's time sheets that raised questions about the amount of time he put in and whether it overlapped with congressional work, LSU said it would look into the matter. Cassidy, who has kept a lower profile than Landrieu in the final week of the race, has denied wrongdoing.

In contrast with Landrieu, he has leaned heavily on a less muddy — and more potent — line of attack: He has tied Landrieu to Obama, using the same argument that helped propel Republicans to victory across the country.

"Senator Landrieu represents Barack Obama. I represent you," he said Monday at the candidates' final debate.

According to Nov. 4 exit polling, Obama's job approval rating in Louisiana was just 39 percent. Fifty-nine percent of voters disapproved.

In response, Landrieu has tried to strike a tricky balance between distancing her candidacy from the president and defending him.

"This isn't about whether you like Bill Clinton as president or George Bush as president or Barack Obama as president," she told reporters.

Yet Landrieu has also run a radio ad geared at African American voters who support Obama that suggests Republicans would try to impeach the president if Cassidy wins — an idea GOP leaders have not embraced.

This week, Landrieu accused Cassidy of being "disrespectful" to Obama. Asked what she meant by that, Landrieu said: "He refers to him by his last name. Constantly."

She added: "If you are going to refer to the president of the United States, he's at least earned the title that the people gave him when they elected him."

If an unpopular president has brought her to this lonely moment, Landrieu is making a long-shot bet that he might help pull her through it.

Associated Press: "Obama, Hillary Clinton 'catch up' in Oval Office"

[No Writer Mentioned]

December 3, 2014, 5:20 p.m. EST

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Barack Obama has met privately at the White House with his former secretary of state, Hillary Rodham Clinton.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The White House says Obama and Clinton met for about an hour in the Oval Office "to catch up and enjoy an informal discussion on a wide range of issues." The White House did not say which issues were discussed.

Obama and Clinton have met occasionally since she left the administration shortly after the 2012 election. Wednesday's meeting comes as Clinton is weighing a decision on whether to pursue another bid for the White House. She lost the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination to Obama.

Obama recently said Clinton would make a "great president" but added that he thought Americans would want a "new car smell" in the 2016 election.

Politico: "Clinton in the void"

By Maggie Haberman

December 3, 2014, 5:46 p.m. EST

[Subtitle:] She faces a challenge in how to spend her time before a 2016 decision

She's not going to announce her 2016 plans for at least another six weeks — possibly longer.

So the question for Hillary Clinton has become how to fill the space between the midterms, when she made dozens of appearances on behalf of embattled Democrats, and the launch of her own presidential campaign, should she decide to run.

Clinton's camp clearly hopes to delay the window in which she is treated like a candidate. But with a sprawling shadow campaign effort in effect for more than 18 months, Clinton will be viewed through a political lens regardless.

The tension she faces was on display Wednesday at Georgetown University, where the former secretary of state delivered a brief speech on "smart power" at the Institute for Women, Peace and Security, which she founded three years earlier.

The theme of the appearance wove Clinton's work at the State Department into her infamous 1995 speech on women's rights at a United Nations conference in Beijing. Her work on the No Ceilings project at the Clinton Foundation, a massive data-gathering effort to document women's participation globally, was also referenced.

But the appearance was announced only a few days ahead of time and came during the last week of classes for the semester, and Gaston Hall, where she has spoken before and has packed the room, was barely half-full. Republicans seized on pictures of the empty balcony during her speech.

Clinton delivered a short address, then engaged in a brief question-and-answer session with her close adviser and friend, Melanne Verveer, who is the executive director of the institute, and another speaker. Overall, Clinton's comments and the event broke little new ground at a time when she has been avoiding making news.

The Georgetown event fell two days after Clinton was the featured speaker at a League of Conservation Voters dinner in Manhattan, where her sweeping speech on the environment was largely pleasing to the audience, but covered no new ground and was similar to a speech she gave about energy in Las Vegas in September.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Taken together, the two events highlighted the challenge Clinton faces in this stretch of time: She's a non-elected official who is still viewed as an incumbent. And while she became deeply political again in the fall due to the midterms, she is downshifting back into neutral territory now as her own likely campaign has been pushed into early next year.

People close to Clinton stress that although she is expected to run for president, she hasn't firmly made a decision. But not being a candidate has meant, for instance, that there have been relatively few calls for her to comment on issues dominating headlines, like the grand jury decisions in fatal cases involving unarmed black men and police in New York and Missouri.

But in 2006, when Clinton last prepared for an almost-certain campaign, she was a sitting senator with existing infrastructure and the predictable rhythms that come with a legislative office. This time, her circumstances are different.

It's like watching the movie theater employee in charge of the projector try to entertain the audience while changing the film reels.

"This is the first such institute of its kind at a leading American university," said Clinton, adding that the goal was to make women "fully integrated into the process of making peace and keeping peace."

Women "are not just victims of conflict, they are agents of peace and agents of change," she said.

"Smart power" was Clinton's organizing principle while she was secretary of state, and it's a theme she's explored many times since leaving Foggy Bottom.

But the event felt much more like those Clinton held in her early days after leaving State than those she's held in the last six months, when she answered questions about the news of the day at a string of interviews promoting her book, "Hard Choices."

On Wednesday, she took two questions from students that had been written down ahead of time.

She discussed issues such as the military situation in Ukraine. In her speech, she mostly spoke without looking at her notes. She was late, beginning about 20 minutes after the anticipated start time because of what were described as "weather delays."

Washington Examiner: "Journalists claim 'Hillary fatigue,' but keep asking if she'll run"

By Eddie Scarry

December 3, 2014, 2:48 p.m. EST

Many in the political news media are suffering from "Hillary fatigue," they say. Then they sit up and type out a story or do a TV hit speculating when she'll announce her 2016 intentions.

It's proving to be a cycle that serves as a placeholder until former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton officially declares or declines her candidacy.

Jonathan Capehart, a liberal columnist for the Washington Post, believes that to be the case. "The media is tired of her because they've been talking about Hillary 2016 since the day after the Obama 2012 re-election," he told the Washington Examiner. "We won't know if the general public is tired of Clinton until she officially announces. And that's still a big if."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The latest CNN poll shows Clinton remains a clear favorite among U.S. adults who describe themselves as Democrats or who lean Democratic. Support for her potential candidacy is at 65 percent. At a distant second is Sen. Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts with 10 percent.

“If Clinton's book tour is a prologue, then we know there will be renewed interest,” Capehart added.

A recurring pattern is for an individual commentator or journalist to write or talk about Clinton shortly before or after mentioning the “fatigue.”

In his latest column, Politico’s Roger Simon says, “Hillary needs to announce for the presidency. Soon. The media have moved from Hillary fatigue to Hillary exhaustion, and this is not helping her.”

That comes four months after he said that Clinton is “not comfortable in her own skin.” And three months after he wrote on “why Hillary hates Iowa.” And just two months after listing “four things Hillary can do to win” in 2016.

“Three columns in two months does not seem a lot to me when it comes to Hillary Clinton,” Simon told the Examiner. “In any case, I don't shy away from a subject because of how many columns I have done on it in the past.”

He admitted, though, that the news media “play a role” in Clinton fatigue. “But Clinton's book tour, her speeches around the country, and now her plans for a listening tour are all designed to generate attention.”

Donny Deutsch, a regular talking head on MSNBC’s “Morning Joe,” said in late October there’s “Hillary fatigue” across the nation. The next month on the same show, he advised how Clinton should run her potential 2016 campaign (“[W]hen you're on top, run it as if you're going out of business”).

As far back as summer 2013, CBS Political News Director John Dickerson said, “the issue lurking behind Clinton drama is really one of Clinton fatigue.”

After Clinton’s memoir Hard Choices came out, Dickerson wrote a column dissecting the book as if it were a 2016 pamphlet: “As a campaign document, 'Hard Choices' presents the picture of a methodical, hardworking public servant.”

That’s not to say there hasn’t been a saturation of Clinton coverage since last year. The New York Times in August 2013 appointed reporter Amy Chozick as its full-time correspondent covering the Clintons, “particularly Hillary.”

Politico has its own de facto Clinton correspondent in Maggie Haberman. Eight of her most recent 10 stories are about Clinton, one of which was featured Wednesday on the website’s homepage. The Washington Post’s Wednesday print edition also featured a front-page story on Clinton. Haberman declined to comment for this article and Chozick never got back to the Examiner.

Richard Grenell, a media critic and former foreign policy adviser to 2012 Republican presidential candidate Mitt Romney, told the Examiner that the Clinton “fatigue” is a product of the culture among the Washington, D.C., press corps.

“The D.C. political media is insular, parochial and functioning like a high school clique these days,” Grenell said. “Regardless of whether or not they are bored with Hillary Clinton, they should grow up and do their job by treating her like a serious candidate. Hillary Clinton deserves their respect and serious attention, as does anyone who runs for office.”

Grenell added that "the political media’s inability to aggressively report on policy issues and leadership skills, and instead focus on shallow inconsequential issues, is part of the dysfunction in Washington.”

Politico: "#Hillary, #TedCruz rule social media"

By Hadas Gold

December 4, 2014, 5:34 a.m. EST

[Subtitle:] Social media grows as platform with political reach.

Social media has no doubt who the most buzzworthy potential presidential candidates are at the moment for 2016: Hillary Clinton and Ted Cruz together accounted for 40 percent of the discussion on Facebook and nearly half — 47 percent — of mentions on Twitter among 10 top presidential possibilities in the past three months, according to new data provided to POLITICO by Facebook and Twitter.

Meanwhile, Jeb Bush's big name didn't spark much chatter at all. He garnered only 3 percent of the Facebook mentions and 2 percent of tweets, fewer than nine other would-be contenders.

The mentions cut both ways, including negative comments as well as positive ones. But they reflect the extent to which Clinton, a long-standing subject of debate, and Cruz, who casts himself as a conservative renegade, have dominated the conversation at a time when others are trying to gin up some grass-roots energy.

"Imperfect as it is, [Facebook] is probably the biggest trove of data of what actual human beings outside of Washington, D.C., are talking about day to day and that makes it intrinsically important, and these platforms are actually important for reaching people and motivating them," said Teddy Goff, partner at Precision Strategies and former digital director for Obama's reelection campaign.

"Anything that gives indication as to who's sort of breaking through and seems to be of interest and topical among the gigantic sampling of Americans is important," he added. "To the extent it's correlated to who is going to have the ability to mobilize people, that's going to have actual outcomes."

Barack Obama proved in both his presidential campaigns that social media can be a major component of an effective grass-roots campaign. And heading into 2016, some campaign data experts believe social media will be an even more powerful tool than traditional media as a way to get a message out to millions, mobilize activists and target swing voters.

Of the 27 million Facebook posts, comments and content likes related to the potential White House candidates between Aug. 22 and Nov. 22, Clinton and Cruz each were mentioned in 20 percent of the posts, according to Facebook's data scientists. Clinton topped Cruz though in the number of people talking about her with 2.3 million people making 5.6 million interactions, while Cruz had 1.8 million users referencing him in 5.6 million interactions. (POLITICO provided the list of contenders to Facebook and Twitter.)

Of the 15.9 million mentions of candidates' names or Twitter handles between Sept. 1 and Dec. 1, Cruz snagged 4.6 million mentions, or 29 percent, while Clinton garnered 2.9 million mentions, or 18 percent.

Some 185 million Americans are on Facebook, and nearly half of adults who use the site say they read political stories in the past week, according to a recent Pew report. Far fewer people use Twitter on a regular basis — Twitter estimates 65 million monthly active users in the United States — and only 9 percent say they use it to find political news, according to the same Pew report.

Nickie Titus, the digital director for the Ready for Hillary campaign, said the group has been using its social media presence to mobilize Clinton supporters in the absence of any official campaign.

"What matters is [Clinton is] part of the discourse. [It's] about having conversations and amplifying a message," said Titus. "One of the things that's really great, particularly on Twitter, is a way to amplify the message, then people can keep spreading it which you see with her hashtag or when people are retweeting her handle. It's helping her spread her word."

Following Cruz and Clinton on Facebook are Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker and Texas Gov. Rick Perry, each tied for 11 percent of the conversation, or 2.9 million interactions. Perry had 1.1 million people talking about him, while Walker had 1 million. Sens. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) and Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) follow with 8 percent for 2.1 million interactions each, though Warren beats out Paul with 900,000 people talking about her, compared with 800,000 people for Paul.

"These numbers are important because they help determine reach," said Vincent Harris, who until last month helped run Cruz's digital strategy before taking up the role of chief digital strategist for Paul's RANDPAC. "Because of how Facebook's algorithm works, engagement equals reach, so people who are not asking for engagement and aren't focused on engagement are not getting the reach they need to."

Going further down the Facebook list, Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.), a favorite of grass-roots liberals, had 6 percent for 1.7 million interactions, just ahead New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie with 5.5 percent, or 1.5 million interactions, according to Facebook. At the bottom of the list were Florida's potential hopefuls, both Republicans — Bush at 3 percent, or 700,000 interactions, with 300,000 people talking about him, and Sen. Marco Rubio with 1 percent, or 200,000 interactions, and 100,000 people talking about him.

On Twitter, mentions were counted for the politician's full name and official Twitter handles. Paul came in third with 12 percent of total mentions, or 1.9 million mentions, while Christie followed with 11 percent, or 1.81 million. Rubio fared far better on Twitter than on Facebook with 9 percent, or 1.37 million, mentions. Perry had 7 percent of the mentions on Twitter, or 1.06 million, while Walker, Warren and Sanders each held about 4 percent of the mentions, at 715,000, 690,000 and 630,000, respectively. And similar to his placement on Facebook, Bush came in last with just 2 percent of mentions, or 310,000. For the full list of mentions and search criteria on Twitter, click here.

But the high numbers on social media don't necessarily correlate to a candidate's standing in the polls — a recent CNN poll showed that among Democrats, Clinton tops the list for president versus an eighth-place finish for Cruz among Republicans.

"Looking at mentions is a topline number," said Joe Rospars, founder and CEO of Blue State Digital and Obama's former chief digital strategist. "Are people sharing mainstream press stuff, are people saying things on their own, and then, are people sharing the actual content produced by that person — which I would argue is probably the better of those three. Ultimately, it's about the reach of what the candidate or organization or in this case PACs or Senate offices are trying to accomplish."

Not surprisingly, social media mentions surge with specific news events.

Clinton's name skyrocketed on Facebook three times in the past three months. The first came about the time of her appearance at Sen. Tom Harkin's steak fry in Iowa on Sept. 14. Clinton's mentions also jumped around Oct. 26, when she tried to walk back an earlier comment, "Don't let anybody tell you that, you know, it's corporations and businesses that create jobs." Her third and biggest spike came around Election Day.

Cruz experienced two significant bumps in the past three months on Facebook. The first was on Sept. 10, when he was booed off stage after making pro-Israel remarks at a Middle Eastern Christian conference. The second and largest was on Nov. 10, when Cruz called net neutrality "Obamacare for the Internet."

A spokesperson for Clinton did not respond to requests for comment, though Titus said Clinton's high numbers despite the lack of an official page proves the power of her presence.

"She's Hillary Clinton, you know? I think that the interesting thing about Facebook and Twitter is you don't have to have an official presence. It's an opportunity for people to talk with their networks about what they care about and that's everything from the picture of your friend's baby to Hillary Clinton and what she's saying about equal pay or Jeanne Shaheen. It's great, right? It's the modern-day kitchen table in some ways," Titus said.

Cruz's digital operation has put an emphasis on outreach and engagement with the user, especially through entertainment, Harris said.

"I believe in persuasion by entertainment and I believe at the end, it's when people go in and they want to be entertained and what they want is to have interesting and unique content given to them. That's something I've been proud to work on with Sen. Cruz's team, that's what they've been doing for past 3½ years," Harris said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"[Cruz] is someone who has an ability to stir up and motivate and mobilize a certain fringe community within American politics," Goff said. "It doesn't surprise me that someone who has thrown red meat to an audience who feels very passionately about what they feel will see a lot more chatter … Cruz has a particular ability to irritate a broad swath of American people."

Unlike Clinton, Cruz has a robust Facebook presence, boasting more than 1 million likes on just one of his two Facebook pages. His most popular recent post was on Nov. 20, criticizing Obama's executive action on immigration. The post, which directs readers to a website called stopobamasamnesty.com (and subsequently asks for your name, email and ZIP code), had 79,694 likes, 16,576 shares and 12,610 comments by the first week of December.

On Twitter, where she has an official account, Clinton boasts more than 2.48 million followers. Cruz has more than 697,000 followers between his two Twitter accounts @SenTedCruz and @TedCruz.

The data provided to POLITICO by Facebook also included topics discussed related to each contender. For Clinton, the No. 1 topic of conversation was what Facebook termed Government Ethics, mostly about Benghazi, followed by Foreign Policy, Jobs and the Economy, Money in Politics and Economic Equality and Mobility.

For Cruz, the most discussed topic was Foreign Policy, followed by Jobs and the Economy, Health Care, Public Safety (mostly Ebola-related) and Immigration.

To see the full list of topics for the other contenders, click here.

"It's striking the extent to which these topics largely reflect the broader media narrative and messaging by these candidates — for instance, Elizabeth Warren and income inequality, or Jeb Bush and education," said Patrick Ruffini, partner and co-founder at Echelon Insights, a Republican research and analytics firm.

"That tells me there's something real in these numbers," he added. "And if people are talking about the candidates in relation to something that's not yet part of the media narrative, then that might be an early warning that something is up, and to monitor and respond accordingly."

This type of digital data is widely expected to become an even larger part of the 2016 campaign than in previous cycles. BuzzFeed's editor-in-chief Ben Smith in November went so far as to say that "Facebook is on the cusp — and I suspect 2016 will be the year this becomes clear — of replacing television advertising as the place where American elections are fought and won."

Ruffini agreed that the 2016 election will very likely see the digital mediums converge with traditional methods.

"Different research tools are good at different things. Polling is good at asking a series of structured questions, and social media analysis is better at understanding emerging topics and what people find important, in their own words," he said. "In 2016, I expect to see these two disciplines coming together."

Washington Post: "Hillary Clinton appears to support U.S.-secured civilian havens in Syria"

By Anne Gearan

December 3, 2014, 6:32 p.m. EST

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Rodham Clinton on Wednesday appeared to back the imposition of civilian refuge zones inside Syria, as the White House considers whether to enforce havens for rebel fighters or refugees.

The former secretary of state and potential presidential candidate also told a Georgetown University audience that the conflict in Syria has ceased to be a fight only to oust President Bashar al-Assad and is now also a scramble for territory among multiple groups and factions.

“Part of what we have to do in continuing to try to combat the depredations and criminal conduct of a group like ISIS, and continue to put pressure on Assad, is probably first and foremost a protective humanitarian approach,” Clinton said, using one of the acronyms for the Islamic State terrorist group.

That suggests wider U.S. military involvement to establish safe areas — variously called humanitarian buffers or corridors — inside Syria, or an even more comprehensive “no-fly zone.” Clinton did not elaborate on which of those options she might prefer.

A spokesman for Clinton did not immediately respond to a request for clarification on whether she would support the kind of buffer zones along the Turkish border that are under review.

The fight against the Islamic State has become the chief foreign policy challenge for President Obama and one he is likely to hand off to his successor.

If she runs for the White House in 2016, Clinton is expected to play up her experience handling national security crises. Her credentials as a relative hawk within the Democratic Party could be considered an asset in a general election contest with a Republican.

Turkey has long sought a safe zone across its long southern border with Syria, partly in hopes that some of the Syrian refugees who have crossed into Turkey could return to their country. A buffer created by the United States would primarily serve a military purpose, but the area also would surely be considered an invitation to refugees inside and outside of Syria.

“There is a lot of discussion going on,” Secretary of State John F. Kerry told reporters Wednesday in Brussels. “But it is premature to suggest at this moment of time that we are close to making a decision or moving forward with any form of a safe zone or a buffer zone.”

“We are continuing our discussions with our Turkish allies in order to have conversations about how we best bolster security in the region and deal with the problem of Syria,” Kerry said.

Any safe zone would be established without the consent of Assad and probably would bring American warplanes into more direct confrontation with Syrian aircraft.

Refugee advocates for years have sought humanitarian refuges, and a debate about whether such zones could be secured by outside air power took place during Clinton’s time as the top U.S. diplomat. Since leaving office in 2013, Clinton has gone public about being on the losing side of an administration debate over whether the United States should arm the rebels and become more deeply involved in the Syrian conflict.

The war is well into its fourth year, with no end in sight. It was not clear from Clinton’s comments Wednesday that she would back a major military expansion in Syria, which the Pentagon has long warned would be required to establish an effective no-fly zone and protect civilians or rebel fighters from Assad’s warplanes.

Obama chose to launch airstrikes and greatly expand U.S. support for the rebels after Clinton left office. The war had changed by then to become one in which the Islamic State had seized huge amounts of territory and beheaded captured Americans and Britons.

“Syria is now a multi-sided conflict,” Clinton said during a discussion of women in conflicts and peacemaking. She cited the Assad government, “propped up by Iran,” and Hezbollah and the proliferation of outside extremist groups such as Islamic State as among the players. Assad is also still getting money and weapons from his old patron Russia, she charged.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“It’s not only now a fight against Assad, it is a fight to seize and hold territory and to establish their own governance, if you will,” Clinton said.

A United Nations effort to inaugurate peace talks between Assad’s government and rebel-backed political opponents fell apart almost as soon as it began last year. U.S. officials privately acknowledge that the Syrian leader is not leaving soon and that the U.S.-led air war actually helps him remain in power.

The buffer zone along the Syria-Turkish border that is under review would open a new front against the Islamic State in Syria. It would be part of the effort to push back militants along the western part of Syria’s border with Turkey and create a relatively safe zone for U.S.-backed Syrian rebel forces to move.

CNN: “Hillary Clinton's 2016 announcement date a moving target”

By Dan Merica

December 3, 2014, 4:25 p.m. EST

If you feel like you've been hearing different dates about when Hillary Clinton will announce her run for the presidency, it's not just you.

Democrats -- some who are close to Clinton, have been close to Clinton or want to be close to Clinton -- are willing to talk about it, even if very few people besides the former secretary of state actually know.

This variable has made the when-will-she-announce question a moving target for reporters this fall.

Most recently, Politico reported Wednesday that Clinton is not expected to form an exploratory committee "until well after January 1" and that her "speech schedule indicates 2016 announcement may be months away."

This comes shortly after organizers announced last week that Clinton has added a number of seemingly paid speeches to her calendar, including two in Canada for late January and one in Silicon Valley in February. It's unlikely that Clinton would announce her candidacy before or during the midst of those paid speeches.

Here's a sampling of reports from the moving target that is Clinton's announcement date:

The New York Times, Nov. 6: Midterms, for Clinton Team, Aren't All Gloom - "Over the past few days, a consensus formed among those close to Mrs. Clinton that it is time to accelerate her schedule ..."

The Hill, Nov. 12: Clinton in no hurry to announce 2016 plans - "Sources in Clinton World say while there's been some chatter about an earlier-than-expected announcement, given the Democratic midterm thumping, Clinton is likely to stick to the timeline of making her plans known early next year."

NBC News, Nov. 17: Democrats Ready for Post-Holiday Clinton Announcement - "Hillary Clinton is expected to announce in January that she will run for president, Democratic sources say. ... She is expected to begin preparation for a campaign over the next two months."

And CNN has received similar reports from inside Clinton's circle.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Some sources tell CNN that if Clinton runs -- many still include this caveat -- her announcement will come in January 2015, much like she declared in January 2007 for her 2008 run. Others have said, however, that the former secretary of state is likely to wait later into the cycle to declare because there is no upside to getting in early.

"If she hasn't said no by January, it will be a sign she is running," said one former Clinton aide at last month's Ready for Hillary strategy session in New York, suggesting that if she had plans to get out of the race she would want to give Democrats enough time to ready other candidates.

"I think she has the time as she makes her decision," said Stephanie Schriock, head of Emily's List and a woman reportedly on the shortlist to be Clinton's campaign manager.

Clinton has also given an array of answers on the issue.

In Ottawa in October Clinton said that she will "think hard about it in a way you make a decision until after these elections," referring to the midterms. Earlier in the year, Clinton said she would make her decision "after the first of the year."

Associated Press: "Ex-Va. Dem Sen. Webb to decide soon on 2016 race"

By Alan Suderman and Ken Thomas

December 3, 2014, 4:08 p.m. EST

RICHMOND, Va. (AP) — Former Democratic Sen. Jim Webb of Virginia said Wednesday he is considering running for president because his party has splintered into a series of interest groups and failed to address the economic concerns of middle class Americans.

But for now, he's limiting his critique to the party, not Hillary Rodham Clinton.

"The Democratic party has lost the message that made it such a great party for so many years, and that message was take care of working people, take care of the people who have no voice in the corridors of power, no matter their race, ethnicity or any other reason," Webb said at a Virginia legislative preview organized by The Associated Press. "The Democratic party has basically turned into a party of interest groups."

Webb, who last month announced a presidential exploratory committee, said he would make a decision in the next few months on whether to compete for the Democratic nomination in 2016. He is one of a handful of potential Democratic candidates who have been overshadowed by Clinton, who has yet to decide but remains the dominant figure in the early campaign to succeed President Barack Obama.

The 68-year-old Vietnam War veteran and Navy secretary under President Ronald Reagan said he was concerned about the direction of the country and advocated reorienting national security and foreign policy while addressing the country's economic challenges.

"I'm not a career politician. This is not a planned trajectory," Webb said, pointing to his unlikely Senate run in 2006 that unseated GOP Sen. George Allen. "If I commit to something I will see it though."

At the AP event, Webb declined to comment on Clinton or the role she could play in a Democratic primary. But he said his own experiences in the Senate, the military and leadership roles "have helped me understand the issues in a way that I believe I could effectively lead."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I just don't want to be seen as attacking Hillary Clinton," Webb said in an interview with The AP following the question-and-answer session with reporters.

Democrats have represented interest groups rather than "working people" and those without political power, Webb added. He pointed to the lack of support in the fall elections among "white working people" for Senate Democrats like Mary Landrieu of Louisiana and Kay Hagan of North Carolina. Landrieu faces an uphill challenge in Saturday's Senate runoff race while Hagan was defeated by Republican Thom Tillis.

"The very people who would have a natural affinity for what the Democratic party used to offer feel alienated," he said.

Webb offered a mix of concerns about the country's direction, citing the need to reshape U.S. national security and foreign policy, which he said had been "on autopilot" since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. He said the Obama administration's decision to use unilateral military force in Libya was improper and expressed concern about domestic surveillance by the National Security Agency.

The former senator said he plans to decide about a presidential campaign in the next few months.

"If we get the right kind of support and the right kind of financial backing we'll move forward," he said.

The Daily Beast: "Is Gay Marriage Going Away in 2016?"

By David Freedlander

December 4, 2014

[Subtitle:] Would Rob Portman's presence on the GOP primary debate stage have pushed his fellow candidates to support same-sex marriage? We'll never know—and now the issue may be off the table.

In the long sweep of LGBT equality, it could have stood as a seminal moment.

Rob Portman, the well-respected Ohio senator and former Bush administration official, and someone well within the mainstream of the GOP establishment, could have been the first serious Republican presidential candidate to be an avowed supporter of same-sex marriage. He was not likely to win—Portman's charisma deficit has made him a perennial also-ran in the vice-presidential sweepstakes—but he probably would have done well enough to prove that being pro-same-sex marriage was not disqualifying for a Republican candidate.

As it stands, candidates do not have much of an incentive to come out in favor of same-sex marriage. Those most likely to do so, like Chris Christie or Rand Paul, already are facing suspicion from conservatives, and so are seeking to show their hard-right bonafides in the run-up to a campaign. But once Portman made room on the debate stage for an idea that has broad acceptance seemingly everywhere but among GOP primary voters, it is easy to imagine that others would have jumped on board. It's already happened in the Senate, after Portman, citing his college-age son who had recently come out as gay, wrote in a Columbus Dispatch op-ed in 2013: "I have come to believe that if two people are prepared to make a lifetime commitment to love and care for each other in good times and in bad, the government shouldn't deny them the opportunity to get married." Seemingly before the ink was dry, three other Republican senators—Mark Kirk of Illinois, Susan Collins of Maine, and Lisa Murkowski of Alaska—declared their support, as well.

But on Monday Portman said that he would not run for president, choosing to seek reelection in Ohio. Which prompts the question: In a GOP field minus Portman, what role will same-sex marriage play? Presidential primaries have a way of bringing out issues that later become policy or law. In 2008, trying to get to the left of Hillary Clinton, Barack Obama proposed withdrawing from the war in Iraq. In 1968, Richard Nixon touted his plan to end the war in Vietnam in the face of a challenge from the anti-war George Romney.

Without any diversity of opinion, candidates tend to bunch together as much as possible. In 2012, without any countervailing force to his left, Mitt Romney was forced to advocate for the “self-deportation” of undocumented immigrants, describe himself as “severely conservative,” and along with the rest of the field raise his hand at a Fox News debate when asked whether he would not raise taxes for even 10 times the amount of spending reductions.

Some polls show that as many as 59 percent of Americans favor full marriage equality, a figure that rises as the age of those polled goes down, with up to 81 percent of millennials supporting the legalization of gay marriage. But in a GOP presidential primary, “If someone takes that position, it raises trust concerns about their other core beliefs,” said Gary Marx, a Republican strategist and former head of the Faith and Freedom Coalition. “The old adage was that if you couldn’t trust somebody to do what they said they were going to do on taxes, how could you trust them to be pro-life? You are looking for a consistent conservative across the board when you are considering candidates in a presidential primary.”

In the 2012 GOP presidential primary, same-sex marriage did not come up much, in part because the candidates were all in agreement, not only with each other but with President Obama, who did not announce his own evolution on the issue until the Republican contest was all but settled. This time around, some social conservative strategists think the issues could be muted again, since the pressing questions on same-sex marriage reside mostly with the courts. In the first in the nation primary state of New Hampshire, 54 percent of Republicans favor allowing gays and lesbians to have legal civil marriage. In the first in the West caucus state of Nevada, the state Republican Party has dropped opposition to same-sex marriage as part of its platform.

But the presence of evangelical primary voters, especially in Iowa and South Carolina among the early states, means that some candidates will press their advantage.

“You could easily see a situation where a Rick Santorum or a Mike Huckabee are pressing this issue, and you hope that the rest of the field just leaves it to them,” said one pro-same-sex marriage GOP strategist.

“Traditionally, the Republican Party supports traditional marriage,” said Alice Stewart, a GOP strategist allied with Huckabee. “If Governor Huckabee were to enter the race, he has supported traditional marriage. He always has and he always will.”

Evan Wolfson, the president of Freedom to Marry, one of the nation’s foremost same sex marriage advocacy groups, said that even without Portman in the race, it is too early to tell if the GOP field will be without a marriage equality candidate, considering how fast public opinion—and with it, public officials—are moving on the matter.

“2016 is still a long time away,” he said. “Who knows what will happen?”

Wolfson pointed to a number of Republican governors who already at the very least have chosen not to fight the issue out in their states where courts or the legislature acted, including Christie and Wisconsin’s Scott Walker, who once county clerks began issuing marriage licenses said, “For us, it’s over.”

Christie, Walker, and Paul have all argued that the marriage issue is one better left to the states. Their position is identical to the one held by Hillary Clinton, a fact that delights Gregory T. Angelo, the head of the Log Cabin Republicans, a gay rights GOP group.

“Hillary Clinton has a position on marriage that is to the right of everyone else in her party,” he said. “Part of me cannot wait to see her twist herself into contortions explaining why her position is different from her party’s platform.”

In other words, expect the marriage matter to be a bipartisan affair.

“That is a fact we are certainly going to be reminding Democrats about,” Angelo said.

Washington Post column: Dana Milbank: "Hillary Clinton has lost that 'new car' smell"

By Dana Milbank

December 3, 2014, 5:08 p.m. EST

There was something in the air before Hillary Clinton addressed Georgetown University students Wednesday, but it definitely wasn't a new-car smell.

It was a faint but unmistakable whiff of indifference.

When the front-runner for the 2016 Democratic presidential nomination spoke in the same place a year ago, the room was reportedly packed. When she spoke in October, Gaston Hall again "was filled to capacity," the campus newspaper reported; some students lined up overnight and others were turned away.

But when it was time for Clinton's appearance to begin Wednesday morning, half of the 700 seats in the place were empty. After a half-hour "weather delay," diplomats and VIPs filled a few more chairs, but more than 300 remained vacant when the former secretary of state and first lady walked in wearing a robin's-egg-blue jacket and her signature pants.

Roughly half a dozen people rose to applaud, and for a terrifying moment it appeared they might be the only ones standing. But slowly, lazily, most of the others struggled to their feet.

Maybe it was just overexposure. Clinton began by joking that she'd been to Georgetown more in the last couple of years than her husband, who is an alumnus. This got a polite chuckle. A spokeswoman for the university said that this is the last week of classes, so students may be busy preparing for final exams.

But it has to be a worrisome sign for Clintonistas as they prepare to launch her 2016 juggernaut. President Obama, talking to ABC News's George Stephanopoulos last month about Clinton's efforts to distance herself from the unpopular president, said "the American people, you know, they're going to want that new-car smell." Doug Schoen, whose polling firm worked for Hillary Clinton's 2008 campaign and who now is a Fox News regular, contributed his view that his former client lacks that particular scent.

The students who did show up Wednesday did not seem dazzled. They gave another polite chuckle for her reference to Harvard as "that small university up in Cambridge, Massachusetts," but they were dead quiet during most of her speech. A few took photos with their phones; others fiddled with their hair. Several began trickling out before the 40-minute appearance was over. The main applause line Clinton generated was her reference to another woman joining her on the stage, Norwegian Defense Minister Ine Eriksen Soreide, who, Clinton said, "belongs to a small but fierce club of women who are proving they can defend their countries as well as any man."

Those who bothered to listen could have heard the rationale for Clinton's candidacy as she spoke about the need for women to play a greater role around the world in war-fighting and diplomacy. "We know when women contribute in making and keeping peace, entire societies enjoy better outcomes," she said. "Women leaders, it has been found, are good at building coalitions across ethnic and sectarian lines and speaking up for other marginalized groups. . . . They act more as mediators to help foster compromise and to try to organize, to create the changes they seek."

This is a smart way for Clinton to position herself. Last time, she largely avoided campaigning on her potential to be the first female president, until her famous "glass ceiling" concession speech. The bad news is she's now tied to Obama's foreign policy at a time when the world seems to be falling apart.

She has tried, haltingly, to draw distinctions between her hawkish views and Obama's dovish ways. But there was nothing new-car in Wednesday's appearance, where Clinton gave a brief exposition on her "smart power" theme and often lapsed into the bureaucratic and the banal.

"I'm a big believer in trying to make decisions based on evidence wherever possible," she reported. She also spoke, numbingly, of her "commitment to launch a series of practical discussions on the implementation of national action plans," and of her effort "to call for the institution of a representative to the secretary general to begin at the U.N. level to try to implement what were the sentiments and the aspirations behind these actions."

There was supposed to have been a Q&A following Clinton's remarks, but the moderator, former Clinton adviser Melanne Verveer, said there was no time for that and instead read Clinton a single question about Syria and Ukraine. Clinton ventured her opinions that Ukraine will have to "rebuild its military forces" and that "Syria is now a multi-sided conflict."

The ride and handling were stable. The acceleration and braking were adequate. But this car was not new.

Subject: [big campaign] New Questions Over McCain Campaign Chief's Ties To Ukraine

Rick Davis's Ukrainian adventure expands -- he apparently bragged about lucrative real estate he owns in the country.

http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2008/06/20/new-questions-over-mccain_n_108204.html

New Questions Over McCain Campaign Chief's Ties To Ukraine

How much does John McCain know about his campaign manager's lobbying history and potential current business interests inside Ukraine -- and when did he know it?

The stakes of the answer to that question are increasing, due both to the lobbyist problem that has thus far nagged at McCain's second presidential run, as well as the race among reporters to uncover the connection between McCain campaign manager Rick Davis and the global business and political interests in Ukraine represented by the lobbying firm that bears his name -- Davis-Manafort.

Davis's lobbying firm has long been reported as having offered political consulting services to the pro-Russian "Party of Regions" inside Ukraine. That party was on the wrong side of the 2004 "Orange Revolution" that captured many a heart in the West (including John McCain's). Since then, the firm, which Davis co-founded, has been described as instrumental in organizing a political comeback for the once-discredited Party of Regions, which emerged victorious in 2006 legislative polls.

Former U.S. Ambassador to Ukraine Steven Pifer told The Huffington Post that, in between the Party of Regions' 2004 loss and its 2006 victory, there was "an influx of the Davis-Manafort team." Pifer was not on the ground in Ukraine for the 2006 polls, but he recounted that "there was more of an American air" to the Ukrainians working with Davis-Manafort, and that they presented a more refined, media-savvy image.

What Pifer did witness was a subsequent event in Washington, D.C., during which the new Ukrainian prime minister was seen with Davis's lobbying partner Paul Manafort among his entourage. Pifer said he noticed with interest that the new prime minister's presentation was "polished and confident...and was tuned to have resonance with Americans."

And while McCain claimed in 2007 not to have known about the work of his campaign manager's firm in Ukraine until December 2006, a Washington Post report from earlier this year described how the non-profit Reform Institute, which McCain helped start up, actually shared office space with Davis-Manafort in January of 2006 -- the precise time the lobbying outfit was preparing for the March 2006 parliamentary elections in Ukraine.

Moreover, the New York Times reported last week that a National Security Council official contacted McCain's Senate office in 2005 "to complain that Mr. Davis's lobbying firm was undercutting American foreign policy in Ukraine." The Ukrainian candidate being aided by Davis-Manafort had close ties to then Russian president Vladimir Putin, and both McCain and President Bush supported his opponent.

Given this backdrop, and with the idea of lobbyists on presidential campaigns having acquired something of a foul air (thanks to the good-government noises from both presumptive nominees), the McCain camp has been steadfast in denying that its campaign manager had any association with his own firm's Ukrainian operation.

"He [Davis] was not involved in any work his firm did on Ukraine," McCain spokesman Brian Rogers told ABC News in response to the report published last week.

That denial -- which shoots past the question of whether Davis merely worked with politicians in Ukraine to the point of denying any business activity in the country whatsoever -- is now being questioned by another American consultant who served as an adviser to a Ukrainian business group during 2004. This source, who requested anonymity from The Huffington Post in order to protect his business interests, said that Davis bragged to him in 2007 about the continuing profitability of real estate investments that he held in Ukraine.

Multiple emails to top officials within the McCain campaign on Thursday asking about Davis's investments in Ukraine were not returned.

These new ties linking Davis to Ukraine, if true, could prove a problem for McCain, who tasked Davis with instituting a rigorous policy for all campaign workers in which lobbying positions and all compensation flowing from them are supposed to be forfeited during the course of the campaign. The very first dictum in that policy reads: "No person working for the Campaign may be a registered lobbyist or foreign agent, or receive compensation for any such activity."

Davis himself has already quit his own lobbying firm to work for McCain -- though if he is still receiving compensation from investments which stem from lobbying that the campaign claims Davis never had anything to do with in the first place, the potential for the appearance of hypocrisy is obvious.

At a minimum, the lack of transparency and continued speculation regarding the lobbying activities of McCain's campaign chief could smudge the portrait of integrity and reform that the Arizona Republican is trying to paint. However, the situation -- for all its complexities -- is not hopelessly convoluted. As part of his own questionnaire for employees, Davis instructed all McCain staffers to reveal the following:

> "All personnel must complete the attached questionnaire and return it Ryan Bradel in the Legal Department. It is the personal responsibility of each employee, consultant and volunteer to disclose all previous lobbying employers and clients to the Campaign and to identify issues and clients that could be embarrassing for the Senator and the Campaign."

In short: if Rick Davis is profiting from investments in Ukrainian real estate that were developed during the course of any lobbying activities there by his firm, John McCain should already know about it.

Congress Needs to Hear From Us Today on Afghanistan

Tom Andrews

This week Congress is set to authorize $550 billion in defense spending and, with it, an additional $130 billion to fight the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. Despite a Democratic President and a Democratic majority in Congress, the military industrial complex is once again running up the score: the House Armed Services Committee wants to shower the Pentagon with even more federal dollars than George W. Bush ever requested. And the flood gates of federal dollars are once again wide open for a war without end in Afghanistan.

But there is some good news. Representative Jim McGovern (D-MA) is trying to squeeze a bit of common sense into the bill with an amendment that calls on the Administration to develop what President Obama told a national television audience we need: an exit strategy from Afghanistan. Unable to get this proposal included in the Supplemental Defense Appropriation bill a few weeks ago, Rep. McGovern has since introduced it as a bill that has already attracted 89 Congressional co-sponsors. Now he intends to propose it as an amendment to the House Armed Services Committee bill when it makes its way to the floor of the House tomorrow.

But Rep. McGovern needs our help. Call your Representative today at (202) 224-3121 and:

1. urge her/him to co-sponsor Rep. McGovern's Afghanistan Exit Strategy bill H.R. 2404, and
2. vote for Rep. McGovern's amendment to the Defense Authorization bill (H.R. 2647).

I realize how hard it may seem for Congressional Democrats to require the Obama administration to develop an exit strategy as a condition for continued funding. After all, this is our guy, right? The last thing our guy needs is a Democratic Congress second guessing, making demands, and putting conditions on the war.

But this is exactly what we and the administration need precisely because he is our guy.

Unlike Mr. Limbaugh, we want and need President Obama to succeed. The very real prospect of the United States embedded in an endless war in Afghanistan would undermine everything this administration is trying to do while imperiling the very Congressional Democrats President Obama needs to move his agenda.

Continuing our military presence in Afghanistan without an exit strategy is a bad idea for many reasons. As I've noted before, the presence of foreign troops in Afghanistan unites our opponents within the country and region and makes cooperation by key regional players like Iran, Russia and China far less likely with the prospect of tens of thousands of US troops on their border. As for those with the most at stake - Afghan people - over 80% oppose an escalation of American troops in their country.

Despite the heated rhetoric you're hearing from the right-wing echo chamber, exit strategies are an important and useful part of military planning. President Obama knows this, and that's why he has gone on the record to say that we need one for the US military in Afghanistan.

The Win Without War coalition has been working closely with Congressman McGovern and other Congressional allies on this important amendment. Coalition member organizations have stepped up: MoveOn.org, USAction/TrueMajority.org and Peace Action all sent alerts last week to their membership asking them to call Members of Congress in support of this bill. With your help today, we can easily push the number of co-sponsors from 89 to over 100. Call your Member of Congress, ask if she/he is a co-sponsor and if she/he intends to vote for the McGovern amendment to the Defense Authorization bill on Wednesday. If not, why not? And, if so, can she/he take an active role to encourage their colleagues to support it as well.

There is not a lot of good news in the Defense Authorization bill. Let's do something about that today before the votes are cast in Congress tomorrow.

BY JAMES HOHMANN

THE BIG IDEA:

— Losing some steam in both national and early state polls, Bernie Sanders has gone after Democratic frontrunner Hillary Clinton a little harder every day this week. Yesterday, he made clear that he will not go quietly and plans to really take the gloves off.

After filing his paperwork to appear on the New Hampshire primary ballot as a Democrat, someone yelled: "You ready to kick some Republican butt, Bernie?" Sanders yelled back, "There's some earlier butt we have to deal with."

The Post's John Wagner reports from Concord that the remark prompted some nervous laughter in a room packed with reporters and supporters, but it comes as Clinton's camp has increasingly tried to suggest that the senator and his team have been treating her in a sexist fashion.

Speaking to the Boston Globe editorial board yesterday, Sanders declared: "I disagree with Hillary Clinton on virtually everything." He specifically hit her for the flip-flop on trade and her delay in coming out against the Keystone XL Pipeline: "How many years do you have to think about whether or not we excavate and transport the dirtiest fuel in the world?" he said, per Annie Linskey. "It didn't take me too long to think about that."

In a Wall Street Journal interview the day before, Sanders said the FBI should fully investigate his rival's use of a private e-mail server. Though he declared "enough about your damn e-mails" during the last debate, the Vermont senator complained to reporter Peter Nicholas: "You get 12 seconds to say these things. There's an investigation going on right now. I did not say, 'End the investigation.' That's silly. … Let the investigation proceed unimpeded."

Sanders will spend this weekend in two states where he's struggled to appeal to minority voters. First, in South Carolina, he'll address African-Americans. Then, in Nevada, he will try to improve outreach to Latinos and show he can build an organization that can compete with Clinton's. Unlike Iowa and New Hampshire, the democratic socialist has trailed far behind in polls of the third and fourth states to vote in the nominating process.

Looking ahead, the AP reports this morning that “Sanders’ campaign is considering a speech, possibly in New York, to provide more details on his economic policies, including how he would seek to structure tax rates to pay for his domestic policy agenda and seek to regulate Wall Street. Other topics he plans to address are how he would serve as commander-in-chief and a domestic policy agenda that will include proposals on family and medical leave, a Medicare-for-all health care system and an expansion of Social Security benefits.”

WHILE YOU WERE SLEEPING:

— Chris Christie and Mike Huckabee have been kicked off the main stage for next Tuesday's GOP debate sponsored by Fox Business and the Wall Street Journal; Lindsey Graham and George Pataki are not even being allowed into the undercard. David Weigel : "Thirteen Republican presidential campaigns had started the week in a kind of solidarity, brainstorming ideas to make the cable news debates more fair. They ended the week in pathos and disarray, after Fox Business announced that two candidates would be shunted from prime time to an 'undercard' debate, and two mainstays of the undercard debate would not make it to the Nov. 10 forum at all." How they are reacting:

- Lindsey Graham: "It is ironic that the only veteran in the race is going to be denied a voice the day before Veterans Day," said campaign manager Christian Ferry. “In the end, the biggest loser is the American people and the Republican Presidential primary process that has been hijacked by news outlets.”

- @JebBush said that Graham should be allowed in the debate: “His foreign policy message is an important one in particular.”
- Christie defiantly tweeted #BringItOn. “It doesn’t matter the stage, give me a podium and I’ll be there to talk about real issues like this,” he wrote, linking to a Facebook video of him talking about addiction.
- Mike Huckabee: “I’m happy to debate anyone, anywhere, anytime. We are months away from actual votes being cast and neither the pundits nor the press will decide this election, the people will. Washington is stealing from seniors, punching American workers in the gut, and bankrupting our kids and grandkids. I refuse to let that stand.”

— The Florida mailman who flew a gyrocopter around restricted airspace before landing it in front of the Capitol will plead guilty to a felony that could carry three years in prison. Prosecutors had charged Douglas Hughes with enough crimes that he could have spent nine-and-a-half years behind bars for his protest against the corrosive power of money in politics. His attorney told the AP that they’ll enter the plea deal on Nov. 20 in federal court in Washington.

Ran Baratz at Hebrew University in Jerusalem in 2013 (Reuters/Olivier Fitoussi)

— Bibi picks a vehemently anti-Obama professor as his lead spokesman. Benjamin Netanyahu, who is coming to Washington to meet with Barack Obama on Monday and to ask Congress for billions of dollars in U.S. military aid, appointed a new media adviser who has called the president an anti-Semite and said that Secretary of State John Kerry has the intelligence of a 12-year-old. The Post's William Booth reports from Jerusalem: "Unless he is fired before he is officially hired, which Netanyahu hinted is adistinct possibility, Baratz will serve as the prime minister's media adviser and director of public diplomacy, a position far more central and intimate than mere spokesman: The person is tasked with shaping and selling Netanyahu's policies at home and abroad." It's especially bad timing since the point of his visit next week is to shore up liberal support for Israel. He's even going to speak at the Center for American Progress, and advisers have said he plans to emphasize how accepting his country is of gays as part of the charm offensive. Obama yesterday acknowledged that brokering a peace deal between Israel and Palestine won't happen during his presidency, but he said he will continue to pressure Netanyahu to keep open the possibility of a two-state solution, per Steven Mufson.

— Ted Cruz calls Marco Rubio a moderate and says the Republican primaries will come down to a two-way race between a conservative and a moderate: "Historically, there have been two major lanes in the Republican primary," the Texas senator told CNN's Jake Tapper last night. "There's been a moderate lane and a conservative lane. And, in past cycles, there's been a consensus moderate choice early on…Look, I think Marco is certainly formidable in that lane. I think the Jeb campaign seems to view Marco as his biggest threat in the moderate lane. And so I think they're going to slug it out for a while. But, when you look at the conservative lane, what I'm really encouraged by is that conservatives are consolidating behind our campaign… And once it gets down to a head-to-head contest between a conservative and a moderate…I think the conservative wins."

— Donald Trump stumbled again on national security questions last night, possibly confusing the B-3 bomber and the F-35. Hugh Hewitt asked The Donald if he could name anyone who would be on his defense team yet. Trump didn’t answer directly, but he congratulated himself for identifying Osama bin Laden as a threat in a book he wrote in 2000. “Well, no, but I’ve been really, you know, I’ve been pretty good in terms of that stuff. If you look at my book, in the year 2000, I said Osama bin Laden … And that was before I had aspirations politically, believe me, long before,” he told Hewitt. The conservative radio host also asked what Trump thought of the massive contract won by Northrop Grumman to produce the B-3 bomber. Trump answered by referring instead to the F-35 strike fighter, saying some pilots like the old plane better than the proposed new one. Listen to the interview here .

George H. W. Bush on July 30 (Office of George H. W. Bush via AP)

— "Father's recollections open breach among Bushes, " by Ed O'Keefe and Dan Balz: "For as long as they have been in the public eye, members of the Bush family have been known for fierce loyalty, protective of one another in the face of attacks from the outside. Rarely have they engaged in a public quarrel among themselves — until revelations this week from a forthcoming biography of former president George H.W. Bush. In the book, written by Pulitzer Prize-winning author Jon Meacham, the 41st president makes clear his displeasure with two of the leading figures in the administration of his son, former president George W. Bush — and both the 43rd president and his brother, who would like to be the 45th, were forced rather awkwardly to take sides." Here's a round-up of the most significant reactions :

- Donald Rumsfeld: "Bush 41 is getting up in years and misjudges Bush 43, who I found made his own decisions."
- George W. Bush: "I am proud to have served with Dick Cheney and Don Rumsfeld. Dick Cheney did a superb job as vice president and I was fortunate to have him by my side throughout my presidency. Don Rumsfeld ably led the Pentagon and was an effective secretary of defense."
- Jeb Bush: "My brother is a big boy. His administration was shaped by his thinking, his reaction to the attack on 9/11 I think my dad, like a lot of people that love George, want to try to create — a different narrative perhaps … just 'cause that's natural to do, right? But George would say…, 'This is under my watch, I was commander in chief. I was the leader. And I accept personal responsibility for what happened, both the good and the bad.' And I think that's the right way to look at it."
- Dick Cheney: "I took [being called iron-ass] it as a mark of pride. He said 'I was aggressive in defending, in carrying out what I thought were the right policies' in response to 9/11."
- Mark McKinnon: "The lion in winter still has claws."

— "Obama's far-reaching trade deal would lower tariffs on meat, cars and dairy," by David Nakamura: "President Obama proclaimed that the Pacific Rim free trade pact is the 'highest-standard trade agreement in history,' but opponents seized on specific provisions to argue that the final deal does not live up to promises. … The agreement calls for a phase out of subsidies some governments now give operators in fisheries that are either overfished or overcapacity, as well as an end to subsidies for vessels engaged in illegal fishing. The parties to the treaty account for a quarter of the global seafood trade, and countries such as Japan have traditionally helped offset the cost of fishing for their domestic industry. The Sierra Club blasted the environmental chapter, calling it 'rife with polluter giveaways that would undermine decades of environmental progress, threaten our climate and fail to adequately protect wildlife because big polluters helped write the deal.'"

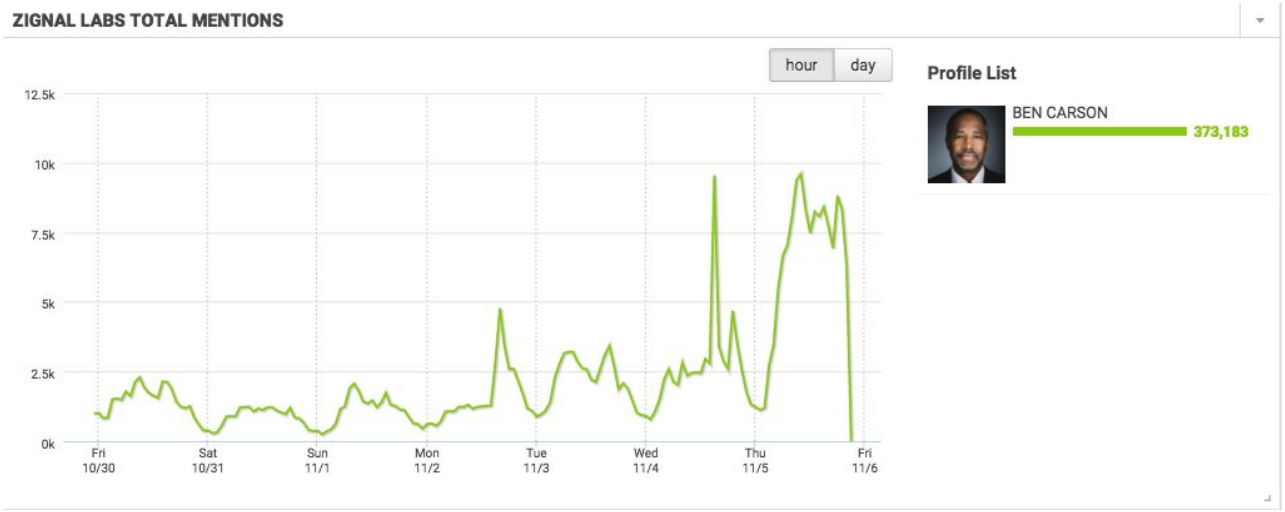
THE WORLD IS A DARK PLACE, illustrated by four stories:

— A Philadelphia woman got life in prison for locking mentally disabled people in a "dungeon" so that she could collect their disability benefits. "The victims, prosecutors said, lived in the dark and in isolation, and were fed food laced with drugs to keep them sedated; they were brutally punished if they tried to escape," per Elahe Izadi, who has more on this act of pure evil .

— Gang members in the South Side of Chicago lured a 9-year-old boy into an alley and executed him in order to punish his father, who is a member of a rival gang, police believe. The Chicago Tribune reports that Tyshawn Lee, a fourth-grader at Joplin Elementary School, was walking to his grandmother's house when it happened. He was shot repeatedly, and a basketball he always carried with him was found nearby.

— The University of California-Merced student who stabbed four classmates on Wednesday planned on killing a police officer and then using his gun to kill two others, according to the local sheriff . He was angry over being kicked out of a study group, according to a manifesto found on the perp's body. Merced County Sheriff Vern Warnke said this is not terrorism, just a step above a high school grudge, but that "the suspect did praise Allah in his writings," according to the San Francisco ABC affiliate. The sheriff also said that a bomb squad recovered Mohammad's backpack, which contained hand-cuffs, night vision scope, duct tape and petroleum jelly, which the sheriff described as s a "poor man's C-4."

— After police killed a six-year-old autistic boy in Louisiana, the superintendent of the Louisiana State Police said there's no evidence that the father who led marshals on a chase ending in a hail of gunfire from officers had a weapon in his vehicle or that anyone besides law enforcement shot weapons during the encounter, according to The Advocate of Baton Rouge.



SOCIAL MEDIA SPEED READ, Curated by Elise Viebeck (@eliseviebeck)

— ZIGNAL VISUAL: Ben Carson is getting a good taste of the scrutiny that comes with being a frontrunner: Many of the stories that the retired neurosurgeon has told about his upbringing in the past are now being called into question. A story about hitting a classmate in the head and his narrative about trying to stab an acquaintance — which has changed several times in his own telling — could not be corroborated by any of the nine friends and witnesses who were contacted by CNN reporters. He's getting criticized for comments about falling asleep at the wheel numerous times while driving over the years. His theory that the Egyptian pyramids were built to store grain was mocked yesterday by Rand Paul, who quipped that his theory is that aliens built the pyramids. He's been saying out-there stuff for months, but it's gotten less attention. Recall his recent statement that the Holocaust could have been prevented if Jewish civilians had guns.

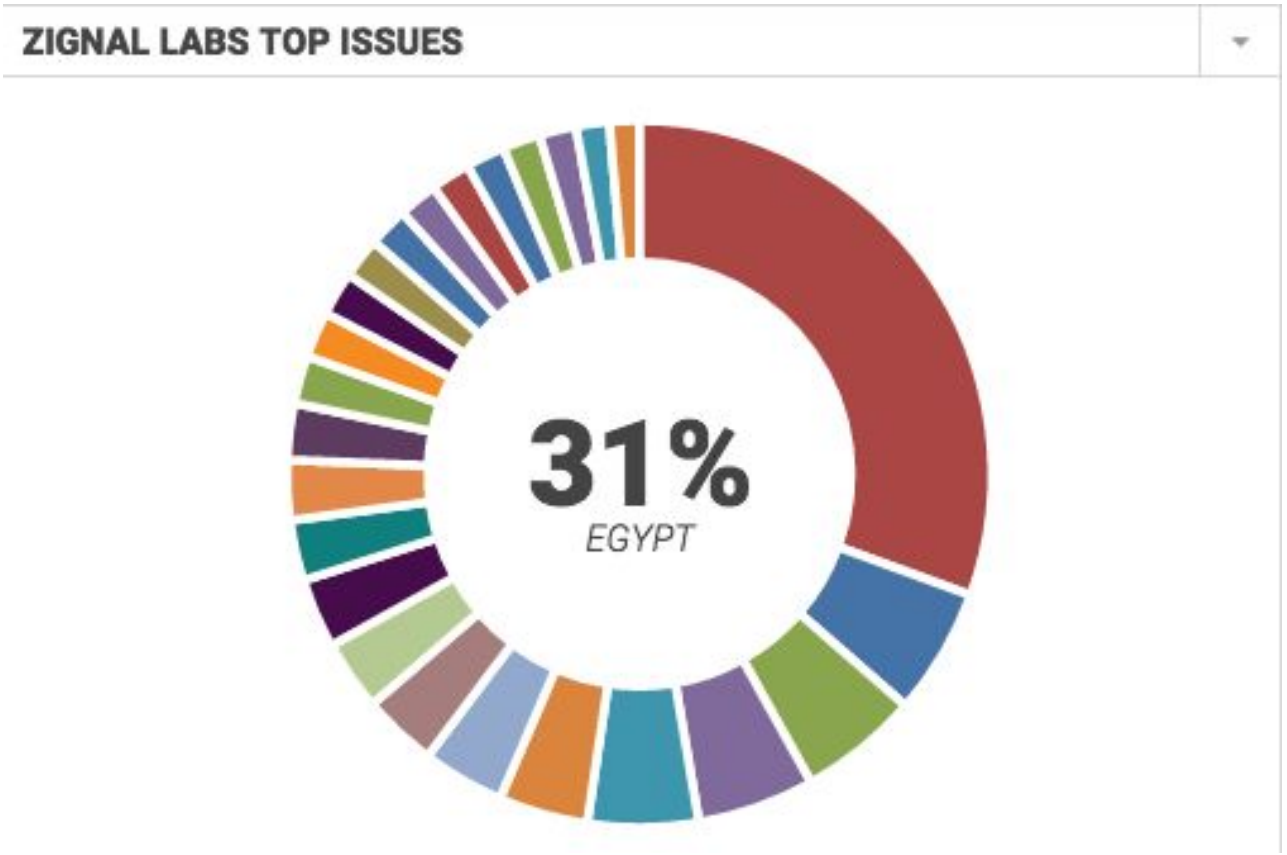
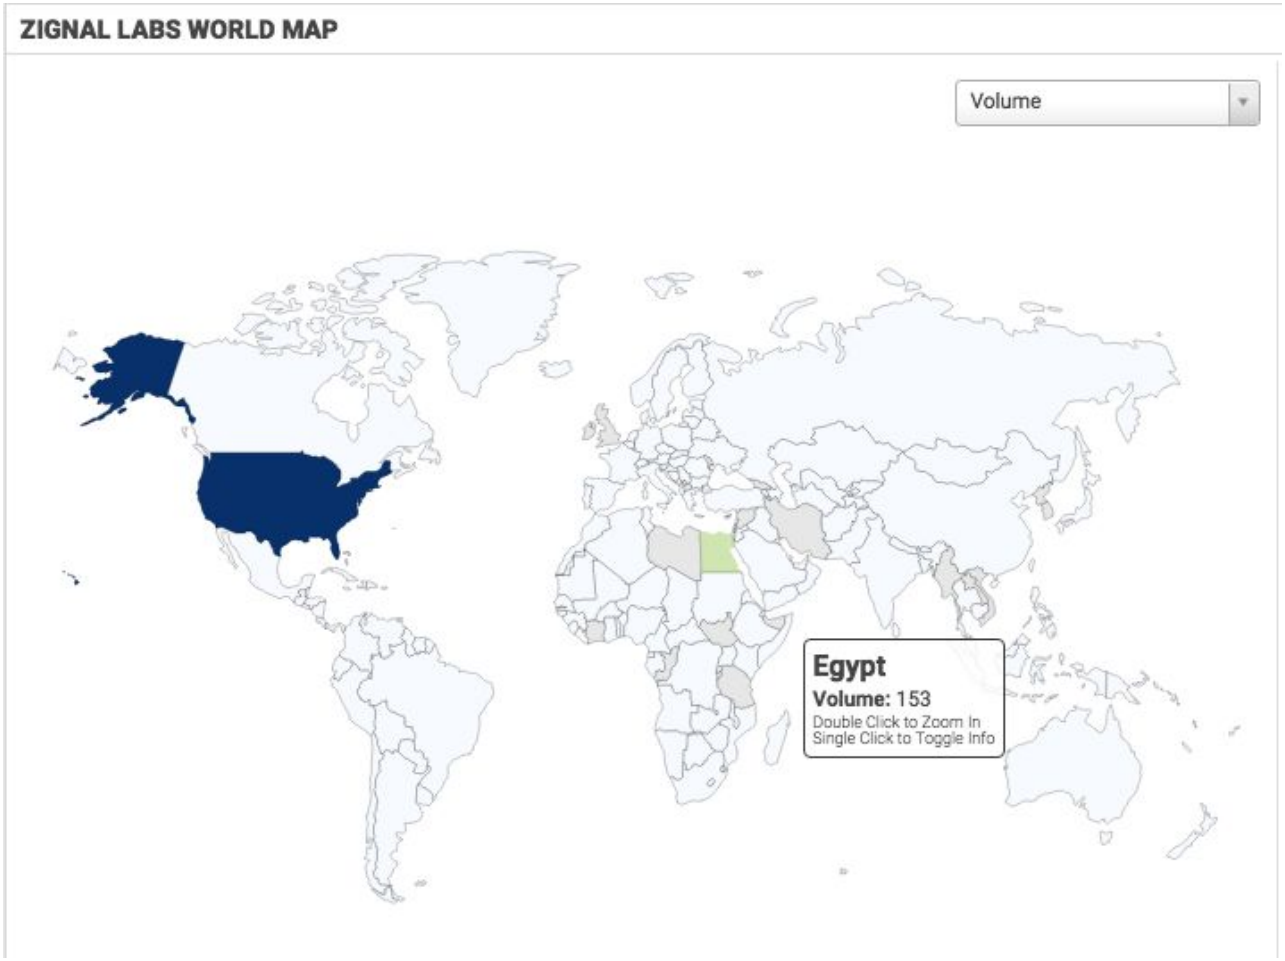
Our analytics partners at Zignal Labs visualize the degree to which Carson has finally come under the klieg lights. Look at how press coverage of Carson has spiked over the last week. Mentions of Carson increased five-fold on Thursday over his daily average at the beginning of last week:



This GIF shows how Carson has occupied an increasingly large share of the Republican chatter and coverage over each of the last seven days, going from 9 percent a week ago to 31 percent now (That means one in three mentions of the GOP presidential candidates is about Carson):

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.



The pyramid gaffe dominated yesterday's social media mentions of Carson. One-third of the above Carson mentions also mentioned Egypt!

The news has even broken through in Egypt! Since Tuesday, Zignal has tracked more than 120,000 Geo-coded Tweets about Ben Carson. About 150 of those came from Egypt. That's more mentions than any other candidate, including Trump.

GOOD READS FROM ELSEWHERE:

— CNN, "GOP warns Arkansas senator: Step it up or lose a key seat ," by Manu Raju: "The Arkansas Senate seat shouldn't be much of a concern to Republican leaders. The state has grown increasingly red during the Obama era. Mitt Romney romped to a victory there in 2012. And Tom Cotton last year unseated a scion of a powerful Democratic family, strengthening the GOP hold in the state. Then there's John Boozman. The 64-year-old Republican, facing re-election to a second term next year, has prompted growing concern from party elders who fear he risks a repeat of past election debacles — where GOP candidates in Indiana, South Dakota, Kansas and Mississippi ran shoddy campaigns, forcing a last-ditch rescue attempt by the party establishment to try to save an endangered seat. Mitch McConnell has recently had a serious conversation with Boozman about the state of his campaign, sources said, and plans to headline fundraisers for the — New York Times, "U.S. to share criminal records with Native American police," by Erich Lichtblau: "The Justice Department moved to fix what it described as 'an information gap' that has allowed offenders living on Native American reservations to buy guns illegally and for years has blocked tribal police from access to important criminal records. The flaws in the system were on stark display last year after a 14-year-old boy from a reservation in Washington State used his father's handgun to kill four classmates and himself. Investigators determined that a prior restraining order against the father should have prohibited him from buying the gun, but the order was never entered in the federal database. In an announcement timed with the Tribal Nations Conference at the White House, the Justice Department named 10 Native American tribes around the country to share criminal and civil records with the federal government through a trial program expected to cost about $1 million. Officials hope to expand the program to other tribes.

— New York Times, "Ben Carson appeals to black voters, but his campaign doesn't yet," by Jonathan Martin: "Carson has already been to Ferguson, Mo., and Baltimore this year — sites of unrest after the police-related deaths of African-Americans — as well as other black hubs such as Harlem. On Friday, his campaign will begin airing a rap-infused ad on black-oriented radio stations in several cities, and he will visit a youth center in Florida and speak to a black Republican club in the state. Later in the month, he is scheduled to attend a forum on criminal justice at the historically black Benedict College, in Columbia, S.C. Yet if Carson's potential for bringing black voters into the Republican primary illustrates a unique possibility, his efforts to win them over highlight his limitations as a candidate. Though he raised over $20 million during the third quarter of this year and primary votes will be cast in less than three months, his campaign operation has not caught up to his standing in the race. He has, for example, yet to hire a staff member dedicated to turning out black voters."

From Think Progress : "Sanders told reporters that President Obama should reject the Keystone XL pipeline before the United Nations' conference on climate change starts at the end of the month. Slightly warmer conditions are possible as we start the workweek."

— New Nationals manager Dusty Baker made a really good first impression on our sports reporters who went to see him yesterday. “Baker’s hopes for getting the Nationals back into the playoffs, after a disappointing season that cost Matt Williams his job, relies on a philosophy he developed talking to Bill Russell and Bill Walsh,” James Wagner reports. “Both told him a team has to be close, from the janitor to the administrative assistants to the owners to the players. After a season that included a dugout fight between Bryce Harper and Jonathan Papelbon, and fractured relationships between the clubhouse and manager’s office, Baker’s style could be needed.”

Hillary has so many accomplishments. here is my view of the top three.

1. Being a constant champion for children, women and families all her life.

2. Organizing the countries of the world to support heavy economic sanctions on Iran to get them to the table to end their nuclear weapons program.

3.Working and fighting for first responders after 9/11 and to bring financial and moral support to New York City and all of those affected by that tragic terrorist attack.

John -

I wanted to make certain you had a chance to read General Clark's email before tonight's midnight deadline.

As an Operation Iraqi Freedom veteran who relies on the VA medical system for my primary health care, the stakes are high next election cycle. But if we stand together, I know that we will not only elect a president who will protect our health care, education, and job benefits -- but also a new generation of progressive veterans like Tammy Duckworth, Jason Kander, and Joe Sestak who understand our needs.

Please make your $3 contribution to VoteVets before the clock strikes midnight. It is important.

Thank you for standing with VoteVets as we approach the final official FEC fundraising deadline of the year.

I entered the service over 50 years ago, and it is hard for me to remember a more important election for veterans and military family members than the one ahead.

Almost every Republican candidate for president promises to continue, or even escalate, the cycle of endless war in the Middle East. One of them has even threatened to use nuclear weapons in the region. Meanwhile, a multi-million dollar Koch-connected effort is pushing hard to privatize veterans' health care.

And then there's Donald Trump. Thankfully, the American people have consistently defeated demagogues like Donald and relegated them to the dustbin of history. But this time, it will be veterans leading the way.

With all this at stake, I want to ask you an important question:

Can I count on you to contribute to VoteVets before tonight's final FEC fundraising deadline of the year? It's important.

Subject: Question for Premier Li Keqiang -- Refined Version (+JDP edits, +Molly edit re NDB)

Good point, ideally NDB would be included in any sustainable investment standards initiatives. Updated below with Molly's edit:

As you know, 2015 presents an historic opportunity for the international community to reach ambitious new agreements on the intertwined global challenges of climate change and sustainable development. Increasing financing for sustainable development and decreasing financing for projects that add considerable climate risk will be essential if we are to achieve our global development and climate change goals. That will require applying high environmental and social standards to our investments going forward. China will host the G20 next year in the midst of a growing international dialogue on sustainable investment standards. What is China's strategy for leveraging the G20, the Asian Infrastructure Investment Bank (AIIB), the South-South Cooperation Fund, the Silk Road Fund, the New Development Bank (NDB) and other bilateral and multilateral forums to help establish common global standards in financing for sustainable development?

I'll hold until 11:00pm tonight in case folks have additional thoughts/edits. If no one else pipes up with additional changes I'll send this version out at 11pm tonight.

I like it. Might be good to add the New Development Bank (better known as the BRICS Bank) to the list at the end - China has considerable leverage there and standards remain an open question.

I like it, especially the use of "decreasing," which would get them pointed in the right direction (but also provide enough flexibility that they might go for it).

Will hold on sending until I receive either a green light or additional edits.

Background notes of potential interest:

Last Friday Zhang Gaoli attended the St. Petersburg International Economic Forum in Russia and delivered remarks re China's plans for the 2016 G20. His speech was very general but did contain some positive indicators: he said G20 nations should develop new driving forces for sustainable growth of the global economy. He also focused on China's Silk Road initiative, which he welcomed other countries to join. That suggests they are at least thinking about linking these other programs in with G20.

Terminology re China hosting G20: Turkey currently enjoys talking about the fact that they hold the "G20 presidency" but thus far Chinese state press is using the term "chair" instead of presidency.

The 2015 G20 summit will be November 14-15 in Turkey. Then Turkey hands the baton to China. The 2016 summit will be in Hangzhou, China (likely next fall, exact date TBD).

Makes sense to combine - and perhaps leading with G20 will draw out some responses about that, too.

- I wonder whether it's useful to nail down any specifics on high quality, e.g. investing in sustainable technologies and services, in ways that comply with high social and governance standards - the downside is the risk of getting too focused on a back and forth on governance, though could be interesting to specify each component to see if he responds to each.
- In the SDG financing world, China's official position is that ODA is still the main vehicle, so may be useful to say something to the effect of "increasing sustainable development financing, including harnessing a broader range of sources towards sustainable development is essential ". (REF recent official Chinese gov position paper on post-2015 which states: "Development financing should be enhanced with North-South cooperation serving as the main channel." This statement is a pure political play, since domestic resources are the main vehicle of SD financing and drove China's own rise, not to mention ODA is not terribly sustainable, but this line plays well with developing countries.) This may be adding too much into a single question, but thought it worthwhile to flag.

Cheers,
Molly

Subject: RE: Your Question for Premier Li Keqiang

John and team,

Pete combined the G20 questions into one shorter one and added a separate one on finance. Here's some updated suggested text from Pete:

(1) As you know, 2015 presents an historic opportunity for the international community to reach ambitious new agreements on the intertwined global challenges of climate change and sustainable development. How will China use its G20 presidency next year to drive further progress on these two issues?

(2) Relatedly, increasing sustainable financing -- and decreasing unsustainable financing -- is essential if we are to achieve our global development and climate change goals, and that will require applying high standards to our investments going forward. What can China do - bilaterally or through the G20, the AIIB, and other multilateral institutions --to help engrain these high standards?

I think Pete's finance language is excellent. My one concern is that if we send 2 questions, they might pick what is easiest to respond to rather than what we would find most interesting. One option would be to combine further, perhaps as follows:

As you know, 2015 presents an historic opportunity for the international community to reach ambitious new agreements on the intertwined global challenges of climate change and sustainable development. It is in this environment that China is taking on the G20 presidency, and many observers around the world will be watching next year to see how China leverages the G20 to drive further progress on these two issues. Observers will also be monitoring whether and to what degree China leverages the AIIB to achieve these important goals. Increasing sustainable financing -- and decreasing unsustainable financing -- is essential if we are to achieve our global development and climate change goals, and that will require applying high standards to our investments going forward. What can China do - bilaterally or through the G20, the AIIB, and other multilateral institutions --to help engrain these high standards?

Additional thoughts/reactions from the team?

Re: Quick Response Needed – Your Question for Premier Li Keqiang

You are attending the China Center for International Economic Exchanges (CCIEE) think tank summit in Beijing June 26-27. There will be a side meeting with Li Keqiang. Around 40 guest scholars and officials will attend. You are one of the high-level conference speakers invited to attend the Li Keqiang meeting. You have also been invited to ask Premier Li a question. In that meeting only four people will ask questions (yourself included). CCIEE tells us the questions must be submitted in advance, no later than Monday evening (June 22) U.S. time. We should treat this as a hard deadline.

We suggest posing the following question:

Next year China will host the G20. Many nations around the world will be watching to see how China handles its G20 presidency and what that tells us about how China's rise will impact multilateral institutions. What does the Chinese government currently consider to be its top priorities for China's 2016 G20 presidency? As you know, 2015 is a very big year for sustainable development and climate change. We hope to see big progress this year on the Post-2015 Sustainable Development Goals and at the UNFCCC Conference of the Parties in Paris. Is the Chinese leadership thinking about how China can use its G20 presidency to unify and strengthen G20 support for implementing multilateral agendas on sustainable development and climate change?

Please share your thoughts asap (and no later than Monday evening) so that we can pass your preferred question on to Premier Li's team.

I. Meeting Format

Li will lead the meeting and do most of the talking. He has selected four people, including you, to ask questions. There is no pre-set theme for the meeting, but we have been told you are welcome to ask questions on topics including sustainable development, think tank cooperation, and economic issues.

II. Potential Participants

The meeting hosts have invited about 40 guest scholars and officials to attend the meeting. That group includes:

BAN Ki-moon, Secretary-General of the United Nations (video speech)
Romano PRODI, President of the Foundation for Worldwide Cooperation, Professor at China Europe International Business School, Former Prime Minister of Italy
Danilo TURK, Professor of International Law, Former President of Slovenia
Kevin RUDD, President of the Asia Society Policy Institute, Former Prime Minister of Australia
Sir Don MCKINNON, Chairman of New Zealand China Council, Former Commonwealth Secretary General, Former Deputy Prime Minister of New Zealand
Grzegorz W. KOLODKO, Founder and Director of Transformation, Integration and Globalization Economic Research, Former Deputy Premier of Poland
Thomas SARGENT, 2011 Nobel Laureate in Economics, Professor of Economics at New York University
WU Hongbo, Under Secretary-General of the United Nations
William BURNS, President of Carnegie Endowment for International Peace
Nubuo TANAKA, President of the Sasakawa Peace Foundation, Former Executive Director of International Energy Agency

III. Biography of Li Keqiang

<image001.jpg>Li Keqiang (Ke-chung) is the second-highest ranking official in the CCP. He is currently a member of the Standing Committee of the Political Bureau of the CPC Central Committee, premier of the State Council and secretary of its Leading Party Members' Group. From 2008-2013, he was vice premier of the State Council and deputy secretary of its Leading Party Members' Group. In this role, he oversaw a portfolio of issues including economic development, price controls, finance, climate change, and macroeconomic management. During that time, he also directed the Three Gorges Project Construction Committee and of South-to-North Water Diversion Construction Project Committee. In 2013, he became Premier of the State Council. He has focused on economic development and meeting China's growth targets. He has also led efforts to set targets for reducing energy intensity, cap coal use, and boost renewable capacity. At a meeting of the National Leading Group on Climate Change on June 12, 2015, he backed China's commitments through the UNFCCC, stating "China stands ready to work with all other parties to ensure a comprehensive, balanced and strong agreement at the upcoming Paris Conference."

Dear Mr. Podesta,

I am contacting you with a somewhat unusual request and the hope that you might be able to convey this wish by my children to an appropriate staff person for President Obama in spite of the short notice.

Thank you. And thank you so much for the work you have been doing. I hope you are able to encourage Hillary Clinton to come out strongly to address dangers from Climate Change.

Dear Mr. President,

I hear that you are coming to our hometown of Beaverton tomorrow down the street from where my children were in a two-way Spanish immersion public school. I know this is a long shot, but I would like to tell you about the work my children and I are doing to help you stop Climate Change in case you would like to meet them.

Also, months ago, my son, who is also one of your fans, asked me to invite you to his Bar Mitzvah. Although we just learned that you will only be in Beaverton during the morning, I'm sure you would like Isaac's D'Var teaching will be on taking even more serious action on Climate Change.

My son is African-American, my daughter was born in the Marshall Islands, and my husband and I are European-American, and together we are doing all we can to impact policies especially the ones most needed to protect our planet. My son has been talking with the City of Beaverton about his petition to Mayor Doyle regarding fossil fuels and nuclear power. The links below are to the little websites I made for their Mitzvah projects, so Miko and Isaac can speak for themselves. Good thing I do not have a column on Sunday, because if I did, I would blast the living crap out of Obama for what he said about liberals at Nike, and where he said it, and why he did it. And you can quote me. Maybe I will calm down by my next column deadline. Then again, maybe I will not.

SIX YEARS OF THIS HAS SO DEPRESSED THE DEMOCRATIC BASE THAT PART OF OBAMA'S LEGACY WILL BE THE DESTRUCTION OF THE DEMOCRATIC BASE IN TWO MIDTERM ELECTIONS THAT LED TO THE DESTRUCTION OF THE DEMOCRATIC HOUSE AND DEMOCRATIC SENATE, AND THE CREATION OF A REPUBLICAN SENATE AND REPUBLICAN HOUSE.

I am sending a visible copy of this to John Podesta, because the biggest danger to Hillary Clinton is not what Republicans say, and not what Peter Schweizer writes, but that she ultimately takes liberals too much for granted and ends up like Miliband in Britain, Herzog in Israel, and Harry Reid losing the Senate in 2014.

For Obama to be insulting Harry Reid and Elizabeth Warren right now on trade is the most politically stupid and maladroit move in my memory from any Democratic president---for Obama to be insulting labor unions and progressives right now on trade is not only politically stupid for his own position but it hurts Hillary Clinton by inflaming the very Democrats who have doubts about her that liberals such as myself are trying to remedy even though I---- unlike many who travel in your circles---have no desire to get another high level job in government and no desire to become a lobbyist for banks or consultant to British conservatives or give paid speeches to oil companies.

For Obama to keep a trade negotiation secret and then tell liberals they don't know what they are talking about on a trade policy that is being kept secret from them is absurd and Orwellian and the kind of contemptuous language and attitude that is the greatest single reason that Democrats lost the House and Senate---and this attitude is the greatest single threat to Hillary Clinton's candidacy after Miliband and Herzog and Harry in 2014 learned the hard way what happens when too many liberal voters stay home.

And for Obama to say this at Nike, of all places, demonstrates his cultural and psychological ignorance of how a majority of Democratic voters and activists view trade trade policy and trade politics.....

I read portions of this note to two Democrats whose names you know and told them I would be sending to it people who could---if they chose----send this to Obama and Clinton and they told me send it, send it, and if they don't read it, write it publicly because they need to hear it.

Others will be seeing this, and Eric, you're a good guy and because you handle the press, I am alerting you to the fact that I might well be writing it publicly soon because I am fed up to the gills with the attitudes Obama's comments convey and crony capitalist mentality that so permeates a Democratic establishment and did so much damage to what was once the Democratic Congress.

I am no protectionist, but I'lll be damned if I'll keep working to help Democrats who insult me like this----and insult so many Democrats like this----you can bet your ass that I know what I am talking about, and so does Elizabeth, and so does Harry, and what Barack Obama has still not learned is that these insults of Democrats are the greatest single reason his presidency has been lobotomized because he now must sit across the table with Speaker Boehner and Majority Leader McConnell.

Today I write this privately; I make no promises about tomorrow.

Backlash brews against erasing Woodrow Wilson's name from Princeton

THE BIG IDEA:

— Many alumni of Princeton think that student protesters have jumped the shark by demanding the removal of Woodrow Wilson's name from campus because of his racist attitudes a century ago.

After activists from the Black Justice League occupied the university president's office for 32 hours last week, he agreed to consider such a move. The Board of Trustees has now formed a subcommittee to evaluate whether the former president (of both the university and the United States) should be expunged, including from the distinguished school of public policy that bears his name.

Several prominent Republicans connected to the Ivy League institution are decrying the process, which will include public meetings in the spring, as political correctness running amok.

"I am disappointed in the Administration and their reaction to it," Chris Christie, who as New Jersey's governor is an ex-officio member of Princeton's board of trustees, told the 202 in a statement.

New Jersey Republican Rep. Leonard Lance, who earned a master's from Princeton in 1982, faulted Wilson for re-segregating the federal workforce in the 1910's but said it's stupid to ignore the rest of his legacy because of it.

"George Washington owned slaves. Slavery is an indelible stain on the American nation. But I do not favor renaming the capital jurisdiction," Lance said. "This has to be taken in the context of his entire public service."

Former Rep. Jim Leach (R-Iowa), who taught at the Wilson School after three decades in Congress, suggests that the university endow a new chair for W.E.B. DuBois to defuse the controversy.

"Clearly in the resume of Woodrow Wilson, there is a weakness," said Leach, who graduated from Princeton in 1964. "To me, it's not a credible response to completely eliminate the name of Wilson."

Leach noted that James Duke made his fortune selling cigarettes, Leland Stanford used

Chinese labor to become a railroad baron, and Thomas Jefferson, the father of the University of Virginia, impregnated one of his slaves.

He added that Wilson welcomed Jewish faculty to Princeton at a time when they were still actively discriminated against at Harvard.

“Let’s acknowledge the blind spots and go forward without erasing history,” Leach said by phone from Iowa.

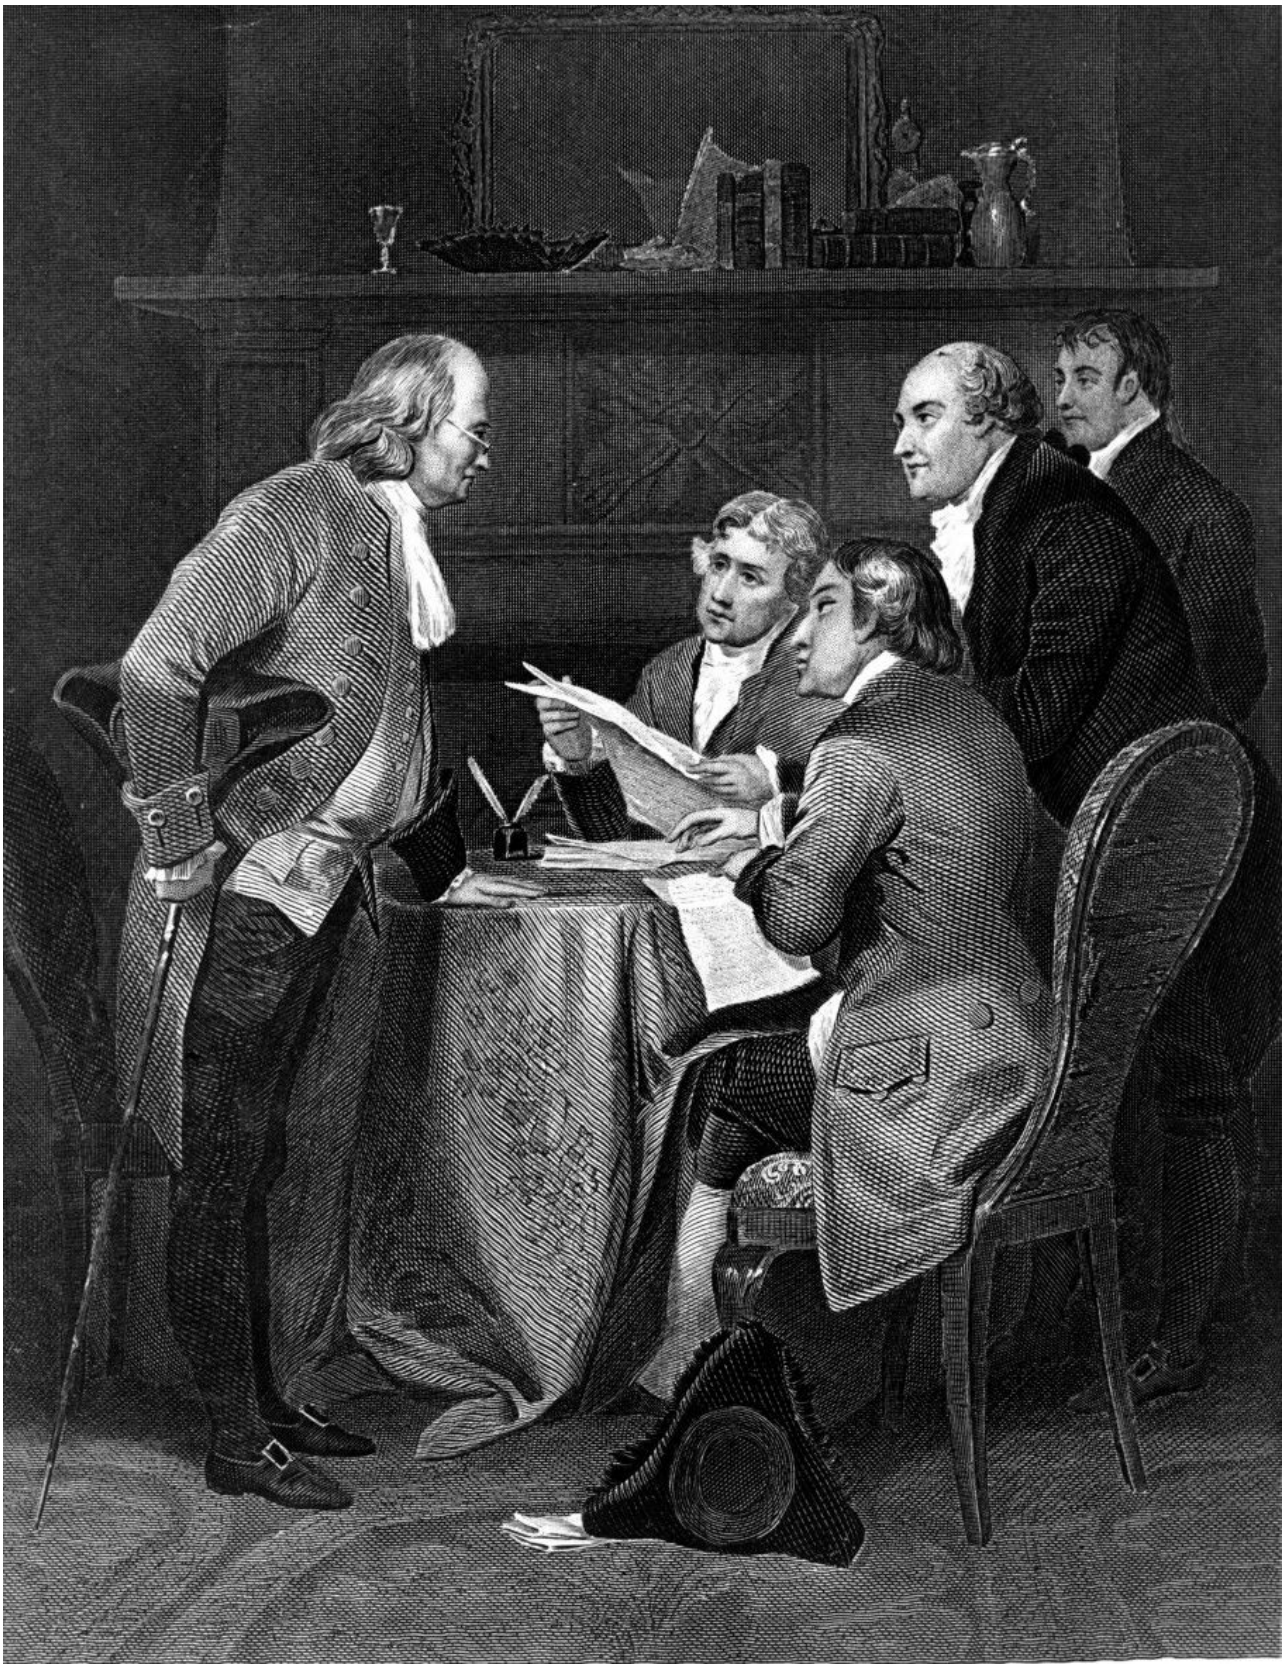
— Conservatives find it deeply ironic that they are coming to the defense of one of the fathers of modern progressivism.



Colorado Republican Rep. Ken Buck, class of 1981, quipped in an e-mail: “Instead of fighting dead, racist Democrats, these students should be fighting against the worst part of Wilson's legacy: an overbearing federal government that denies opportunity to young Americans."

Lance and Buck are two of six Princeton graduates in the House. There are two alumni in the Senate. Ted Cruz, class of 1992, declined to comment.

MSNBC host Joe Scarborough, a former GOP congressman from Florida, tweeted that the push to remove Wilson's name is "insanity."

— Where does this end? The Black Lives Matter movement has spawned similar pushes at campuses across the country. The faculty of Amherst College recently voted to remove "Lord Jeff" as the school's unofficial mascot. Jeffery Amherst, as a British general in the 1760s, advocated infecting Native Americans with smallpox. The school will still keep its name, however. Georgetown announced two weeks ago that it will rename two buildings named for school presidents who organized the sale of Jesuit-owned slaves to help pay off campus debt in the 1830s.

— Jefferson is the next target on campuses. Inside Higher Ed reports that, at both the University of Missouri in Columbia and at the College of William & Mary, critics have been placing yellow sticky notes on Jefferson statues, labeling him — among other things – a "rapist" and a "racist." It's hard to see such a movement catching on at the University of Virginia, overlooked by Monticello.

— Several columnists have weighed in against expunging Wilson this week:

The Post's Alexandra Petri explains that "history is a grey area": "When you erase the ugly parts of history, you run the risk of forgetting that someone lousy can do something worthy of honor. You divide the past into obvious heroes and obvious villains. And that's dangerous. Then you forget what good and bad people are capable of. Then you forget that most good and bad things are not unmixed."

Richard Cohen argues that "we have an obligation to place historical figures in the context of their times and to accord them what they, in some instances, did not accord others: understanding." He calls Wilson "a transformational progressive" in many ways: "He advocated women's right to vote (the 19th Amendment) and the eight-hour workday, and he supported the Clayton Antitrust Act as well as the creation of the Federal Reserve and the Federal Trade Commission. He also backed the implementation of the federal income tax, a progressive way for the government to raise funds. In foreign affairs, he took the country into World War I and helped create the League of Nations, which the United States, to his painful regret, did not join. He formulated an internationalism we now call 'Wilsonian' that has influenced U.S. foreign policy ever since."

Franklin Roosevelt interned 120,000 U.S. citizens of Japanese descent, Christine Emba of The Post's In Theory blog notes, but no one thinks he shouldn't be honored. At least not yet. "We can acknowledge the contributions of even greatly flawed individuals," writes Emba, who notes that she is a black Princeton graduate who studied at the Woodrow Wilson School.

Bill Scher, executive editor of LiberalOasis, complains that Wilson is "already a woefully under-analyzed and under-appreciated figure." He argues on Real Clear Politics that, "Removing his name from his intellectual home would not just condemn him; it would condemn us to a poorer understanding of our own history. For Princeton to contribute to American ignorance would be an unconscionable act for a premier university."

The Newark Star-Ledger published an editorial urging Princeton protesters to "learn the entire history": "If we were to erase tributes to every historical figure with a repellant quality, there would be no names left on any building, bridge, airport, school, river, park, statue or boulevard in the land … We can't name everything after Mother Teresa."

— Campaigning in Myrtle Beach, Trump claimed for a fourth straight day that he watched a large number of Muslims in New Jersey cheering, tailgating and "dancing in the streets" on 9/11, an urban myth discredited by state officials years ago. Trump said "the liberal media" is hiding evidence and claimed he's received "hundreds of phone calls" this week from people who say they, too, saw the celebrations.

Jenna Johnson, our reporter following Trump, relays that the rally wasn't all doomsday: "At one point, Trump invited onto the stage a guy in the audience who dressed up like him. 'This is what I call a real supporter,' Trump said. 'Wow. Thank you, man. Are you married?' The guy nodded and pointed out his wife in the audience. 'Are you happy with your husband?' Trump asked. 'She said yes! She fantasizes that he's really the real Donald Trump!'" Eew…

A burning Russian fighter jet plummets from the sky after being shot down near the Turkish-Syrian border yesterday. (Handout from the Ihlas News Agency, via AFP/Getty Images)

— "NATO faces new Mideast crisis after downing of Russian jet by Turkey," by Hugh Naylor and Andrew Roth: "NATO faced being thrust into a new Middle Eastern crisis on Tuesday after warplanes from member state Turkey shot down a Russian jet that Turkish officials said had violated their country's airspace on the border with Syria. The incident marked a serious escalation in the Syrian conflict that is likely to further strain relations between Russia and the NATO alliance. Russian officials confirmed that a Russian Su-24 attack aircraft was shot down Tuesday morning but insisted it had not violated Turkey's airspace. Russia's Defense Ministry said one of at least two pilots probably died during the incident, and a marine also was killed by apparent Syrian insurgent fire during a helicopter rescue operation to retrieve the downed airmen. The downing brings renewed attention to a scenario feared for months by the Pentagon and its partners: a potential conflict arising from overlapping air missions over Syria — with Russia backing the to the fight against the Islamic State. Suggestions include more strike aircraft, more intelligence-sharing, more training and equipment for local fighters, and deployment of their own special operations forces. The message has already fallen on willing ears, at least in the case of France, whose president met with President Obama on Tuesday to plan strategy in the wake of the Nov. 13 terrorist attacks in Paris. 'There is a new mind-set now,' French President François Hollande said during a White House news conference. They agreed, Obama said, that 'our nations must do even more together.' While the two leaders spoke in generalities, a senior administration official said that both Obama and Hollande would be 'working the phones' with other members of the U.S.-led coalition — and with potential new members — to insist that now is the time for 'those who could bring more assets to the table' to do so."

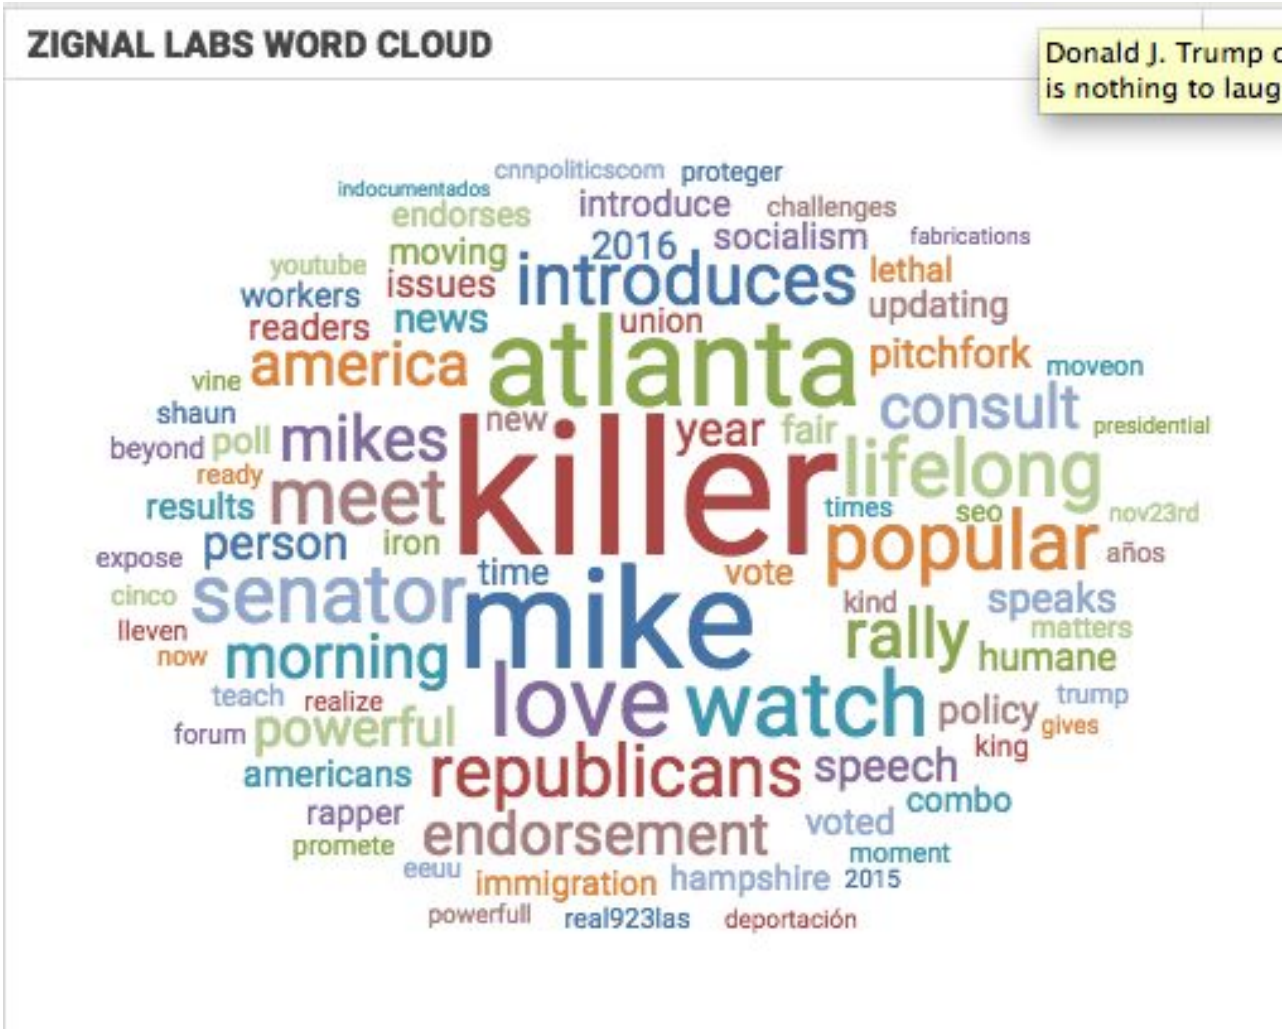
Bernie Sanders in Columbia, South Carolina, on Saturday (Melina Mara/The Washington Post)



— "After Paris, Sanders sticks to script — and it doesn't say much about fighting terrorism," by John Wagner in South Carolina: "The Democratic presidential hopeful ticked off an expansive agenda for improving the lot of those struggling to get by, touched on climate change and devoted some extra attention to issues of racial justice and policing. But by the time the senator from Vermont had wrapped up his speech, which clocked in at 59 minutes, there was one topic that hadn't merited a single mention: foreign policy. The omission Sunday was striking, given the marked shift in tone of the presidential race… Many of the Republican candidates have recast their pitches altogether, and the other Democrats, including former secretary of state Hillary Clinton, have pushed their plans for defeating the Islamic State to the top of their agendas. The post-Paris-attacks Sanders campaign looks remarkably similar to the pre-Paris-attacks Sanders campaign."

SOCIAL MEDIA SPEED READ:

— ZIGNAL VISUAL: Bernie Sanders was mentioned about twice as much online as Hillary Clinton on Tuesday. Here's a word cloud visualization of Sanders mentions to show what everyone was talking about:

A plug from rapper Killer Mike, an Atlanta native and member of hip-hop duo Run The Jewels, drove the social media story around the Vermont senator. In all, our analytics partners at Zignal Labs relays that Killer Mike was mentioned more than 15,000 times in stories and tweets that also mentioned Sanders. That's about 20 percent of the senator's total mentions for the day.

Mike endorsed Sanders at an Atlanta rally, in a speech that received widespread attention in the music press. "Before I was a rapper I was a son of Atlanta," he said. GOOD READS FROM ELSEWHERE:

— New York Times, "Donald Trump's shortcuts and salesmanlike stretches, " by Maggie Haberman: "Here are some of Donald J. Trump's favorite ways to deal with a difficult question: Asked what he would do on issues like trade deals or terrorism, he warns that bad things are happening 'all over the place.' His policies as president might or might not include the subject at hand 'and a lot of different things.' All ethnic groups will 'love' a Trump presidency. Here is what you may almost never hear Mr. Trump say: 'I'm not familiar with that,' or 'I misspoke.' No one ever expected Mr. Trump to turn himself into the issues expert of the Republican presidential field. Yet the verbal shortcuts and salesmanlike stretches that he has relied on for months — generalities used to dodge questions, and questionable recollections — are tripping him up as the tenor of the campaign has grown more serious."

— New York Times, "In renovation of golf club, Donald Trump also dressed up history," by Nicholas Fandos: "Between the 14th hole and the 15th tee of one of the club's two courses, Mr. Trump installed a flagpole on a stone pedestal overlooking the Potomac, to which he affixed a plaque purportedly designating 'The River of Blood.' 'Many great American soldiers, both of the North and South, died at this spot,' the inscription reads. 'The casualties were so great that the water would turn red and thus became known as 'The River of Blood.' The inscription, beneath his family crest and above Mr. Trump's full name, concludes: 'It is my great honor to have preserved this important section of the Potomac River!' Like many of Mr. Trump's claims, the inscription was evidently not fact-checked. 'No. Uh-uh. No way. Nothing like that ever happened there,' said Richard Gillespie, the executive director of the Mosby Heritage Area Association, a historical preservation and education group devoted to an 1,800-square-mile section of the Northern Virginia Piedmont, including the Lowes Island site."

— Los Angeles Times, "Inside the Southern California factory that makes the Donald Trump hats," by Christine Mai-Duc: "Donald Trump's hats have quickly become a signature totem of the 2016 campaign, a kitsch magnet that serves ironic hipsters and sincere supporters alike. The red-and-white caps are emblazoned with the real estate mogul's oft-repeated slogan, 'Make America Great Again.' But look around the factory floor where these hats are being made by the thousands, and you'll find faces that don't seem to fit into Trump's America. Yolanda Melendrez is one of them. Melendrez, an immigrant from Mexico who was brought to the United States by her parents when she was a baby, has worked at the Carson-based Cali-Fame headwear company since 1991. 'When we first got the order [for the Trump hats], I said to myself, 'Just wait until he sees who's making his hats. We're Latinos, we're Mexicans, Salvadoreños.'"

— Wall Street Journal, "Many GOP voters favor Trump despite limited foreign policy credentials," by Reid J. Epstein: "In interviews during a weekend Iowa candidate forum, many voters pointed to Trump as the nation's best chance to contain Islamic State militants. 'Obviously, with all the business knowledge that Trump has, he has to have international knowledge that would be useful,' said Kathy McCammant of Grinnell, Iowa, who attended the forum. Mr. Trump wasn't one of the seven candidates at the event. Ms. McCammant's husband, Dale, said Mr. Trump's lack of government experience would be a benefit. 'He doesn't play the political game as much as the other candidates,' he said. …Post-Paris public opinion polling shows the McCammants are hardly alone. A Suffolk University/Boston Globe poll found a plurality of New Hampshire Republicans said terrorism and national security are the most important issues facing the country. The same survey found Mr. Trump with twice as much support in New Hampshire as any other GOP candidate."

Even Republicans wary of Trump admire his style: "Nobody in Iowa wants Donald Trump for president," said Dave Tyree, a preacher at the Church of Christ in Chariton, Iowa. "But everybody in Iowa wants somebody like Donald Trump for president."

— Forbes, "Strange but true: Dark matter grows hair around stars and planets," by Ethan Siegel: "It's a lot like the way a magnifying glass can focus sunlight into a single point: by bending the various rays together in a stream behind the lens. In the case of dark matter and a planet, however, it's the mass of the planet itself — and the force of gravity — that causes the dark matter to come together in a caustic stream, referred to by

With the Minsk II ceasefire in eastern Ukraine looking increasingly shaky, Europe risks a frozen conflict for years to come. However, is Russian President Vladimir Putin finished in Ukraine? Can the United States and Europe expect more aggression from the Kremlin or is consolidation Russia's strategy now? What do the future of Russian relations with the European Union and Germany look like and what role do sanctions play in this calculation? Elmar Brok, chairman of the European Parliament's Committee on Foreign Affairs, wil answer these questions and provide analysis of U.S.-European views toward Ukraine and Russia. GMF, the Konrad Adenauer Foundation, and the European Parliament Liaison Office are pleased to jointly host this conversation.

Elar Brok is the chairman of the European Parliament's Committee on Foreign Affairs (AFET). A member of the European Parliament since 1980, Brok is also a member of the Committee on Constitutional Affairs, the Conference of Committee Chairs, a member of the Delegation for Relations with India, a deputy member of the Delegation for Relations with the United States, and a co-chairman of the Transatlantic Legislator's Dialogue. A German Christian Democrat, Brok is the spokesman on external affairs for the European Parliament's Group of the European People's Party (EPP) and a member of the Federal Committee of the German Christian Democratic Union (CDU). Brok has received the Order of Merit of the Federal Republic of Germany and was recognized as "Commander of the Gregorius-Order" by Pope John Paul II in 2002.

Dr. Stephen F. Szabo is the executive director of the Transatlantic Academy (TA). As executive director, he works with the partners of the TA to shape the research content of each term, to assist in the recruitment and selection of Fellows and to manage the Academy. Prior to joining GMF, Szabo had been with the Paul H. Nitze School of Advanced International Studies, Johns Hopkins University, where he served as academic and interim dean as well as professor of European studies. Prior to that, he had served as professor of National Security Affairs at the National Defense University and chairman of west European studies at the Foreign Service Institute, U.S. Department of State. He has written on German foreign and security policies, generational politics in Europe, and transatlantic security and political relations.

Zoo Animals on the Loose in Tbilisi After Flooding

MOSCOW — The Georgian capital, Tbilisi, became the city where the wild things are on Saturday night, with lions, tigers, bears and other carnivorous animals roaming the streets after catastrophic flooding destroyed the enclosures of the main zoo.

Residents were warned to stay indoors after heavy rains and roiling waters inundated the center of the city. At least three zoo workers were dead, according to local press reports, which quoted the mayor, Davit Narmania, as saying that at least eight people had been killed and that search and rescue operations were continuing for about 10 more missing.

It was not immediately clear how many animals were on the loose and how many had been killed in the floods.

Images from the city underscored the animal anarchy — one showed a group of people herding a hippopotamus along a street choked with mud, after it had been hit by a tranquilizer dart. Others showed the corpses of animals amid the debris of wrecked cars and buildings.

A special police unit was dispatched to the neighborhoods around the zoo to hunt for the roaming animals, according to Rustavi 2 television.

Some of the animals were killed when they could not be captured, the report said, including six wolves found on the grounds of a children's hospital as well as a bear and a hyena. Some residents expressed indignation at those killings, but officials said various animals were too aggressive to be captured.

Helicopters were swooping low over the city to try to spot the animals. Those missing after the flood included 20 wolves, eight lions, and several tigers and jaguars, Interfax reported. Only three of 17 penguins survived, the Russian news agency said.

One zoo worker who died while trying to save the animals, Guliko Chitadze, a 25-year veteran of the Tbilisi Zoo, had her arm amputated in late May after she was attacked by a tiger, Interfax said.

Hillary Clinton has named three senior policy advisers to lead the development of an agenda for her presidential campaign. The team leaders are: Maya Harris, a former senior fellow at the Center for American Progress; Ann O'Leary, a former legislative director to Clinton when she was in the Senate; and Jake Sullivan, a top aide to Clinton while she was Secretary of State and a former national security adviser to Vice President Joe Biden.

The announcement is an early indication of the policy themes Clinton is likely to emphasize as she launches her campaign. Harris has a background in human rights, while O'Leary specializes in early childhood education and headed the children and families program at Next Generation, the Tom Steyer-funded advocacy group.

Sullivan, meanwhile, was a key player in laying the groundwork for the talks that led to the Obama administration's tentative agreement on Iran's nuclear program.

New Republic: “Here's Another Sign That Hillary Clinton's the New Boss in Town”

By Jason Zengerle

August 14, 2014

Wednesday night, Politico’s Ken Vogel broke the news that David Brock, right-wing-hitman-turned-Hillary-Clinton-bodyguard, is taking over the government watchdog group Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics (CREW). That means Brock now controls not only CREW, but also the Democrat-backing nonprofits and Super PACS Media Matters, American Bridge, American Independent Institute, and Correct the Record. It’s a veritable empire of liberal third-party groups! All of which prompted Vogel to write on Twitter, immediately after his CREW scoop came out, that Brock is now the Democrats’ version of Karl Rove.

It’s a title Brock has been gunning for since at least 2010, when, in the wake of the Republican rout in the midterm elections, he announced his plans to start American Bridge. Brock, who at the time only counted Media Matters as a jewel in his crown, initially positioned American Bridge as the liberal analogue to Rove’s American Crossroads group, the outside conservative group that played such a key role in the GOP’s 2010 efforts. In Brock’s vision, American Bridge would be a behemoth that raised and spent millions of dollars, primarily on television ads, to benefit Barack Obama and other Democratic candidates in 2012. As he boasted to The New York Times at the time:

“My donor base already constitutes the major individual players who have historically given hundreds of millions of dollars to these types of efforts…. They just need to be asked, and I have no doubt they will step up at this critical time.”

But then a strange thing happened. Brock’s donors didn’t step up. Although they were happy to continue to fork over money to Media Matters, they didn’t want to contribute to American Bridge.

This was partly because they primarily viewed Brock as a media watchdog, not a political strategist. (After all, they’d come to know him as the repentant right-wing hit man.) But it had more to do with the fact that Obama’s political operation—which, in the wake of the 2010 elections, put out word that it now welcomed Democratic independent-expenditure groups—didn’t want Brock, who during the 2008 Democratic primaries had been one of Hillary Clinton’s most diehard supporters, to be in charge of the I.E. effort.

As one Obama-affiliated Democratic strategist told me at the time, “Do you think David Plouffe and David Axelrod are going to let David Brock go out and build an empire to explain Barack Obama’s policies and worldview to voters?”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In the end, American Bridge was scaled back to be an opposition-research outfit, while Priorities USA, helmed by former Obama aide Bill Burton, became the leading Democratic Super PAC for the cycle.

But now, whatever qualms the Obama people might have about Brock are irrelevant. They're not making the decisions for 2016; the Clinton people are. And the Clintons love David Brock. Although there are people in Hillary's orbit who remain wary of him, Hillary and Bill themselves are big fans. Brock tells a great story of visiting the former president in his Harlem office back in 2002 and noticing an entire cabinet filled with copies of Brock's book Blinded by the Right, which Clinton was famous for pushing on friends.

And so Brock's ascension to Rove-like status can be taken as yet another sign that, as today's Times puts it, "Obama is fast becoming the past, not the future, for donors, activists and Democratic strategists." It's Hillary Clinton's—and, by extension, David Brock's—world now; the rest of the Democratic Party is just living in it.

Washington Post opinion: Aaron David Miller: "If Hillary Clinton had won in 2008, what would her foreign policy have looked like?"

By Aaron David Miller, a vice president at the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars, has served as a Middle East adviser for Republican and Democratic secretaries of state. He is the author of the forthcoming "The End of Greatness: Why America Can't Have (and Doesn't Want) Another Great President"

Hillary Rodham Clinton seems hung up on smart and stupid.

During her term as secretary of state, Clinton talked a lot about "smart power" — elevating diplomacy and development alongside military might. Now, she is distancing herself from the foreign policy of the president she served, telling the Atlantic's Jeffrey Goldberg that "great nations need organizing principles, and 'Don't do stupid stuff' is not an organizing principle."

But what if she had been the one in the Oval Office since 2009? How different would her foreign policy be from President Obama's? These questions are clearly more than a thought experiment. If she runs in 2016, potentially the first secretary of state since James Buchanan to ascend to the White House, voters will want to know the answers.

There would certainly be stylistic differences between Clinton and Obama. Even on the campaign trail, Clinton seemed more passionate about foreign policy than Obama, more enthusiastic about creating relationships with world leaders and playing the politics of diplomacy. She is more sensitive to America's image as an indispensable power. And though she's no reckless warrior, she is perhaps more inclined to consider using force under carefully tailored circumstances.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But on substance, Clinton's policies would probably not have diverged fundamentally from the ones the president pursued while she was his secretary of state or those he has embraced subsequently. Indeed, Clinton could never have become Obama's top diplomat and functioned so well in that job had they not been largely on the same page in terms of how they saw the world and what America should do about it. They both are transactors, not ideological transformers — smart, pragmatic centrists largely coloring inside the lines in a world of long shots and bad options. In other words, there's no need for them to "hug it out" on foreign policy.

Iran

Obama and Clinton were never the Bobbsey twins when it came to Iran. Clinton has pressed for tough sanctions since she was a senator from New York. During the presidential debates, she jumped on candidate Obama's idea to engage with the Iranians without preconditions. She says in her memoir "Hard Choices" that she regretted the president's refusal to take a harder line with the mullahs in response to their crackdown on the Green Revolution in 2009. And in the Atlantic interview, she was adamantly against the idea that Iran has a right to enrich uranium: "The preference would be no enrichment. The potential fallback position would be such little enrichment that they could not break out." The U.S. team currently negotiating with Tehran has conceded some enrichment as a practical matter, with limits to be negotiated.

But if Clinton had been president, she probably would have struck the same deal and followed a similar approach, first seeking an interim accord and then testing the possibilities through another year of negotiations before getting to a final agreement. After all, it was she who set the current talks in motion. She and Obama had agreed on a dual-track strategy of pressure and engagement. That meant sustained and tougher sanctions, with the door left open for diplomacy. After the sultan of Oman offered Clinton a back channel for secret bilateral diplomacy, it was her State Department, specifically Bill Burns and Jake Sullivan, that staffed it on the U.S. side.

A President Clinton, understanding that the alternative to a deal might be war — either an Israeli military strike or even a U.S. one — would probably have gone to great lengths to make sure that every possibility had been explored before resorting to force. Negotiators get attached to their negotiations and don't want to fail. And so Clinton would have probably authorized the same concessions to Iran as the current negotiating team has.

Clinton, perhaps with 2016 in mind, has been less critical than Obama of Israeli policies, especially the military response to Hamas. And unlike Obama, she has long-established relationships with the players in the peace process. I accompanied her, when she was first lady, to Leah Rabin's funeral and watched her charm and magnetic impact on Israelis regardless of party. She also has a better sense than Obama of how to deal with Benjamin Netanyahu — learned in part from watching her husband. "Who's the f---ing superpower here?" President Bill Clinton exploded to aides after his initial encounter with the Israeli prime minister. And still, Bill Clinton reached two agreements with the Likud leader. A President Hillary Clinton might have tried harder than Obama has to cement a bond with Netanyahu. And there might not have been so much broken crockery in the U.S.-Israeli relationship.

Still, it's hard to imagine that Clinton would have taken a different course in pursuing a two-state solution — or achieved different results. Given the lack of trust between Netanyahu and Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, the wide gaps on the core issues and the impossibility of pursuing a more modest interim deal, the only option available was the one Obama authorized John Kerry to take: try to mediate a "framework agreement" that leaves many of the details on core issues such as Jerusalem unresolved. And even then, failure was virtually guaranteed.

How would Clinton have handled the latest confrontation in Gaza? In 2012 she played an important role in facilitating a cease-fire there, though it was then-Egyptian President Mohamed Morsi who delivered Hamas. More than likely, this time around she would have found herself — like Kerry — without a win. She might have had more influence over Netanyahu. But with Hamas willing to continue the fight, the odds of a U.S.-brokered success would still have been low.

(It's also worth noting on Egypt that as secretary of state, Clinton was wary of Obama's efforts to force Hosni Mubarak out too quickly. But in the wake of Morsi's disastrous presidency, as president she would have almost certainly backed the Obama/Kerry decision to improve relations with the new Egyptian president, the former supreme military commander.)

Russia and Ukraine

Clinton has a reputation for being tough on Russia. Indeed, Putin accused her of orchestrating the 2012 demonstrations against him.

And yet, it's hard to believe that, as president, the pragmatic Clinton would have initially pursued something other than a reset policy. U.S. relations with Russia were at rock bottom after the Georgia war and the preceding squabbles over Kosovo, missile defense and NATO expansion. With the ascendance of the seemingly forthcoming Dmitry Medvedev, any American president would have tried to identify issues on which the United States and Russia might cooperate — and would have shown resolve if the Russians pushed back on others.

As president, Clinton might have pivoted sooner to a hard line when it became clear in 2011 that the reset had run its course. She told the New York Times' John Harwood as much.

But it's unlikely that would have made much difference. None of the recommendations on Russia contained in her parting memo to Obama — including rejecting Putin's invitation to a presidential summit and avoiding flattering him with high-level attention — would have changed Putin's strategy. He simply has more cards and the will to play them.

As for Ukraine, put Clinton in Obama's shoes during the past several months of Putin's adventurism in Crimea and his meddling in eastern Ukraine, and it's hard to see what she might have done differently to impose greater costs on Russia, let alone to counter and reverse Putin's support for pro-Russia separatists. Military force isn't an option. So Clinton, like Obama, would have fallen back on some package of steps, including marshaling the Europeans, nonlethal military assistance to Ukraine, tough rhetoric and sustained sanctions.

Syria

In the Atlantic interview, Clinton asserted that the "failure to help build up a credible fighting force [in opposition to Bashar al-Assad] left a big vacuum, which the jihadists have now filled." Clinton called Obama on Tuesday to say that she didn't mean to attack his policies. But the two have long had differences in how to approach the Syrian civil war. As early as 2012, Clinton wanted to do more to weaken Assad. But more — training and equipping carefully vetted elements of a dysfunctional and divided opposition — wasn't all that far from what

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Obama eventually came to accept in 2013.

To change the balance on the battlefield, a President Clinton would have had to win backing for a more comprehensive military strategy involving not just arming rebels but also creating no-fly zones and authorizing direct U.S. military strikes against Syrian regime targets. It's by no means clear that she would have gone that far, let alone whether the risk-averse Pentagon would have supported it.

On the question of chemical weapons, Clinton's policies would probably have been very much in line with Obama's. As secretary of state, she echoed Obama's red line. And although she had stepped down by the time of the Assad regime's August 2013 attack that killed 1,400 people, she publicly supported Obama's decision to seek a congressional vote before launching a strike. If she'd been president, she might have been more reluctant to go to Congress and more skeptical that a deal brokered by the Russians would successfully eliminate Syria's chemicals. But as Clinton rightly describes in her memoir, Syria was a "wicked problem." I'm not at all sure that as president she would have done much better in trying to deal with it, let alone resolve it.

This is not in any way to undermine her talents and capacities when it comes to foreign policy. It is, however, to underscore a critical point these days when it comes to America's role in the world. To paraphrase Marx, men and women make history. But they rarely do so as they please. No matter how determined she may have been to assert U.S. leadership or to push her concept of smart power, the cruel and unforgiving nature of the world would have imposed the same severe constraints. Not every problem today has a solution that is amenable to U.S. military or diplomatic power — or to Clinton magic.

Politico Magazine: "Is Hillary Too Hawkish to Win in 2016?"

By Bill Scher

August 15, 2014

[Subtitle:] Or is Rand Paul too dovish?

Hillary Clinton, after her wide-ranging foreign policy interview with The Atlantic's Jeffrey Goldberg roiled both the White House and the anti-war left, reached out to President Barack Obama to tamp down speculation of a rift between the two.

She may have hugged it out with the president, but she has not done the same with the anti-war left.

Clinton does not seem terribly concerned with MoveOn.org scolding her to "think long and hard before embracing the same policies advocated by right-wing war hawks." Or with The Nation slamming her for "hawkish, even neoconservative-influenced views." Or with The New Republic warning that her "blunder" could open the door to a strong primary challenge. Her lack of interest in winning over these critics suggests this is a fight she is comfortable waging—and is not worried about losing.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

If so, then 2016 might feature an unusually grand bipartisan foreign policy debate, with an interventionist Clinton squaring off with her party's dovish wing, while the isolationist-leaning Sen. Rand Paul sparks a parallel debate with the militaristic hawks that have long dominated the Republican Party. In some ways, the discussion recalls the one that occurred in each party three quarters of a century ago before World War II, with Clinton cast as the interventionist Franklin Roosevelt facing down cautious Democrats and Paul playing the part of the isolationist Robert Taft, who took on Wendell Willkie, a more internationalist Republican rival, in the fight for the 1940 GOP nomination. Taft lost that battle to Willkie, moving the country away from its post-World War I isolationism and freeing up Roosevelt to take the controversial step of compulsory military service without jeopardizing his campaign for an unprecedented third term.

Today, the friction between the Clinton and Obama camps has attracted most of the recent media attention. But while Clinton and Obama have their differences, they only represent different strains within the liberal interventionist school. Syria, for instance, may highlight Obama's relative reluctance to use force, and Iran may indicate the limits of Clinton's confidence in diplomacy. But their views converged on the Libyan intervention and presumably the recent strikes in Iraq, because they both believe America should play a leading role on the world stage expanding freedom and protecting human rights beyond our borders. And they believe that role can include the use of military force, even though liberal interventionists don't turn to it as quickly or as unilaterally as their neoconservative counterparts.

Neither takes the view that America should generally stay out of other nations' affairs, an increasingly prevalent view across the partisan spectrum. As the Pew Research Center found in its December poll, "Majorities or pluralities of Republicans (52%), Democrats (46%) and independents (55%) think the U.S. does too much to try to help solve world problems, and agree that the U.S. should mind its own business internationally (53%, 46% and 55%, respectively)." The distance between Clinton and these poll numbers is probably far bigger than the distance between her and Obama.

Yet Clinton's interview blows past such poll-driven concerns and practically dares a fellow Democrat to try to seize an opening on her foreign policy left. That may seem like a foolish risk for a frontrunner to take so soon in the campaign season, but her remarks are only a "blunder" if she can't defend them from attacks by a yet-to-materialize primary challenger.

She may sense she has history on her side, as Democratic interventionists have usually held the upper hand over their intraparty opponents despite the party's anti-war reputation. In 1916, President Woodrow Wilson won a major legislative battle over military preparedness with William Jennings Bryan, his former secretary of state-turned-isolationist antagonist, allowing Wilson to lead a unified party in his successful re-election campaign. In 1946, President Harry Truman took the dramatic step of firing Commerce Secretary Henry Wallace, FDR's former vice president, after Wallace delivered a high-profile speech breaking with Truman's anti-communist foreign policy. Truman was reluctant, worried that he would cause a party split. But the fear was unfounded as Wallace's third-party challenge fizzled two years later.

More recently, President Bill Clinton's bombing campaigns in Bosnia and Iraq passed without causing a rift with the left, nor did Obama's first-term intervention in Libya and protracted involvement in Afghanistan complicate his re-nomination for a second term. In fact, when the foreign policy objective is in the compassionate global interest, and not raw national interest, a considerable portion of the left is routinely willing to shelve its reluctance to use the military.

But is Hillary Clinton going against a current tide of rising isolationist sentiment? Not necessarily in her own party. The “blunder” argument from the New Republic’s Noam Scheiber is based on the notion that “opposition among Democrats to overseas interventions, particularly in the Middle East, remains so strong and raw” and “polling overwhelmingly shows the country, not just Democratic voters, to be weary of foreign-policy interventionism.”

There may, however, be more to the polling numbers than the top line. True, the Pew numbers showing support for America “mind[ing] its own business” are at a striking 50-year high. But the recent spike is driven almost solely by Republicans and independents (a group that leaned right of the political center in 2012), not Democrats. The percent of Republicans and independents that want America to mind its business more than doubled from 2002 to 2013. Among Democrats, the number ticked up only six points, remaining under 50 percent.

In other words, foreign policy attitudes among Democrats haven’t changed much. Absolutely—there was and is a significant anti-intervention wing. It’s just not necessarily dominant. Nor is it as rigid as you might think: Some intervention skeptics will likely give a deeply respected Democrat such as Hillary Clinton ample latitude in explaining the nuances of her positions. If she chooses to take the intra-party foreign policy debate head-on, following the path of Wilson, FDR and Truman, she could earn a firmer mandate.

Meanwhile, the massive and abrupt shift in attitude among Republicans presents an opening for Senator Paul to revisit a debate on Republican foreign policy principles that hasn’t been seriously engaged since the interventionist General Dwight D. Eisenhower swiped the 1952 presidential nomination from—once again—the isolationist Taft, then known as “Mr. Republican.”

Paul would probably bristle at the comparison to Taft, but he has been pushing his party to rethink its worldview, though rapidly moving events have complicated his task. In February, a few days before Russia forcibly seized control of Crimea, Paul told the Washington Post, “Some on our side are so stuck in the Cold War era that they want to tweak Russia all the time and I don’t think that is a good idea.” Soon after Crimea, Paul’s tone shifted, urging sanctions and other measures intended to hurt Russia economically, such as building the Keystone pipeline.

In June, Paul wrote an oped for the Wall Street Journal titled, “America Shouldn’t Choose Sides in Iraq’s Civil War,” one week after Islamic State militants took over key Iraqi cities. Paul chastised Obama’s favoring of the Syrian rebels, saying it “indirectly aided al Qaeda and ISIS [the Islamic State] in Syria—the very group some now propose to counter with U.S. troops [in Iraq].” And he questioned the value of airstrikes, though stopping short of ruling them out: “What would airstrikes accomplish? We know that Iran is aiding the Iraqi government against ISIS. Do we want to, in effect, become Iran’s air force?”

That sparked an op-ed skirmish with potential 2016 rival Gov. Rick Perry, who replied in the Washington Post: “Paul’s brand of isolationism (or whatever term he prefers) would compound the threat of terrorism even further.” Paul gleefully engaged, taking to Politico Magazinelast month to tweak Perry’s call for ground forces in Iraq: “[In 2012] Perry urged the United States to return troops to Iraq to act as a balance against Iran … Does Perry now believe that we should send U.S. troops back into Iraq to fight the Iranians—or to help Iran fight ISIS?”

But after Obama launched airstrikes against the Islamic State last week, Paul refrained from criticizing the move, saying on Monday he has “mixed feelings about it” while reiterating his claim that the United States “protected” ISIS in Syria. Now, instead of debating the merits of the military action, he is focusing on another one of his foreign policy principles: asserting Congress’ authority to declare war under the Constitution and demanding a vote.

Paul's hesitancy to criticize Obama over Iraq tracks the latest Fox News poll, which found that 65 percent of Americans support the air strikes, including 73 percent of Republicans, a stunning turnaround from the disastrous polling that greeted Obama's September 2013 threat to strike Syria. These numbers should hearten Hillary and make Paul pause. America's isolationist moment may be just that—a moment—if voters conclude that specific global threats and humanitarian crises require an American response. Moreover, the rapid rise of Republican isolationism in the Pew poll may prove to be a knee-jerk reaction against Obama, not a fundamental shift away from the hawkish foreign policy that has defined the party for 70 years.

Of course, the uncertainty of future events cuts both ways. For example, Clinton's vocal skepticism of a nuclear deal with Iran may look myopic if such a deal is struck and helps reduce tensions throughout the Middle East. If military operations in Iraq drag on and test American voters' patience, Paul remains better positioned than any other Republican to take advantage. The festering crisis of Syria could develop in a myriad of different ways – the fight with the Islamic State could expand and enmesh Obama into the Syrian civil war, a friendlier Iran could push the Assad government toward a settlement – and however Syria looks in 2016 will be stacked against Clinton and Paul's past statements.

The volatile nature of foreign policy, along with its lack of direct impact on voters' wallets, often prompts presidential aspirants to de-emphasize the subject. That is one reason why the provocative remarks by Clinton and Paul are so unusual. The other reason is that for decades neither party has had a presidential frontrunner challenging its own fundamental foreign policy principles.

For one party to pursue such a debate risks driving the losing faction into the arms of the other (Sen. John McCain has already hinted he may prefer Clinton to Paul; Ralph Nader vice-versa). For both parties to pursue it simultaneously raises the possibility of a partisan realignment, with Democrats claiming Ronald Reagan's mantle of "Peace Through Strength" and Republicans adopting George McGovern's call of "Come Home, America."

That might seem strange to imagine. But Democrats' comfort with military action in pursuit of liberal ends has long been part of their history. And if military action is increasingly perceived as intertwined with liberal ends, and government incompetence, the Republican Party may reconnect with its isolationist past. That didn't work out so well for Robert Taft. But Rand Paul can hope that Rick Perry is no Wendell Willkie, and Hillary Clinton is no General Eisenhower.

Talking Points Memo: "The Clintons Might Already Be Wooing A 2016 Veep Candidate"

By Dylan Scott

August 15, 2014, 9:31 a.m. EDT

President Bill Clinton invited incoming Secretary of Housing and Urban Development Julian Castro to dine at the Clinton's private D.C. home last week, the Washington Post reported, making it impossible for the media to ignore the 2016 implications.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Castro, former San Antonio mayor and 2012 Democratic National Convention keynote speaker, was nominated by President Barack Obama to head HUD in May. The New York Times noted at the time that he "has often been mentioned as a potential vice-presidential candidate for the Democrats." The move to HUD was thought to help bolster Castro's national profile.

The veep speculation is mostly a matter of connecting the dots. Castro is a young (39) and charismatic Hispanic politician, as is his twin brother Joaquin, a freshman Texas congressman.

Now Bill Clinton is inviting Castro over for dinner so they can get to know each other better and Hillary Clinton also spoke with a close Castro friend at a private lunch in March about Castro's political aspirations, according to the Post.

Even anonymous sources close to situation are stoking the fire.

Official spokespeople, of course, dismissed the 2016 conjecture.

“Secretary Castro and former president Clinton had a discussion about ways the agency can expand on the partnership with the Clinton Climate Initiative to make public housing more energy-efficient,” HUD spokeswoman Betsaida Alcantara told the Post.

"They didn't talk about 2016," a Clinton aide said.

CBS News: “Hillary Clinton's lead over potential 2016 GOP foes shrinks: Poll”

By Jake Miller

August 15, 2014, 11:15 a.m. EDT

The good news for Hillary Clinton in a new McClatchy-Marist poll is that she's still ahead of all of her potential Republican challengers.

The bad news is that her lead has shrunk - and quickly - as her book tour and other public events have carried her back into the center of the political fray.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In the new survey, the former secretary of state outpaces Gov. Chris Christie, R-N.J., by seven points, 48 to 41 percent. In April. though, McClatchy found her ahead of Christie by 11 points, 53 to 42 percent. And in February, the gap between the two was a yawning 21 percent.

Against former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, Clinton holds on to a seven point lead, 48 to 41 percent. In April, she was ahead of Bush by 16 points, 55 to 39 percent.

And matched against Sen. Rand Paul, R-Ky., Clinton earns 48 percent to Paul's 42 percent, but in April, she bested Paul by 14 points, 54 to 40 percent.

Lee Miringoff, the director of Marist's polling institute, blamed Clinton's flagging numbers on the increased publicity generated by her tour promoting her memoir "Hard Choices," along with a few gaffes she committed along the way.

Critics pounced in June when Clinton said she and her husband, former President Bill Clinton, left the White House in 2001 "dead broke." While the Clintons did leave the White House with a pile of legal debt, they quickly earned millions from book deals and speaking fees. Clinton later expressed regret for the comments, calling them "inartful."

"Misstatements, starting with we left the White House broke, aren't headline grabbers, but they're noticeable," Miringoff, said, according to McClatchy. "With Hillary Clinton, there's no preseason. She needs a Super Bowl-like performance from start to finish."

Before any of the Republicans can take the fight to Clinton, though, they have to emerge from their own scrum - and according to this new poll, that's going to be no small feat.

Bush and Christie lead the pack at 13 percent apiece, with Texas Sen. Ted Cruz close behind at 10 percent. The others are mired in single digits, with Rep. Paul Ryan, R-Wis., and Sen. Marco Rubio, R-Fla., at 9 percent, Paul and Gov. Rick Perry, R-Texas, at 7 percent, and Gov. Scott Walker, R-Wis., at 4 percent. Twenty-three percent are undecided.

Subject: [big campaign] DON'T MISS THIS!! Important Research on the new Anti-Obama Books...

I wanted to make sure that everyone saw this is EXTREMELY IMPORTANT research by Media Matters.

We need more than the facts though (we had those in 2004 about Corsi and the Swift Boat guys) we need a coordinated PLAN to make sure this doesn't get traction.

With the authors of two new anti-Obama books hitting the airwaves to promote their latest works of fiction, I wanted to make sure people had access to the research we've published thus far on Jerome Corsi's The Obama Nation: Leftist Politics and the Cult of Personality and David Freddoso's The Case Against Barack Obama: The Unlikely Rise and Unexamined Agenda of the Media's Favorite Candidate. Thus far both authors have been on FOX News' Hannity & Colmes. They are also actively hitting the right-wing talk radio circuit. Corsi was on MSNBC this morning and Contessa Brewer used our research to push back against his claims and ask why he should be taken seriously when so many mistakes have been found in his book. We are still combing through both books which we obtained before publication. This is how the Swift Boat attacks began in 2004 (Corsi was co-author of Unfit for Command: Swift Boat Veterans Speak Out Against John Kerry), it is extremely important that these authors are pushed back against forcefully with facts that discredit their claims.

Karl Frisch
Media Matters for America
kfrisch@mediamatters.org

Unfit for Publication: Corsi's The Obama Nation filled with falsehoods

http://mediamatters.org/items/200808040005

Summary: In its preface, Jerome Corsi compares his new book, The Obama Nation, to his 2004 book Unfit for Command. The comparison seems apt: Just as Unfit for Command contains false attacks on Sen. John Kerry's military service, a Media Matters review finds that The Obama Nation similarly contains numerous falsehoods about Sen. Barack Obama.

On three Hannity programs, Corsi offered another falsehood: Obama supports abortion "[a]fter a child's born"

http://mediamatters.org/items/200808020004

Summary: Jerome Corsi, author of the book, The Obama Nation, falsely claimed on Hannity's America that Sen. Barack Obama said, "Even if a child was born ... the woman still had the right to kill the child in an abortion." Corsi similarly falsely asserted on Hannity & Colmes that "[a]fter a child's born, Obama ... in the [Illinois] state Senate, wanted the child killed if the mother desired an abortion," and on Sean Hannity's radio program, said that "Obama's on record as let's kill the baby if that's what the mother wants." In fact, Obama has never supported giving people the right to kill their children.

Publisher's promotional materials for Corsi's Obama Nation echo falsehood and baseless charge in book

http://mediamatters.org/items/200808020003

Summary: Simon & Schuster's promotional materials for Jerome Corsi's book, The Obama Nation, echo Corsi's false claims and baseless charges about Sen. Barack Obama's Global Poverty Act and his views on nuclear weapons.

Misinformation in Freddoso's anti-Obama book comes early

http://mediamatters.org/items/200808010005

Summary: The introduction and first few pages of David Freddoso's forthcoming book, The Case Against Barack Obama, are marked by false and misleading assertions about Obama, accompanied by dubious citations.

On Hannity & Colmes, another Corsi falsehood about Obama

http://mediamatters.org/items/200808010003

Summary: On Hannity & Colmes, author Jerome Corsi claimed that in his upcoming book, The Obama Nation, "I do a great deal of analysis of [Sen. Barack Obama's] autobiography." Corsi then asserted, "Obama first presents his father as a great hero, and the truth was, his father was a polygamist and a alcoholic." However, contrary to Corsi's suggestion that Obama did not address these issues in his memoir Dreams From My Father, he discusses his father's alcoholism and polygamy in multiple passages in the book.

First reported allegation in Corsi's Obama attack book is false

http://mediamatters.org/items/200807310003

Summary: A WorldNetDaily.com article about author Jerome Corsi's forthcoming book, The Obama Nation, asserts that the book "points out" that "Barack Obama admitted using drugs in his autobiography but never revealed if or when he stopped." In fact, Obama wrote in his autobiography, Dreams from My Father, that he "stopped getting high" shortly after moving to New York City to attend Columbia University.

In covering forthcoming anti-Obama books, will media repeat Swift Boat coverage mistakes?

Summary: Two books attacking Sen. Barack Obama are scheduled to be released in early August: T*he Obama Nation*, by Jerome Corsi -- co-author of Unfit for Command, which contains false and baseless attacks on Sen. John Kerry's military service -- and The Case Against Barack Obama, by David Freddoso. Regnery, publisher of The Case Against Barack Obama, touts the book as having the same "goal" as Unfit for Command, which Regnery also published. The overt connections between the Swift Boat Veterans for Truth's scurrilous campaign against Kerry and the two forthcoming books raise the question for the media: Will they have absorbed the lessons of their highly flawed Swift Boat coverage and give more immediate and more thorough scrutiny to these forthcoming books?

Politico: Anti-Obama book to be released by conservative press that published Swift Boat smear book

http://mediamatters.org/items/200806230005

Summary: David Freddoso's upcoming book, The Case Against Barack Obama, will be published by Regnery, which reportedly "likens the goal of [the Obama] book to that of 'Unfit for Command,' " a widely discredited book containing numerous false and baseless attacks on John Kerry's military service.

http://mediamatters.org/items/200408060010

While much has been written about the identity and history of John E. O'Neill -- one of the authors of the forthcoming Regnery book Unfit for Command : Swift Boat Veterans Speak Out Against John Kerry (whose links in the GOP go back to his days as "protégé of Nixon-era dirty trickster Charles Colson") -- little has been said about his co-author, Jerome R. Corsi, PhD.

- Corsi on Islam: "a worthless, dangerous Satanic religion"
- Corsi on Catholicism: "Boy buggering in both Islam and Catholicism is okay with the Pope as long as it isn't reported by the liberal press"
- Corsi on Muslims: "RAGHEADS are Boy-Bumpers as clearly as they are Women-Haters -- it all goes together"
- Corsi on "John F*ing Commie Kerry": "After he married TerRAHsa, didn't John Kerry begin practicing Judiasm? He also has paternal grandparents that were Jewish. What religion is John Kerry?"
- Corsi on Senator "FAT HOG" Clinton: "Anybody ask why HELLary couldn't keep BJ Bill satisfied? Not lesbo or anything, is she?"

McCain Cancels Louisiana Trip Amid Massive Oil Spill

Where Will Greatest Energy Misses Tour Take McCain Next?

(Embedded image moved to file: pic25996.jpg)

Washington, D.C.—Amid a spill of some 419,000 gallons of heavy fuel oil into the Mississippi River, John McCain canceled a planned trip to Louisiana Thursday—a trip during which McCain was slated to visit offshore drilling platforms and tout his misguided offshore drilling plan. Following a collision of a tanker and a barge, the massive spill caused a slick approximately 12 miles long and closed a 29 mile stretch of the Mississippi River.

Statement of Cathy Duvall, Sierra Club Political Director

"It comes as no surprise that the McCain campaign blamed the cancellation of their trip to Louisiana on the weather. Apparently hundreds of thousands of gallons of spilled oil, dead fish, and oil-covered birds aren't ideal conditions for peddling a misguided plan for more offshore drilling. Unfortunately, the risk for such spills—and far worse—would only increase if John McCain and George Bush get their way and allow Big Oil to begin the 'exploitation' of our coasts.

"It's a shame that John McCain is going to miss the opportunity to see first-hand just how damaging an oil spill can be.

"After going straight to Houston to tell Big Oil he was their new best friend, it looks like John McCain has decided to embark on a tour of our country's greatest energy misses. He's already been to Santa Barbara, he then told the people of Nevada how he wants to stick them with more than 70,000 tons of dangerous nuclear waste, and Lousiana was the site of the biggest offshore oil spill in our nation's history. Maybe next he'll visit Prince William Sound or Three Mile Island?"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

1. Houston, Texas—June 17

McCain announced his flip-flop on offshore drilling and received a standing ovation from the Big Oil fat cats that have given over $5 million to his campaign and the Republican National Committee. A 1979 offshore well blowout in the Bay of Campeche spilled more than 126,000,000 gallons of oil —coating beaches in Texas and Mexico with crude.

2. Santa Barbara, California—June 24

McCain pushed his misguided offshore drilling plan at the site of a 1969 oil spill from an offshore well that coated the beaches of Santa Barbara with at least 3,234,000 gallons of oil.

3. Las Vegas, Nevada—June 25

John McCain went to Nevada to push his plans to build 100 new nuclear power plants and stick the residents of the state with more than 77,000 tons of highly dangerous nuclear waste at the unsafe and unproven Yucca Mountain site.

4. Louisiana—July 25 CANCELED

Hurricanes Katrina and Rita resulted in more than 9,000,000 gallons of oil being spilled off-shore and at related facilities onshore. Louisiana is also the site of the nation's largest ever offshore oil spill, the 1967 Humble Oil spill that spewed at least 6,726,000 gallons of oil from an undersea pipeline.

5. Prince William Sound, Alaska--???

The 1989 ExxonValdez disaster spilled 10,800,000 gallons of oil into the Pristine Waters of Prince William Sound. Mere months after the tragic spill, John McCain voted against requiring double-hull tankers. McCain also wants to appoint more Supreme Court justices like Alito and Roberts, who recently decided to cut ExxonMobil's punitive damages to just $500 million—the same amount the company paid former CEO Lee Raymond during his final year with the company.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

6. Three Mile Island, Pennsylvania—???

Site of the nation's worst nuclear accident, 1979 partial meltdown of one of the station's two reactors. John McCain wants to build 100 new nuclear reactors, a plan that by utilities' own estimates could cost AT LEAST $1 TRILLION.

John McCain's Truthiness on Offshore Drilling

McCain Myth #1: Offshore drilling is safe and is getting even safer

Reality: Offshore oil spills increased 64 PERCENT over the past decade.

"From 1998 through 2007, offshore producers released an average of 6,555 barrels of oil a year, according to the Minerals Management Service, which tracks spills of 50 barrels or more. That was 64 percent more than the annual average during the previous 10-year period…Last year, the industry spilled 2,256 barrels of oil, fuels and chemicals, and during the first half of this year, offshore operators are on a similar course, having spilled 1,114 barrels in five incidents."

McCain Myth #2: No spills happened as a result of hurricanes Katrina and Rita

Reality: Over 9,000,000 gallons of oil were spilled as a result of the two storms.

(Source: U.S. Coast Guard)

http://www.uscg.mil/npfc/docs/PDFs/osltf_report_hurricanes.pdf

McCain Myth #3: Oil rigs "very successfully" survived the impact of hurricanes Reality: Hurricanes Katrina and Rita alone "totally destroyed" 113 offshore oil platforms.

One platform drifted 66 nautical miles before running aground on a beach in Alabama. Hurricane Dennis in 2005 nearly destroyed the then brand-new, state-of-the-art $1 billion Shell Thunder Horse platform—the largest of its kind in the world.

		see first-hand just how damaging an oil spill can be.
		"After going straight to Houston to tell Big Oil he was their new best friend, it looks like John McCain has decided to embark on a tour of our country's greatest energy misses. He's already been to Santa Barbara, he then told the people of Nevada how he wants to stick them with more than 70,000 tons of dangerous nuclear waste, and Lousiana was the site of the biggest offshore oil spill in our nation's history. Maybe next he'll visit Prince William Sound or Three Mile Island?"
		McCain's Greatest Energy Misses Summer 2008 Tour
		1. Houston, Texas—June 17
		McCain announced his flip-flop on offshore drilling and received a standing ovation from the Big Oil fat cats that have given over $5 million to his campaign and the Republican National Committee. A 1979 offshore well blowout in the Bay of Campeche spilled more than 126,000,000 gallons of oil—coating beaches in Texas and Mexico with crude.
		2. Santa Barbara, California—June 24
		McCain pushed his misguided offshore drilling plan at the site of a 1969 oil spill from an offshore well that coated the beaches of Santa Barbara with at least 3,234,000 gallons of oil.
		3. Las Vegas, Nevada—June 25
		John McCain went to Nevada to push his plans to build 100 new nuclear power plants and stick the residents of the state with more than 77,000 tons of highly dangerous nuclear waste at the unsafe and unproven Yucca Mountain site.
		4. Louisiana—July 25 CANCELED
		Hurricanes Katrina and Rita resulted in more than 9,000,000 gallons of oil being spilled off-shore and at related facilities onshore. Louisiana is also the site of the nation's largest ever offshore oil spill, the 1967 Humble Oil spill that spewed at least 6,726,000 gallons of oil from an undersea pipeline.
		5. Prince William Sound, Alaska--???
		The 1989 ExxonValdez disaster spilled 10,800,000 gallons of oil into the Pristine Waters of Prince William Sound. Mere months after the tragic spill, John McCain voted against requiring double-hull tankers. McCain also wants to appoint more Supreme Court justices like Alito and Roberts, who recently decided to cut ExxonMobil's punitive damages to just $500 million—the same amount the company paid former CEO Lee Raymond during his final year with the company.
		6. Three Mile Island, Pennsylvania—???
		Site of the nation's worst nuclear accident, 1979 partial meltdown of one of the station's two reactors. John McCain wants to build 100 new nuclear reactors, a plan that by utilities' own estimates could cost AT LEAST $1 TRILLION.
		John McCain's Truthiness on Offshore Drilling

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

		McCain Myth #1: Offshore drilling is safe and is getting even safer
		Reality: Offshore oil spills increased 64 PERCENT over the past decade.
		"From 1998 through 2007, offshore producers released an average of 6,555 barrels of oil a year, according to the Minerals Management Service, which tracks spills of 50 barrels or more. That was 64 percent more than the annual average during the previous 10-year period…Last year, the industry spilled 2,256 barrels of oil, fuels and chemicals, and during the first half of this year, offshore operators are on a similar course, having spilled 1,114 barrels in five incidents."
		(Source: Houston Chronicle, 07/19/2008)
		McCain Myth #2: No spills happened as a result of hurricanes
		Katrina and Rita
		Reality: Over 9,000,000 gallons of oil were spilled as a result of the two storms.
		(Source: U.S. Coast Guard)
		http://www.uscg.mil/npfc/docs/PDFs/osltf_report_hurricanes.pdf
		McCain Myth #3: Oil rigs "very successfully" survived the impact of hurricanes
		Reality: Hurricanes Katrina and Rita alone "totally destroyed" 113 offshore oil platforms.

- Says change is coming in Jan and we are the ones that'll change DC, like Palin changed Alaska
    - promises to use "old ink pen" to veto every earmark porkbarrel bill
- Says wasteful earmark spending takes away from your ability to fill gas tank and pay mortgage

- est. 5-6000 ppl in audience; auditorium at capacity
    - 20-25% audience were college students (Event held at Franklin & Marshall college), the rest were mostly middle-aged and white; lots of women

Speech Highlights
Palin speaks

- First Dude, Todd Palin
- we tend not to like ppl who talk about us 1 way in Lancaster and then not another way in SF

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- [feed cuts out]
- about a yr ago, things were going badly in iraq. defeat wouldve had terrible consequences. Many in DC assumed there was no hope in Iraq and no hope for a candidate who said he would rather lose an election than a war in Iraq. but they forgot the determination resolve and sheer guts of
- he doesn't run with Washington herd -- willing to shake things up -- 1 more reason to take maverick of Senate and put him in WH
- JM has called the 2 of us a team of mavericks -- we did that in AK -- took on the good ol boys -- reminded ppl that govt not always the answer, too often govt is the problem
- so we got back to basics, put govt back on side of ppl: eliminated taxes on personal property; eliminated property taxes on
- we came to office promising major ethics reform and today thats the law of the state
- as mayor and gov, i tried to lead by example: voluntary paycut, gov- cut the personal chef from the budget-- i put the state govts checkbook online for all to see (bureaucrats not thrilled)-- and that luxury jet, i put it on ebay
- i came to office promising to control spending, by request if possible, by veto in necessary - today budget in control, i returned the surplus
- we suspended our state fuel tax -- surplus -- i returned a chunk of that surplus back to ppl of Alaska b/c they can spend it better than govt can spend it for them - and in these tough times across USA, im ready to help JM bring tax relief to all of you
- we championed earmark reform to stop Cong from wasting money on things that dont serve teh public interest - i told congress thx but no thx on bridge to nowhere
- just teh other day, our opponent brought up earmarks, and considering his record, im surprised he'd even want to go there -- in 3 yrs our opponent has requested almost $3b in earmarks -- while our opponent was requesting $3b as senatorial privilege, i was vetoing about $half Billion as exec responsbility
- im going to help Pres. JM end these corrupt practices once and for all
- as gov i used competition to help build a gas pipeline that cost $40m to get us off foreign oil that dont have our best interests in mind
- we're going to use alternative energy and drill now to get us off foreign energy (Drill baby drill!)
- its a matter of natl security and it's for our prosperity: American energy sources by Am ingenuity and Am workers
- my running mate wont say it on his own behalf so i will: there's only 1 man in this election that has ever fought for you (crowd roars)
- friends, in PA, pls know he is the only great man in this race, the only ready to serve as 44th potus. im honored to intro to you the next POTUS (crowd roars) -- McCain waves (USA! USA!)

McCain speaks

- TY, TY (crowd cheers) for this marvelous turnout. you convince me more and more we will win the state of PA.
- and i cannot tell you how happy i am to be intro'd by Gov Palin today, but i cant--wait, i cant wait to intro her to Wash DC (crowd roars)
- let there be no doubt - a little advanced warning to the old bigspending, donothing, me-first-do-nothing Washington crowd, Change is coming and it's coming next Jan! we will reform! We are the ones tahtll change DC, she changed AK! we'll restore trust and confidence in govt
- Obama has never gone against anyone in his own party, we're proud that for the good of the Am ppl, we have
- and what maverick really means--what this team of mavericks means is that we understand who we work for: we'll work for you and the Am ppl
- a couple of issues quickly--
    - 1-- we will stop spending $700B to countries that dont like us very much and some of that money ends up in the hands of terrorists (crowd roars)-- its gonna stop-- its gonna be all of the above, its also going to be nuclear power. and yes, in the meantime, yes we're going to drill offshore and we're gonna drill now! and we'll fight for energy independence - and we're oging to get our economy moving again, and we'll create millions of job- and we'll invest in clean coal technology, which will help in PA
    - my opponent opposes nuclear and offshore

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

    - 2- spending- its out of control adn it has corrupted Wash DC. ive got an old ink pen and im going to take it and veto every earmark porkbarrel bill that comes across my desk-- we'll shame them! we're never going to spend $3m again to study the DNA of bears in MT (i dont know if that was a paternity issue or criminal)- we've got to stop it. that money takes away your ability to fill your gas tank and make your mortgage payment. it hurts us and erodes our confidence and trust in govt. we can stop it b/c america's best days are ahead of us

- one more wd about todd palin-- 2000mi in sometimes 40below in a snowmobile across AK winter--my friends he's not afraid of DC-- we can take them on -- 4time world champion, and a wonderful father (crwod cheers)
- a little straight talk -- these are tough times, we know that-- worried about jobs, paying for food, stayin in home--- this wk we're looking at taking on a costly govt-led restructuring of our home-loan agencies -- we need to keep ppl in their homes but we cant allow this to turn into a bailout of Wall St speculators and irresponsble executives -- this action was required b/c of croneyism and special interests in Wash DC - all you ever asked of govt is to stand on your side not in your way and thats what i intend to do
- ill keep your taxes low, open new mkts, cut govt spending. my opponent believes in higher taxes, govt spending - the differences are very clear
- we're going to reform the way business is done in DC
- Prob in DC is not Dems or GOPS, it's that they're working for themselves and not for you. we need to reach across the aisle, i have a record of that, obama doesnt
- tmrw will mark a yr since Petraeus testified before Cong on surge -- we were 1 vote away from cutting off funding and Obama voted against it
- quick story-- one 4ht of July. Sen. L. Graham and i were in baghdad and Petraeus invited us to join ceremony where 688 brave americans had reenlisted when they could have gone home-- i was deeply moved to be in the presence of brave young Ams who were willing to continue to serve b/c it wasnt just for the frdm of Iraqis but for our security. the consequences couldve been terrible -- and btw, the temp was about 117 degrees, these young ppl put on 40lbs of body armor and went out defending iraqi ppl
- on the way back, i said we cant afford to surrender or lose this war. yes im running for pres, but we have to win this war. we went on No Surrender tour. Dems and some GOPs wanted to surrender. pundits said we were finished. ill say it again-- id rather lose a political campaign than see USA lose a war. why do i feel that way? because ive had the great honor of serving in the company of heroes. i know what the threats are to America and security today. everytime im in the company of vets, im honored and theyre here today. pls raise your hands. (crowd cheers-- palin waves)
- let me promise: we will fulfill our obligations to care for those who have served, we will give you the benefits you deserve and care you need
- after i came back, wolfboro, NH, Matthew Stanley's mom gives mccain bracelet for KIA son to make sure his death was not in vain. i take that charge very seriously. yes i want to be POTUS but i also believe i can motivate and inspire a generation of Ams to serve a cause greater than selfinterest. i want to assure you that my entire life ive had the opportunity to put my country first. with the help of this great running mate, we will always put country first. TY, we need your support and god bless america. (crowd roars-- SP, TP and JM wave; walk off stage) potential. As Hillary Clinton states in Hard Choices, creating opportunity for women and girls throughout the world "directly supports everyone's security and prosperity, and should be part of our diplomacy and development work." As Secretary of State, she followed through on a lifetime of championing women's causes by expanding women's economic prospects, initiating programs dedicated to entrepreneurship around the world. Through international partnerships, Sec. Clinton elevated women's political and economic prospects and raised women's issues "at all international economic forums."

Elevated Political and Economic Empowerment for Women and Girls

Sec. Clinton worked "to raise women's issues at all international economic forums." According to an op-ed by former Ambassador-at-Large for Global Women's Issues Melanne Verveer in the Christian Science Monitor, "Clinton worked to raise women's issues at all international economic forums - from APEC (Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation) to the G20 to the OECD (Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development). [Melanne Verveer, Christian Science Monitor, 3/8/13]

Sec. Clinton told delegates of the Asia Pacific Economic Cooperation Women and the Economy Summit that empowering women meant a stronger, more stable world economy. According to San Jose Mercury News, "Empowering women means a stronger, more stable world economy, U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton said Friday to the largest diplomatic gathering in the Bay Area since the United Nations charter was signed here in 1945. And although the past half-century has seen tremendous progress, there's still much to be done to ensure women have the opportunity, information, resources and legal rights they need for economic success, Clinton told delegates to the Asia Pacific Economic Cooperation Women and the Economy Summit." [San Jose Mercury News, 9/16/11]

Sec. Clinton: "The United States is committed to advancing opportunities for women as entrepreneurs and business leaders." According to video remarks at an event for the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, Sec. Clinton said, "Businesses owned by women make considerable contributions to national economies. But too often, their growth is limited by unfair barriers. The United States is committed to advancing opportunities for women as entrepreneurs and business leaders. We view it as both a moral and strategic imperative for the 21st century. That's why we are helping women entrepreneurs with business training and mentoring; and support policies that improve women's access to finance, technology, and networks." Created Programs to Achieve Greater Empowerment for Women

Sec. Clinton launched the Equal Futures Partnership to fight for women's political and economic empowerment. According to a White House fact sheet on the Equal Futures Partnership, "A growing body of evidence shows that women's political and economic empowerment are critical to fostering international peace and security, growing vibrant market economies, and supporting open and accountable governance. Recognizing that no country can realize its potential if half its population cannot reach theirs, President Obama issued a challenge before the United Nations General Assembly in September 2011 to break down barriers to women's political and economic empowerment. […] In response to this challenge, on September 24, 2012, Secretary of State Hillary Clinton launched the Equal Futures Partnership on behalf of the United States along with 12 other founding members (Australia, Benin, Bangladesh, Denmark, Finland, Indonesia, Jordan, the Netherlands, Peru, Senegal, and Tunisia; as well as the European Union)." Under Sec. Clinton, the Asian-Pacific partners of APEC agreed to the "San Francisco Declaration," an agreement to take concrete actions to realize the full economic potential of women. In 2011, Secretary Clinton brought together representatives from APEC (Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation) nations to agree to the "San Francisco Declaration." The Declaration stated, "We, APEC ministers and senior government officials, along with private sector leaders, met in San Francisco, California, September 16, 2011 for the High Level Policy Dialogue on Women and the Economy, under the Chairmanship of U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton. [...] In 2011 and beyond, APEC economies will take concrete actions to realize the full potential of women, integrate them more fully into APEC economies, harness their talents, remove barriers that restrict women's full economic participation, and maximize their contributions towards economic growth." In 2012, Sec. Clinton traveled to St. Petersburg, Russia, where she "led the U.S. Delegation to the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation's Women and the Economy Forum (WEF). During this event, participants focused on leadership and skills and capacity building, two main areas of the San Francisco Declaration on decreasing barriers to women's economic participation, as they relate to innovation, STEM, entrepreneurship, and healthy lifestyles." Sec. Clinton's Strategic Dialogue with Civil Society project brought activists in the Middle East and North Africa together to discuss "how to further women's political and economic engagement." According to a press release from the U.S. Embassy in Amman, Jordan, "Ambassador-at-Large for Global Women's Issues Melanne Verveer arrived on a four-day visit to Jordan today. While in Amman, Ambassador Verveer will host a regional convening of the Working Group on Women's Empowerment. Under Secretary Clinton's Strategic Dialogue with Civil Society, the Working Group brings together activists from across the Middle East and North Africa to discuss how to further women's political and economic engagement in the region." Promoted Women's Entrepreneurship around the World

Sec. Clinton launched WEAmericas to help women in Latin America and the Caribbean start and grow small businesses. According to a State Department fact sheet on WEAmericas, "Recognizing that investing in women is not only the right thing, but also the smart thing, President Obama announced and Secretary Clinton launched the Women's Entrepreneurship in the Americas (WEAmericas) initiative at the Summit of the Americas in April 2012. WEAmericas leverages public-private partnerships to increase women's economic participation in Latin America and the Caribbean by reducing barriers women often confront in starting and growing SMEs: access to training and networks, access to markets, and access to finance." ["Women's Entrepreneurship in the Americas (WEAmericas)," state.gov , 10/12/12]

Sec. Clinton's State Department created the African Women's Entrepreneurship Program to "provide women with the tools and skills" to implement the African Growth and Opportunity Act. According to a State Department report on women's and girls' issues, "In conjunction with the 2010 AGOA Ministerial (African Growth and Opportunity Act), the Department created the African Women's Entrepreneurship Program to provide women with the tools and skills they need to more successfully implement AGOA and its benefits for building businesses and markets. The Department secured $200,000 from Exxon-Mobil to fund follow-up entrepreneurship training to support building businesses." ["Sidebar on Women's and Girls' Issues," state.gov , 11/15/10]

Under Sec. Clinton's leadership, the Invest for the Future program focused on improving women's entrepreneurship and economic situations across Southern and Eastern Europe and Eurasia. According to the Invest for the Future website, "The Invest for the Future program was initiated by the US Department of State under the leadership of Secretary of State, [Hillary] Clinton and Global Ambassador-at-large for Global Women's Issues, Melanne Verveer. IFTF was conceptualized to focus on improving the economic situation for women across Southern and Eastern Europe and Eurasia. Through a series of events it brought together women entrepreneurs, educators, policy-makers, and civil society leaders to foster development and overcome barriers to fully realize the promise of gender equality and 'smart economics', as investing in women profits all of society." Sec. Clinton held a conference for women entrepreneurs through the Pathways to Prosperity program. According to her remarks at the Pathways to Prosperity Women Entrepreneurs Conference, Sec. Clinton said, "Part of what we are trying to do here in the State Department with all of you is to make the case that empowering women is a key to progress and prosperity and peace. Bringing together the mentors and the entrepreneurs is one way of creating even more support for all of you in business to be able to spread the benefits of women taking leadership roles. I've heard about some of the work that you are doing in your own lives, and I am very touched by the courage and the commitment that so many of you have already shown." ○ Recognizing that dirty cookstoves kill nearly 2 million people a year and are harmful to the environment, Secretary Clinton took action and launched the Global Alliance for Clean Cookstoves in order to save lives and protect our planet.

○ She signed an agreement with Brazil to strengthen cooperation as the U.S. and Brazil work together to meet the grave challenge of global climate change.

Stemming the Tide of Climate Change

As Secretary of State, Hillary Clinton spearheaded global action to fight climate change, building international partnerships to counter its threat. Sec. Clinton worked actively to protect the planet and its inhabitants by making climate change apriority in U.S. foreign policy and built partnerships to mobilize the international community to mitigate climate change and its adverse effects. Recognizing the clear and present danger of climate change, Sec. Clinton emphasized the need forAmerican leadership in tackling this ever-growing global issue.

Made Climate Change an American Foreign Policy Priority

Sec. Clinton changed the way the U.S. approached climate change. According to the New York Times, "Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton wrapped up her first diplomatic mission to Asia yesterday with climate change experts praising her for putting global warming at the center of U.S. foreign policy… Kenneth Lieberthal, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution and co-author of a new blueprint on how to bring China and the United States into cooperation on climate change, said he thinks Clinton sent a powerful signal that was 'fundamentally different' from the one sent by the Bush administration over the past eight years. He noted that Clinton chose [Special Envoy for Climate Change Todd] Stern as her travel companion -- and not a Treasury Department official, a nonproliferation expert or an envoy on any number of other top-tier foreign policy issues. 'Climate change is one of these existential threats that the U.S. and other countries face, and we do not have the luxury of procrastinating anymore. I think that's the message that Hillary Clinton brought to China,' Lieberthal said. 'She's saying, "We have changed the U.S. approach to this in a huge way. We want you to know that, and we want you to know the door is wide open for serious communication,'" he said." [New York Times, 2/23/09]

Sec. Clinton appointed a Special Envoy for Climate Change to "serve as a principal advisor on international climate policy and strategy." According to Sec. Clinton's remarks announcing the appointment of Todd Stern as Special Envoy for Climate Change, "The Special Envoy will serve as a principal advisor on international climate policy and strategy. He will be the Administration's chief climate negotiator. He will be leading our efforts with United Nations negotiations and processes involving a smaller set of countries and bilateral sessions. Because the main cause of climate change is the burning of fossil fuel and because the solution rests with our ability to shift the global economy from a high to a low carbon energy base, the Envoy will be a lead participant in the development of climate and clean energy policy. He will participate in all energy-related policy discussions that, across our government, can have an impact on carbon emissions, and will be looking for opportunities to forge working alliances." [Remarks Announcing the Appointment of Special Envoy for Climate Change Todd Stern, state.gov , 1/26/09]

Sec. Clinton established the Bureau of Energy Resources because "how the world uses energy is a key factor" to addressing the threat of climate change. According to Sec. Clinton's remarks on delivering on the promise of economic statecraft, "Next, on energy. We know energy can be a source of healthy competition, with countries racing to develop new technologies and renewables. But it can also be a source of conflict, fueling corruption and instability. And how the world uses energy is a key factor as to whether we will finally address the threat of climate change. So we have created at the State Department a new Bureau of Energy Resources, and made this issue a priority in our diplomacy." [Remarks on Delivering on the Promise of Economic Statecraft, state.gov , 11/17/12]

Sec. Clinton viewed U.S. leadership on climate change as both "a responsibility we should accept and an opportunity we should seize." In her book Hard Choices, Secretary Clinton wrote, "In our meeting in Copenhagen, the Prime Minister of Ethiopia told me that the world was looking to the United States to lead the way on climate change. I believe this is both a responsibility we should accept and an opportunity we should seize. After all, we're still the largest economy and the second-largest emitter of carbon dioxide. The more serious the effects of climate change, the more important it will be for us to lead." [Hard Choices, pg. 504, 2014]

Advanced International Partnerships on Climate Change

Sec. Clinton expanded U.S. efforts to assist developing countries hit hardest by climate change. In her remarks on the Energy and Climate Partnership of the Americas, Sec. Clinton said, "A year ago, President Obama proposed this partnership as a forum for sharing ideas and devising solutions. And through consultation with many of the countries here today, we identified five critical areas of engagement: energy efficiency, renewable energy, cleaner fossil fuels, energy poverty, and infrastructure. And today, I propose we add two new areas to help advance the UN Framework Convention on Climate Change and to be prepared for the next conference in Cancun. Those are: sustainable forestry and land use, and adaptation to assist developing countries that have been and are being hardest hit by climate change." [Remarks on the Energy and Climate Partnership of the Americas, state.gov , 4/15/10]

Sec. Clinton launched the Climate and Clean Air Coalition, which has 37 countries working to reduce methane emissions. In her book Hard Choices, Secretary Clinton wrote, "I held an event at the State Department with the Environmental Ministers from Bangladesh, Canada, Mexico, and Sweden, the Ambassador from Ghana, and the Administrator of the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency, Lisa Jackson, to launch the Climate and Clean Air Coalition. In 2014, there are thirty-seven country partners and forty-four nonstate partners, and the Coalition is making important strides toward reducing methane emissions from oil and gas production and black carbon from diesel fumes and other sources." [Hard Choices, pg. 501, 2014]

Sec. Clinton launched the Global Alliance for Clean Cookstoves to negate the "serious health risks" of dirty cookstoves and to reduce their contribution to climate change. According to Sec. Clinton's remarks on the Global Alliance for Clean Cookstoves, "The World Health Organization considers smoke from dirty stoves to be one of the five most serious health risks that face people in poor, developing countries. Nearly 2 million people die from its effects each year, more than twice the number from malaria. And because the smoke contains greenhouse gasses such as carbon dioxide and methane, as well as black carbon, it contributes to climate change. […] I know that maybe this sounds hard to believe, but by upgrading these stoves, millions of lives could be saved and improved. This could be as transformative as bed nets or even vaccines. So today, I am very pleased to announce the creation of the Global Alliance for Clean Cookstoves." [Remarks on the Global Alliance for Clean Cookstoves, state.gov , 9/21/10]

Sec. Clinton helped drive an unprecedented deal between major economies, developed and developing, to curb carbon emissions. According to Foreign Affairs, "Obama and Clinton barged into a meeting at the 2009 global climate change talks in Copenhagen and forced the Chinese president to agree to a nonbinding pact under which rich and poor countries alike pledged to curb their carbon emissions." In her book Hard Choices, Secretary Clinton wrote, "Sitting [in Copenhagen] next to President Obama in the small leaders' meeting he and I had just forced our way into, I hoped that we might finally be getting somewhere. I looked across the table at Wen Jiabao, then at the leaders of India, Brazil, and South Africa. […] In the end, after lots of cajoling, debating, and compromising, the leaders in that room fashioned a deal that, while far from perfect, saved the summit from failure and put us on the road to future progress. For the first time all major economies, developed and developing alike, agreed to make national commitments to curb carbon emissions through 2020 and report transparently on their mitigation efforts. The world began moving away from the division between developed and developing countries that had defined the Kyoto agreement." [Foreign Affairs, May/June 2013 ; Hard Choices, pg. 499, 2014]

Sec. Clinton signed an agreement with Brazilian Foreign Minister Celso Amorim to "strengthen bilateral cooperation" on climate change efforts. According to a State Department fact sheet, "Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton and Brazilian Foreign Minister Celso Amorim today signed a 'Memorandum of Understanding on Cooperation Regarding Climate Change' that will strengthen bilateral cooperation between the United States and Brazil as we work to meet the global climate and clean energy challenge. This Memorandum of Understanding launches a new 'Climate Change Policy Dialogue' to discuss key issues, including: The implementation of the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change and ways to build on the Copenhagen Accord as quickly as possible; Strategies for reducing greenhouse gas emissions; Joint efforts on research, development, deployment and dissemination of clean energy technologies; Adaptation; Cooperation on climate change scientific research; and Capacity-building in sectors related to climate change." [Announcement of Increased Cooperation on Climate Change, state.gov , 3/3/10]

Urged Global Cooperation in the Fight against Climate Change

Sec. Clinton called for a cooperative international effort to implement climate change action plans "in individual countries, in regions and globally." According to Sec. Clinton's remarks at the Major Economies Forum on Energy and Climate, "All of us participating today must cooperate in developing meaningful proposals to move the process forward. New policy and new technologies are needed to resolve this crisis, and they won't materialize by themselves. They will happen because we will set forth an action plan in individual countries, in regions, and globally. It took a lot of work by a lot of people to create the problem of climate change over the last centuries. And it will take our very best efforts to counter it." [Remarks at the Major Economies Forum on Energy and Climate, state.gov , 4/27/09]

Sec. Clinton: "No solution" to the climate problem "is feasible without all major emitting nations joining together and playing an important part." According to Sec. Clinton's remarks announcing the appointment of Todd Stern as Special Envoy for Climate Change, "As the President has made clear, he is committed to enacting a far-reaching new energy and climate plan. As we take steps at home, we will also vigorously pursue negotiations, those sponsored by the United Nations and those at the sub-global, regional, and bilateral level that can lead to binding international climate agreements. No solution is feasible without all major emitting nations joining together and playing an important part." HILLARY CLINTON COMMENTS ON FERGUSON: HIGHLIGHTS

BACKGROUND: Today, Hillary Clinton spoke at a summit in San Francisco and discussed the situation in Ferguson, Missouri. Below are some highlights from her remarks:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Watching the recent funeral for Michael Brown, as a mother, as a human being, my heart just broke for his family because losing a child is every parent's greatest fear and an unimaginable loss."

"This is what happens when the bonds of trust and respect that hold any community together fray. Nobody wants to see our streets look like a war zone, not in America. We are better than that."

"We cannot ignore the inequities that persist in our justice system. Inequities that undermine our most deeply held values of fairness and equality."

"Imagine what we would feel and what we would do if white drivers were three times as likely to be searched by police during a traffic stop as black drivers, instead of the other way around. If white offenders received prison sentences ten percent longer than black offenders for the same crimes. If a third of all white men – just look at this room and take one-third – went to prison during their lifetime. Imagine that. That is the reality in the lives of so many of our fellow Americans and so many of the communities in which they live."

"I applaud President Obama for sending the Attorney General to Ferguson and demanding a thorough and speedy investigation. That's both appropriate and necessary to find out what happened, to see that justice is done, to help this community begin healing itself."

"It was 51 years ago today that Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. called us to live out the true meaning of our creed, to make the dream real for all Americans. And that mission is as fiercely urgent today as when he stood on the steps of the Lincoln Memorial in the hot August sun all those years ago. So we have a lot of work to do together."

Community Policing & Hillary Clinton

Community policing is a means of partnering residents and law enforcement to build safer, more prosperous communities and to avoid or deescalate tensions between law enforcement and the communities which they are charged with serving. Hillary Clinton has a long record of supporting community policing and working to implement and expand it across the country. Her record includes strong support for COPS(Office of Community Oriented Policing Services), a Department of Justice program which advances community policing at many different levels of law enforcement.

Community Policing: Engaging Law Enforcement & Communities to Find Solutions

The COPS program "advances the practice of community policing in America's state, local and tribal law enforcement agencies." "COPS — the Office of Community Oriented Policing Services is the office of the U.S. Department of Justice that advances the practice of community policing in America's state, local and tribal law enforcement agencies. COPS does its work principally by sharing information and making grants to police departments around the United States." [U.S. Department of Justice, Accessed 8/25/14]

Missouri Highway Patrol Captain Ron Johnson said community policing is "getting out in the community and shaking hands and talking and hugging and smiling and enjoying the community." The following exchange took place between Missouri Highway Patrol Captain Ron Johnson and MSNBC host Al Sharpton on the television show Politics Nation: Al Sharpton: "Let me ask you this. One thing that struck me as I saw footage of people actually walking up and hugging you, embracing you, and talking with you like you have a personal touch, something we don't see. We certainly didn`t see it this week before you in Ferguson. But we don't see it often around the country. Explain to me that personal touch and whether that's something you recommend law officers around the country try and develop or try in some way to have that kind of rapport with the people they police." Capt Ron Johnson, Missouri Highway Patrol: "I think we have to have that. You know, we talk about community policing. Policing is getting out in the community and shaking hands and talking and hugging and smiling and enjoying the community. So that's a part of what community policing is." [MSNBC'S Politics Nation, 8/15/14]

Al Sharpton called the recent work of Captain Johnson the "true meaning of community policing." MSNBC host Al Sharpton said the following on the television show Politics Nation: Al Sharpton: "Despite over a week of confusion and turbulence in Ferguson, every day we are seeing some acts of kindness. People coming together to support their community and set an example for their children. Early this morning, Captain Ron Johnson told the story of three highway patrol officers who found a way to pitch in." Ron Johnson, on pre-recorded video: "Today on Elson Drive, much of the conflict, there were three Missouri state troopers who noticed a basketball hoop without a net. There was no basketball. The troopers decided [they] wanted to do something for the kids in the neighborhood. They used their own money and bought a net and basketball. As they installed the net, some neighbor children came out of their homes and asked what the troopers were doing. They told the kids they wanted them to have a net and a basketball. As those troopers drove off, the children were playing basketball. That's the true meaning of community policing." (End Video Clip) Sharpton: "True meaning of community policing. That story stands in contrast to some of the images we saw just a week ago. I applaud the officers behind this generous act. And I hope those kids get out and play." [MSNBC'S Politics Nation, 8/21/14]

"Community Policing 101" is being used to reduce tensions in Ferguson, Missouri. "St. Louis Police Sergeant Robert Ogilvie was getting off work late when he got the call from his boss to come join the new night patrol in this riot-ravaged suburb. After days of protesters clashing with local police after the shooting of Michael Brown, an 18-year-old African American, the governor had directed the state Highway Patrol to take over security in Ferguson. The Highway Patrol is headed by Ron Johnson, who enlisted Ogilvie's boss, Major Ronnie Robinson, to bring order to the suburb where a majority of the population is black and much of the city's power structure, including the police department, is white. Johnson, Robinson and Ogilvie are African American. So at 6 p.m. Thursday, Ogilvie and Robinson set out on foot in Ferguson to diffuse racial tension, one bystander at a time. 'It's not always showing force,' said Ogilvie, a trim 48-year-old officer with shaved, graying hair and a thick mustache. 'Sometimes you have to show compassion.' This is what Ogilvie and Robinson had learned to do at the police academy where they were classmates 23 years ago: Walk with the people, listen to their problems, let them set the agenda. Community Policing 101." [Los Angeles Times, 8/15/14]

One of community policing's pioneers believed that an intimidating police presence would invite confrontation. "One of the pioneers of community policing — a form of policing that stresses interaction over reaction, deescalation over brute force, and that police should have a stake in the communities they serve —is Jerry Wilson, who was appointed police chief for Washington, D.C. in 1969. Wilson was of course appointed during a very turbulent time in America, and he took office just after the riots following the assassination of Martin Luther King, Jr. had ripped the city apart. But Wilson went to great pains to recruit police officers from the city's residents, and to try to make the police force more reflective of the city. He also took a much different approach to protest. I interviewed Wilson for my recent book on police militarization. Here's a passage from the section about Wilson's approach to protest: 'Wilson believed that an intimidating police presence didn't prevent confrontation, it invited it. That didn't mean he didn't prepare, but he put his riot control teams in buses, then parked the buses close by, but out of sight of protesters. Appearances were important. In general, instead of the usual brute force and reactionary policing that tended to pit cops against citizens—both criminal and otherwise—Wilson believed that cops were more effective when they were welcomed and respected in the neighborhoods they patrolled. 'The use of violence,' he told Time in 1970, 'is not the job of police officers.'' It's worth noting that during Wilson's tenure, not only did Washington, D.C. not see the level of rioting and protest violence we saw in other parts of the country, crime actually fell in the city, even as it soared across the rest of the country." COPS Program in the 1990s

Noting the reduction of crime in the 1990s, Senator Clinton touted community policing and COPS program. "One of the great victories of the 1990's is that we drove the crime rate down and you know what? It didn't happen by accident. Bill has that great saying, 'If you find a turtle on a fencepost, it didn't get there by accident.' Well if you drive the crime rate down to the lowest levels in 30 years, it didn't happen by accident. It happened because we had a really good strategy, a DLC inspired strategy. A strategy that said, 'Ok, let's look at this now: at the end of the 1950's we had 3 police officers on the street for every felony. By the end of the 1980's we had 3 felonies for every police officer.' That was a clear indication that we were being out-gunned and out-manned by the criminals. So the idea arose, let's have the so-called COPS program, let's use federal resources to put 100,000-plus police on the street, let's use new community policing and comsat techniques to be able to find criminals before they commit crimes." [Senator Clinton speech at DLC National Conversation, 7/29/02 (via archive.org)]

Opposing Budget Cuts to the COPS Program

Senator Clinton criticized the Bush administration for cutting funds "from police, from fire, from local law enforcement." "[W]hat is the administration's response? Well, let's see, this was a good idea that the DLC and Bill Clinton promoted; therefore we've got to get rid of it. I mean, that's basically the thinking. So their budget would cut the COPS program. So while we're having to prepare for new kinds of attacks, we're seeing money cut from police, from fire, from local law enforcement. It will be no surprise if crime starts to rise again because we are committing an act of unilateral disarmament if we give up these police funds. And all of you who are in local areas and have made use of this and have seen the crime rate fall, please let your Senators and members of Congress know that you're going to fight to continue the COPS program, the law enforcement block grant, the SAFER program so we are prepared to take care of criminals as well as terrorists." [Senator Clinton speech at DLC National Conversation, 7/29/02 (via archive.org)]

Senator Clinton said her budget amendment would restore cuts to first responders and set aside $8 billion for security. "This amendment restores cuts to traditional first responder programs and it sets aside $8 billion dollars for each of the next ten years. And it does something that is desperately needed in this budget when it comes to homeland security: it doesn't take money away from the existing law enforcement and fire fighting programs, and move it over into another category and say 'we've now provided homeland security.' It's the oldest shell game in the world. This budget cuts the COPS program, cuts the Local Law Enforcement Block Grant, cuts the Byrne Act, cuts the FIRE act, cuts the SAFER Act. I don't think we, in good conscience, can cut the programs that keep the police on the street and the fire fighters in the fire houses to do what they have to do everyday. Then turn around and with their additional responsibilities claim that we have given them the resources for these new burdens, these new challenges. These resources must come in addition to, but not at the expense of, these other critically necessary law enforcement and fire fighting programs." [S.Amdt.299, 3/20/03 ; Senator Clinton floor speech on the Schumer-Clinton Amendment to the Budget, 3/20/03 (via archive.org)]

Sustaining the COPS Program

Senator Clinton pledged to introduce a budget resolution to restore $4.3 billion in resources for programs supporting law enforcement. "At the press conference, Senator Clinton also said she will introduce a budget resolution to restore $4.3 billion in resources for the COPS program, the Fire Act, the Byrne Act, the Local Law Enforcement Block Grants, and the SAFER Act. Funding restorations that communities are depending on to address increased spending associated with both the day-to-day work of first responders as well as homeland security costs." Senator Clinton fought for full funding for the COPS program, the Byrne Act, and the Local Law Enforcement Block Grant Act. "Senator Clinton is an original cosponsor of legislation to reauthorize the COPS program and has fought for full funding for the program. She has also fought for full funding for the Edward Byrne Memorial State and Local Law Enforcement Act ('Byrne' Grant program) and the Local Law Enforcement Block Grant Act ('LLEBG') program, including having authored an amendment to provide for full funding for these programs for Fiscal Year 2004." [Senator Clinton press release, 9/24/03 (via archive.org)]

Senator Clinton "fought to retain and fully fund the COPS program." "'The COPS program is an essential source of direct funding to our local law enforcement agencies. That's why I have fought to retain and fully fund the COPS program and other programs like it because I believe that especially in times of fiscal hardship we must do everything we can to support our first responders,' Senator Clinton said. Senator Clinton is an original cosponsor of legislation to reauthorize the COPS program and has fought for full funding for the program. Senator Clinton secured $5.48 million from the Department of Justice, through the COPS program, for the Buffalo Police Department. "Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton today welcomed the news that the Buffalo Police Department will receive $5.48 million from the U.S. Department of Justice through the Community Oriented Policing Services (COPS) program. In July of 2002, Senator Clinton wrote the Justice Department, urging it to approve the request and to grant the Buffalo Police Department a waiver of the 25% matching requirement. Both of these requests were granted. As a result, Buffalo will be able to hire 32 full-time police officers without needing to satisfy the program's matching fund requirement. 'Good news travels fast, especially when it is $5.48 million for the City of Buffalo to hire more police officers,' said Clinton. 'For 8 years, the COPS program has helped the City of Buffalo patrol its streets and protect its citizens. This much-needed grant is welcomed news as the city continues to meet its new homeland security needs and close its budget deficit. Police Community Relations

Senator Clinton on law enforcement: "I believe that bad relations with the community is not a necessary cost of doing business." In a speech on building crime-free communities, Senator Clinton said, "There are police officers who are members of religious congregations just like this one all across New York - who know that they are feared by the people they risk their lives to protect, and who want so badly to restore trust with the communities they serve. I know there are many rank-and-file police officers who feel like they are caught in the middle. They see the community anger, and they want to respond. Yet the leadership in this city refuses to reach out - to work with a community that is in pain. To even acknowledge that there is a problem. I believe that bad relations with the community is not a necessary cost of doing business." [Senator Clinton speech on Building Communities Free of Crime and Full of Respect, 3/5/00 (viaarchive.org)]

- Senator Clinton: "I reject the false choice between effective policing and mutual respect." In a speech on building crime-free communities, Senator Clinton said, "I reject - with all my heart - the notion that falling crime rates demand the rising mistrust between communities and police. I reject the false choice between effective policing and mutual respect. It is a false choice to say that we cannot cut crime and have better community relations. It is a false choice to say that we cannot have safer streets and greater trust and confidence in the police. That we don't is a 'lost opportunity', as former Commissioner Bill Bratton has said." Senator Clinton supported expanding the Department of Housing and Urban Development's "'Officer Next Door' Program, which helps officers afford homes in inner-city neighborhoods." In a speech on building crime-free communities, Senator Clinton said, "And there is no better way for police officers to understand that community they serve than to move in and become homeowners in those neighborhood. That's why I support and would fight to expand initiatives such as HUD's 'Officer Next Door' Program, which helps officers afford homes in inner-city neighborhoods." Fighting Racial Profiling

Senator Clinton argued that racial profiling increases "mistrust" between law enforcement and the people. "We are so pleased to be joined by representatives of the law enforcement community today, including Chief Bruce Chamberlain, an esteemed and experienced member of the law enforcement community nationally. He is the Chief of Police in Cheektowaga, New York. He and others, including the experts at the John Jay College of Criminal Justice, know that racial profiling is not an effective law enforcement tool. The vast majority of African Americans and Hispanics who are stopped or searched have committed no crime. Rather than serving as an effective law enforcement tool, racial profiling achieves one thing and one thing only – increasing the level of mistrust between those who enforce the law, and those whom the law seeks to protect." [Senator Clinton speech on the End Racial Profiling Act of 2001, 6/6/01 (via archive.org)]

Senator Clinton touted legislation, which she cosponsored, to end racial profiling. "Rather than serving as an effective law enforcement tool, racial profiling achieves one thing and one thing only – increasing the level of mistrust between those who enforce the law, and those whom the law seeks to protect. Our legislation works to do the opposite. It works to build trust between law enforcers and the communities they serve. It works to end racial profiling by building alliances between citizens and police. It works to end racial profiling by using training and technology and communication to enhance the capacity of police to do their difficult jobs while avoiding practices that single out individuals solely because of their race, ethnicity or national origin. In so doing, I believe our bill will do more than end racial profiling. It will help us do an even better job fighting crime." Stop and Frisk

Senator Clinton: "Too many African-American and Latino men in [New York City] have suffered the inconvenience - and the indignity - of being stopped and searched by police for no apparent reason, reasons they do not understand." In a speech on building crime-free communities, Senator Clinton said, "Let us start by recognizing that crime is down dramatically -- and lives have been saved in this city - because every day brave men and women put on a uniform and place themselves in harm's way to protect us. And let us also recognize that far too many people believe they are considered suspect simply because of the color of their skin. Too many African-American and Latino men in this city have suffered the inconvenience - and the indignity - of being stopped and searched by police for no apparent reason, reasons they do not understand. For every 16 African Americans stopped and frisked, only one is arrested. Today people of color worry if they will be next. And many white New Yorkers worry that the price we are paying is too high." [Senator Clinton speech on Building Communities Free of Crime and Full of Respect, 3/5/00 (via archive.org)]

Faith-Based Outreach

Senator Clinton criticized the "false division or debate about the role of faith based institutions." "But I ask you, who is more likely to go out onto a street to save some poor, at-risk child than someone from the community, someone who believes in the divinity of every person, who sees God at work in the lives of even the most hopeless and left-behind of our children. And that's why we need to not have a false division or debate about the role of faith based institutions, we need to just do it and provide the support that is needed on an ongoing basis. You know, sometimes it gets a little bit rarefied in the air in Washington and these discussions lose track of what's really at stake. What's really at stake are the faces of these children that we've been seeing on the screens all evening. We know that many thousands of children have been turned away from violence, have been given a chance at a new and better future for themselves. Children need adult support, supervision, guidance, attention, discipline, and love. There is no substitute for it. No government program can provide it, no institution can offer it. It has to come from inside each and every one of us." [Senator Clinton speech to the Ten Point National Leadership Foundation, 1/19/05 (via archive.org)]

Senator Clinton: "There is no contradiction between supporting faith-based institutions and upholding our constitutional principles." "There is no contradiction between supporting faith-based institutions and upholding our constitutional principles, and what I hope is that the careful balance that not only has been but can be struck, will enable us to look for more ways to engage people in the important work of reaching out and lifting up each other." [Senator Clinton speech to the Ten Point National Leadership Foundation, 1/19/05 (via archive.org)]

Senator Clinton noted the Clinton administration balanced faith-based initiatives with the U.S. Constitution. "During the Clinton Administration, we tried to strike that balance, we tried to support the work of faith-based organizations while at the same time recognizing the very important tradition and constitutional principle of the separation of church and state. We can do that, and we can ensure that successful programs are open to all people and give people a chance to grow and develop and lift themselves up out of the conditions that have dragged them down. We cannot come in, through the government, and dictate to faith-based organizations how they should best minister in their streets, and in their churches, and in their synagogues, and mosques. We have to recognize and honor the expertise and the courage of people who have shown up, who have refused to turn their backs on neighborhoods that many would not even go into today." Youth Crime

Senator Clinton on youth violence: Americans could all "point to tragic issues that make the headlines and those we know about in our own lives." In remarks at Oyster Bay Boys' and Girls' Club, Senator Clinton said, "As you can see we've got a wonderful group of people to talk about some important issues. I don't think it is any surprise for any parent or teacher or any citizen really in New York or in our country today. We're going to be focusing on the topic of youth violence and some of the specific things we think we can do about youth violence. It has been all too much in the news and there are so many tragic incidents that each of us can point to those that make the headlines and those we know about in our own lives." [Senator Clinton remarks at Oyster Bay Boys' and Girls' Club, 12/21/99 (via archive.org)]

Senator Clinton proposed "a new initiative to support partnerships between faith-based institutions and police to steer troubled youth away from gangs and violence, and to promote mutual respect and understanding." In a speech on building crime-free communities, Senator Clinton said, "In so many communities, no institution has more influence than the neighborhood church, mosque or synagogue. We must tap into this potential in New York. So I do propose a new initiative to support partnerships between faith-based institutions and police to steer troubled youth away from gangs and violence, and to promote mutual respect and understanding. I have spoken with many clergy, political leaders, and law enforcement professionals in the last weeks and months and I know that they all are anxious to be partners in this effort. You know, it can start with just one meeting, if the will is there. The efforts in Boston started just that way." [Senator Clinton speech on Building Communities Free of Crime and Full of Respect, 3/5/00 (via archive.org)]

Senator Clinton supported "youth police academies in our high schools, programs modeled after the ROTC program that would bring police training to students in poorer, minority neighborhoods." In a speech on building crime-free communities, Senator Clinton said, "We must also improve efforts to recruit and train police--a police force that truly reflects the racial and ethnic diversity of this city. You know, of all the ten largest cities in America New York's police department is the third least racially diverse of all ten. The 9th and 10th cities have a larger white population. Now that's a problem. That is why I support youth police academies in our high schools, programs modeled after the ROTC program that would bring police training to students in poorer, minority neighborhoods. Police officers can mentor these students - and help them understand the rewards and responsibilities of police work. And young people who never thought of becoming police officers might just be inspired to join this crucial profession." [Senator Clinton speech on Building Communities Free of Crime and Full of Respect, 3/5/00 (via archive.org)]

Senator Clinton: "I believe one of the best anti-crime and anti-poverty programs is a world class public education." In a speech on restoring trust in communities, Senator Clinton said, "You know we have to keep our eyes on the prize of a better, safer future for all of our children. I believe one of the best anti-crime and anti-poverty programs is a world class public education. We should be spending our energy on working together to make sure that every child has the opportunity to learn and to reach his or her greatest God-given potential." [Senator Clinton speech on Restoring Trust Within Our Communities, 3/20/00 (via archive.org)]

Senator Clinton: Stereotypes about young people "are just as disruptive as the stereotypes based on race, or ethnicity, or religion, or any other kind of status." "I have spent a lot of time in the last years going, speaking with groups of young people and trying to draw attention to what I know to be a fact, which is that I think we have the finest generation of young people in the history of our country. But, too often, that is not the way you are portrayed or viewed. And the stereotypes about young Americans are just as disruptive as the stereotypes based on race, or ethnicity, or religion, or any other kind of status. So part of the reason I'm pleased to be here is to demonstrate clearly to as many people who would care to watch or follow this that I have a lot of confidence in our future because I have a lot of confidence in all of you." [Senator Clinton speech on education, 3/21/00 (via archive.org)]

Senator Clinton: "[We] have to pay more attention to what troubles our children before they ever pick up a weapon or start a fight." In a speech on gun violence, Senator Clinton said, "Now as I said earlier, I believe that guns play a major role in the violence and the deadly effects of violence. But we have to pay more attention to what troubles our children before they ever pick up a weapon or start a fight. It's no secret to any of us that there's a lot of confusion and alienation out there. Now some of it is normal development as many parents here can attest. But some of this angst, and an increasing amount of it, is more serious." [Senator Clinton speech on Keeping Our Children Safe from Gun Violence,5/9/00 (via archive.org)]

Supporting Police Funding

Senator Clinton supported raising police salaries and providing better training "so that the best-trained and prepared officers will keep us safer." In a speech on building crime-free communities, Senator Clinton said, "We must also help New York attract and retain the best and the brightest of our young people by bringing salaries and compensation into line with what the opportunities are outside the police world. We should raise salaries and provide better training so that the best-trained and prepared officers will keep us safer and deserve those better salaries." Senator Clinton criticized President Bush for "reducing funding for the Community Oriented Policing Services (COPS) program by 17% and eliminating grants to states to fight drug abuse in public housing." "Schumer and Clinton criticized Bush's budget for reducing funding for the Community Oriented Policing Services (COPS) program by 17% and eliminating grants to states to fight drug abuse in public housing. Since its inception, the COPS program has brought over $773 million to New York communities, helping to place and fund almost 11,000 new police officers on the streets of cities and communities across the state. The Bush Budget reduces funding for the COPS program from $1.042 billion in FY 2001 to $865 million in FY 2002. Last year, New York State received $103 million in COPS awards, almost 12% of all the COPS grants given out in the entire nation. Schumer and Clinton said that the smaller allotment of overall funding for the program could reduce New York's share of COPS money this year." [Senator Clinton press release, 4/9/01 (via archive.org)]

- Senator Clinton considered legislation to restore the funding the Bush Administration cut from the COPS program. "A new study unveiled today by US Senators Chuck Schumer and Hillary Clinton and Congressman Anthony Weiner shows that proposed budget federal cuts could cost New York City hundreds of police officers and thousands in the tri-state area. Schumer, Clinton and Weiner discussed legislation that would prevent the cuts proposed to the federal Community Oriented Policing Services (COPS) program and keep police officers on the beat." - Senator Clinton: "Local law enforcement officers have lowered the crime rate nationwide - we owe them a debt of gratitude, not a cut in their funding." "I am proud to stand here today with my colleagues, and mayors and police chiefs from New York and America to say loudly and clearly that national security begins at the local level. And that means making sure that our local law enforcement officers, who are on the frontlines of our defense against crime, have the resources they need to continue protecting every family, in every home, in every community in America. - Senator Clinton worked to secure "nearly $1.4 billion" in funding for COPS and other state and local law enforcement grants. "I am working in the Budget Committee to secure funding totaling nearly $1.4 billion for COPS and state and local law enforcement grants -- almost $1.2 billion above the President's budget -- for these critical programs." Senator Clinton lauded the Justice Department for its support to law enforcement through the Bulletproof Vest Partnership Program. "In addition, Senator Clinton lauded the Department of Justice for distributing funds to provide up to half the cost of bullet-resistant vests to communities in New York and around the country through the Bulletproof Vest Partnership Program. The program helps state, county and local law enforcement and corrections agencies to purchase over 190,000 bulletproof vests this year. This year, New York State received $1,424,586 through this program -- funding for nearly 10,000 vests for law enforcement officers." [Senator Clinton press release, 5/15/01 (viaarchive.org)]

Senator Clinton called on the Department of Transportation and the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration to take immediate steps to protect police officers who were driving Crown Victoria police vehicles. "Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton today released a letter calling upon the U.S Department of Transportation (DOT) and the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration (NHTSA) to take immediate steps to protect the thousands of police officers - across the state and the country - who are currently driving Crown Victoria police vehicles. In a letter sent last week to DOT Secretary Mineta and NHTSA Administrator Runge, Senator Clinton expressed her concerns about the safety of the Crown Victoria vehicles and asked that both agencies work with law enforcement to address such issues as vehicle lighting, safety shield installment and impact safety standards." Senator Clinton: "We should do all we can to ensure that as our law enforcement officers do their jobs, they are not put unnecessarily in harm's way." 2008 Crime Proposals

Senator Clinton called for more cops on the street and increased funding for community policing. "In a major speech to the National League of Cities today, Hillary Clinton called for putting more police officers on America's streets by restoring funding to the nation's community policing program after a report last week showed violent crime rising over the last two years." [Hillary Clinton '08 campaign press release, 3/13/07 (via rchive.org)]

Senator Clinton proposed more than doubling funding for Community Oriented Policing Systems. "'As funding for the COPS program has gone down, crime has gone up,' Clinton said. 'By boosting funding for community policing we can put more cops on the beat and make our communities safer.' [...] With crime rising in cities across America, Clinton said she would more than double funding for Community Oriented Policing Systems (COPS) to Clinton administration levels of more than $1 billion. President Bush's proposed budget slashes COPS funding by 94%, from $541 million in 2007 to $34 million in 2008, and provides no money to hire new police officers." [Hillary Clinton '08 campaign press release, 3/13/07 (via archive.org)]

Senator Clinton proposed these measures as a means of deterring crime. "I will work to deter crime by re-investing in our communities, re-invigorating the COPS program, and putting 100,000 new officers committed to community policing into neighborhoods across America. Studies have shown that the COPS program deters crime." [Hillary Clinton '08 campaign press release, 2/28/08 (via archive.org)]

Senator Clinton's campaign touted her anti-crime agenda. "At a speech in Philadelphia today, Hillary Clinton unveiled an ambitious new anti-crime agenda that would cut the murder rate in big cities in half and put 100,000 new police officers on America's streets. Through her plan called 'Solutions for Safe and Secure Communities Now,' Hillary would also invest $1 billion competitive grant program to reduce the number of repeat offenders and the size of the population in prisons and juvenile lock-ups nationwide. In addition, Hillary will partner with states and communities to support early intervention programs that would prevent at-risk youth from engaging in criminal activity. [...] Hillary also calls for additional funds to stop online crimes such as child exploitation and identity theft. Hillary will direct the Attorney General to make online child exploitation and harassment a major federal priority, and vigorously prosecute identity theft, particularly theft of children's identities. She will strengthen and vigorously enforce federal laws against online child exploitation, and she will dramatically increase funding for state Internet Crimes Against Children task forces." Senator Clinton proposed a plan to cut the urban homicide rate in half. "Hillary will work with cities across the country where murder is a particular challenge to cut their murder rate in half, by building partnerships between these cities and the Department of Justice. This proposal builds on local efforts, such as Mayor Michael Nutter's pledge to cut the homicide rate in Philadelphia, and seeks to replicate successes like we have seen in New York City, where homicides have fallen from more than 2,000 per year in the early 1990s to less than 500 in 2007. Hillary will task the Deputy Attorney General with overseeing this initiative." [Hillary Clinton '08 campaign press release, 4/11/08 (via archive.org)]

Senator Clinton proposed creating Gang Violence Reduction Grants and supported anti-gang programs. "The Gang Violence Reduction Grant would help cities implement a locally tailored version of the anti-gang/anti-violence model first developed in Boston and refined in cities like Chicago and Cincinnati. The model involves community-oriented police working in close partnership with community leaders – including faith leaders – and social service agencies, sending a clear signal to gangs and potentially violent offenders that their own communities reject violence, that violence would be met with clear, predictable, and certain consequences, and that alternatives would be available to those who would take them. Gang Violence Reduction Grants will allow communities to address the other ills that accompany gangs, including drug trafficking and extortion. In addition to grant awards, DOJ will help cities retain experts to work with them on implementing proven tactics and will fund a national framework for research and information- sharing. School districts can also apply through this grant program for funding to address early onset of youth violence. Boy's and Girl's Clubs are one of the best anti-gang programs we have." [Hillary Clinton '08 campaign press release, 4/11/08 (via archive.org)]

Senator Clinton proposed establishing a Drug Market Elimination Grant to close "overt drug markets." "A new Drug Market Elimination Grant to close overt drug markets and reduce violent crime and homicide. Overt drug markets – street sales, drug houses, and the like – drive violence, disorder, and recidivism in large and small cities nationally. This new Drug Market Elimination Grant would help cities implement a locally tailored version of the drug market strategy first developed in High Point, North Carolina and refined in cities like Providence and Rockford, Illinois. The model involves disrupting local drug markets, sending serious and violent offenders to prison, and working with communities, families, service providers, the faith community, and local government to redirect low-level offenders while law enforcement ensures that any further drug activity is met with immediate consequences." [Hillary Clinton '08 campaign press release, 4/11/08 (via archive.org)]

Senator Clinton called for renewing the Assault Weapons Ban. "To reduce the number of dangerous weapons on our cities' streets, Hillary will: Renew the Assault Weapons Ban to take the most dangerous categories of firearms and magazines off the streets." [Hillary Clinton '08 campaign press release, 4/11/08 (via archive.org)]

Senator Clinton proposed facilitating a partnership between ATF andlocal law enforcement to stop gun trafficking. "To reduce the number of dangerous weapons on our cities' streets, Hillary will: [...] Repeal the Tiahrt amendment, which limits ATF's authority to share federal gun-trace data with local law enforcement for investigatory purposes. Direct ATF to initiate partnerships with local law enforcement to coordinate and enhance tracking of crime guns and investigate and prosecute gun traffickers. Collaborations like New York City's Joint Firearms Task Force with ATF may be used as a model. [...] Hillary will make sure that federal government law enforcement – including the FBI – has the resources it needs to serve as an effective partner with states and local communities, including developing and sharing intelligence on drug trafficking and gangs that operate across state and national borders." [Hillary Clinton '08 campaign press release, 4/11/08 (via archive.org)]

Senator Clinton called for supporting local efforts to stem gun trafficking and assist detectives. "To reduce the number of dangerous weapons on our cities' streets, Hillary will: [...] Encourage police agencies to use COPS hiring grants to open or expand independent Firearms Investigation Units, and award technology grants to local law enforcement to build ballistics imaging analysis systems that enhance detectives' efforts." [Hillary Clinton '08 campaign press release, 4/11/08 (via archive.org)]

Senator Clinton proposed a "COPS 2.0" to fund the hiring and training of 100,000 community police officers. "Hillary is proposing a new, strengthened COPS (Community Oriented Policing Services) hiring grant program. COPS 2.0 will provide funding for 100,000 new community police officers and ensure that they are trained, equipped and deployed in the most effective ways to work in partnership with communities to prevent violent crime. The program will focus on hot spots of criminal activity, in big cities and elsewhere. It will promote intelligence-led policing – the strategic gathering, analysis and sharing of intelligence to identify and target the most serious threats and dangerous criminals – as a complement to community policing. It will also make available personnel grants to fund counter-terrorism cops as well as community police officers." [Hillary Clinton '08 campaign press release, 4/11/08 (via archive.org)]

Senator Clinton's "COPS 2.0" would encourage the use of advanced technologies and tactics. "COPS 2.0 will award both a five-year personnel grant and an accompanying TAT (technology and tactics) grant to local governments, updating and upgrading the original COPS personnel and technology grants. Strategic use of manpower resources to maximize impact, through hot spots policing; the creation of 'hot lists'; sensible, constitutional zero-tolerance enforcement; and other proven methods. Commissioner Kelly's 'Operation Impact' provides a good model that can be replicated in other jurisdictions. Strategic use of data, intelligence, mapping, and other analytical approaches to back up the police on the beat. Most violent crime emanates from a few neighborhoods and centers around a small number of individuals. Intelligence-led policing, mapping, and data mining can help in pinpointing sources of crime and can produce leads about shootings and other crimes in minutes that once took days or weeks to establish. Strategic use of the most advanced technologies available, from surveillance cameras to gunshot detectors to laptops and cameras in police cars." [Hillary Clinton '08 campaign press release, 4/11/08 (via archive.org)]

Senator Clinton's "COPS 2.0" would encourage strategic community cooperation. "Even as it encourages new technologies and tactical innovations, the program will maintain the premise of the original COPS program that there is no substitute for a uniformed police officer on patrol to reduce crime. COPS 2.0 will help communities field an increased police presence and implement a mixture of the following approaches: Strategic partnerships with local leaders, community organizations, and social service agencies. COPS 2.0 will stress the 'community' in community policing, and will call upon local jurisdictions to adopt proven partnership-driven strategies to address challenges facing at-risk youth. […] Strategic cooperation and information-sharing with other agencies and jurisdictions, including benchmarks for assessing performance and results. School-based partnerships between local law enforcement and schools to combat gun violence, gangs, drug activities, and other challenges." [Hillary Clinton '08 campaign press release, 4/11/08 (via archive.org)]

Senator Clinton proposed establishing a "Vets to Cops" program, reserving five percent of "COPS 2.0" jobs for vets. "Police departments have been hit hard by call-ups of officers to active duty in the Armed Forces. Returning veterans often seek job opportunities where they can use their skills and serve their country. As part of COPS 2.0, Hillary will establish a 'Vets to Cops' initiative that sets aside up to 5% of the COPS positions over the next five years for members of the Armed Forces, Reserves, and National Guard. Building on the 'Troops to Cops' program of the 1990s, Hillary will direct the Justice Department to actively recruit returning veterans to continue their public service by joining local police forces." [Hillary Clinton '08 campaign press release, 4/11/08 (via archive.org)]

Senator Clinton proposed $250 million annually for hiring and training community prosecutors. "Community-oriented prosecutors have a key role to play in reducing crime, just as community-oriented police do – and they need federal funding and support, just as community oriented police do. Community prosecutors focus not just on closing cases and clearing dockets, but on reducing crime and improving the quality of life in the neighborhoods to which they are assigned. Hillary will allocate $250 million per year to help local district attorneys hire and train community prosecutors." [Hillary Clinton '08 campaign press release, 4/11/08 (via archive.org)]

Senator Clinton proposed restoring funding to crime-fighting and local law enforcement aid programs. "Hillary will reverse the funding cuts to the Byrne Justice Assistant Grant program and restore funding to other DOJ local law enforcement assistance programs. Of course, all of these grants will be subject to audit by the Inspector General to prevent and deter waste, fraud and abuse. Hillary will also make permanent and fully fund the Bulletproof Vest Program." [Hillary Clinton '08 campaign press release, 4/11/08 (via archive.org)]

CTR Statement on Response to Rand Paul

"Rand Paul's extremist views abroad and at home are dangerous. His belief in extreme isolation as a global neighbor and his extreme opposition to raising the minimum wage and to giving a hand up to hard-working Americans are wrong for our country, our people and our place in the world. Secretary Clinton's work for American families at home and abroad speaks for itself. Her vision and focus on our future is what Americans want."

TALKING POINTS: HILLARY CLINTON INTERVIEW WITH JEFF GOLDBERG

BACKGROUND: In a story published Sunday in The Atlantic, Jeffrey Goldberg writes about his extensive interview the week before with Hillary Clinton regarding foreign policy, including the situation in Syria.

KEY TAKEAWAYS:

· "Great nations need organizing principles, and 'Don't do stupid stuff' is not an organizing principle. It may be a necessary brake on the actions you might take in order to promote a vision," said Hillary Clinton.

· According to Clinton, Obama's statement was "a political message…it's not his worldview." She explained that Obama was simply "trying to communicate to the American people that he's not going to do something crazy…He's thoughtful, he's incredibly smart."

· Asked what her organizing principle is, Secretary Clinton said, "Peace, progress, and prosperity."

· "If we don't restore the American dream for Americans, then you can forget about any kind of continuing leadership in the world."

· Asked whether the situation with ISIS would be different if we'd done more to support the Syrian opposition, Clinton said: "I know that the failure to help build up a credible fighting force of the people who were the originators of the protests against Assad…the failure to do that left a big vacuum, which the jihadists have now filled….I totally understand the cautions that we had to contend with, but we'll never know."

SECRETARY CLINTON'S STATEMENTS ARE SIMILAR TO WHAT SHE HAS PREVIOUSLY SAID ABOUT THE SITUATION IN SYRIA:

· "Wicked problems rarely have a right answer; in fact, part of what makes them wicked is that every option appears worse than the next. Increasingly that's how Syria appeared." ["Hard Choices," CBS News, 6/5/14]

· "I recommended that we do more in the very beginning to support the moderate opposition, because I believed, at the time, that they would be overwhelmed by Assad's military force and that they would open up the door to extremists coming in." [Politico, 6/17/14]

· Regarding whether to arm the Syrian rebels, Clinton said, "The risks of both action and inaction were high. Both choices would bring unintended consequences. The Presidents' inclination was to stay the present course and not take the significant further step of arming rebels." ["Hard Choices", CBS News, 6/5/14]

· "No one likes to lose a debate, including me. But this was the President's call and I respected his deliberations and decision. From the beginning of our partnership, he had promised me that would always get a fair hearing. And I always did. In this case, my position didn't prevail." ["Hard Choices", CBS News, 6/5/14]

· "I could not have predicted the extent to which ISIS was effective in seizing cities in Iraq and taking over the region." [The Hill, 6/12/14]

Middle East Energy: Beyond an Iran Nuclear Deal

Iran hopes that the pending nuclear framework agreement will lead to much needed foreign investment in its oil and gas sector. Insofar as eased sanctions permit, billions of dollars will be needed to reverse production declines and re-establish production growth. How realistic are Iran's aspirations to attract such investment, and what increased production and exports can be reasonably expected over the near to medium term?

In turn, what will be the impact of increased Iranian exports on its neighbors, notably Iraq and Saudi Arabia, and their desire to secure a larger share of the global market? How will the Saudis and other Gulf monarchies react to Iranian moves? What are the implications of changes in Saudi national and energy leadership and of Kurdish moves to produce and export separately from Baghdad? What is the effect of these regional changes on the global energy balance?

Energy experts will explore these issues in this eighth event in the Wilson Center's Regional and Global Energy Series .

HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

"WE CAN'T WAIT"

INDIANOLA, IOWA

THURSDAY, JANUARY 21, 2015

- Hello, Indianola! I'm so excited to be with you today. We're energized, we're organized, and we're ready to go win a caucus! I want to thank [name], our terrific organizer here. She's doing a great job.
- And I want to thank all the precinct captains, union members, and volunteers who are here. Raise your hand if you've made a phone call or knocked on a door for this campaign… You are our heart and soul -- and you're why we're going to win on February 1st.
- I am so grateful to all of you who've already decided to support me in the caucus. If you haven't yet, I hope you'll fill out one of our blue commitment cards. If you're still deciding who to support, I'm glad you're here and I hope I can earn your vote.
- Democrats have an important choice to make. I have a lot of respect for Senator Sanders and Governor O'Malley and it's good that we're having a spirited debate.
- But let's not forget -- our differences pale compared to what we see on the other side. One party is becoming defined by paranoia, prejudice, and greed. The other is focused on creating good-paying jobs and holding Wall Street accountable. That's why I'm proud to be a Democrat.
- Republicans want Americans to suffer from collective amnesia. Well, we're going to remind people of the facts – that the economy does a whole lot better when there's a Democrat in the White House.
- We're going to build on the progress we've made and help more families get ahead and stay ahead. Because when families are strong, America is strong.
- For me, this is about more than politics. I feel so blessed to have been born in this country to wonderful parents who gave me a great start in life. I went to wonderful public schools with teachers that inspired me. I had the opportunity to go to college, which my mother never had. America has given me so much. And I feel passionately that it's our responsibility to make sure future generations have even greater opportunities.
- I know what it's like to be knocked down. I've had a few hard times in my own life. I doubt there's anybody here who hasn't had their share. But I learned from my mom and my faith that it's not whether you get knocked down, it's whether you get back up. And I've gotten back up time and time and time again… because as long as there's work to do and people to help, I'm not going to quit.
- You know why I'm so determined? Because of you. Because of the people I've met all across Iowa. You've shared your hopes and your heartaches. I've heard the problems that keep you up at night and the dreams that get you up in the morning.
- I met a gentleman the other day in Cedar Rapids who told me that his prescription drug costs had tripled. I met a mom at that same event who said that her son has diabetes and even insulin is getting much more expensive – insulin's not some fancy new drug, it's been around forever. The only reason is greed.
- Last month in Waterloo, a worried husband named Larry told me his wife Brenda spends hundreds of dollars each month on medicine for arthritis and osteoporosis. When they see hedge fund tycoons buying drug companies and raising prices by 4000 percent overnight, they just want to scream.

- Something is wrong when your paycheck has barely grown in years, but corporate profits and CEO pay are at near-record highs. Something is wrong when you can do everything right, but still not get ahead. Like Brandi from Des Moines, who was laid off six years ago. She went back to school, worked hard, got her degree. Now she's a supervisor in a restaurant, but still only makes $9.50 an hour. That's not enough, especially with kids.
- Brandi needs a raise. Larry and Brenda need lower drug prices. People across Iowa need more good jobs, help with their student debt, a more secure retirement.
- These are the problems I'm focused on. I get up every day thinking about how we're going to make a difference for people and families who really need it.
- That's what I've done my whole life, starting with my first job going door-to-door for the Children's Defense Fund. Whether it was working with Republicans and Democrats in Congress to create the Children's Health Insurance Program that now covers 8 million kids, or securing a treaty with Russia that reduces the threat we face from nuclear weapons – for me it's always about getting results. I'm not interested in ideas that sound good on paper but will never make it in the real world. What I care about is making a difference in your life.
- That gets us to the choice you have to make in this caucus. I have nothing but admiration for Senator Sanders, but we do have different records and different ideas about how to drive progress.
- Take health care, for example. I want us to defend and build on the progress we've made under President Obama, especially the Affordable Care Act.
- Remember what it was like before Obamacare? The insurance companies were in charge and free to discriminate against people with pre-existing conditions. They charged women more for the same coverage. And 44 million Americans didn't have any coverage at all.
- I don't think President Obama gets the credit he deserves for taking on this fight and getting the job done. Today, more than 90 percent of Americans are insured. I want to build on that progress. Keep expanding coverage to more people. Lower your out-of-pocket costs with a new tax credit. Cap what you have to pay each month for prescription drugs. Finally let Medicare negotiate better prices.
- We can get this done without another divisive debate on our entire health care system or giving Republicans an opening to come in and tear down everything we've achieved. We can make real progress right now for people and families who need it.
- Senator Sanders has a different approach. He cares deeply about covering more people, as I do. But rather than build on the progress we've made, he wants to start over from scratch with a whole new system. In theory, there's a lot to like about his ideas. But "in theory" isn't enough. A President has to deliver in reality.
- Senator Sanders has been in Congress for 25 years and he's introduced his health care plan again and again. But he never got even a single vote in the House or a single Senate co-sponsor. Not one.
- You hear a promise to build a whole new system, but that's not what you'll get. You'll get gridlock …and an endless wait for advances that will never come.
- The people I've met in Iowa can't wait. The grandmother who has to choose between paying for medicine and paying the rent can't wait. The single mom who desperately needs a raise can't wait. The student with a mountain of debt can't wait. You can't wait and neither can our country. We need to roll up our sleeves and start making progress right now.
- More gridlock in Washington won't help anyone. Except maybe the Republicans who are looking for any opportunity to take us backwards. We just can't take that risk.
- Across the board, we have to defend the progress we've made under President Obama and go even further.
- My economic plan will raise incomes and create good-paying jobs right away.
- First of all, I'll fight for more fairness in our economy. Let's make those at the top pay their fair share. Because multi-millionaires and companies that ship jobs overseas shouldn't get tax breaks – you should.
- Let's stop the abuse on Wall Street and make sure that if you break the law, it doesn't matter who you are, you're going to jail. Let's enforce our trade rules and stop letting countries like China take advantage of American workers and businesses.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- In America, if you work hard, you deserve to see the rewards. So let's raise the minimum wage, expand Social Security for those who need it most, and finally guarantee equal pay for women.
- And we can't stop there. More fairness is essential, but it's not enough. We also need more growth in our economy – more jobs, more new businesses, higher wages.
- We have to invest in advanced manufacturing so we're making and building things here, not somewhere else. Modernize our roads, bridges, ports, and airports. Create the clean energy jobs of the future—because it's going to be China or Germany or us, and I want it to be us. Iowa already gets a third of its energy from renewables, mostly wind. If you can do it, so can America.
- We can do this. We can make our economy stronger and our country fairer. But we have to do it together.
- The truth is, too many people today feel left out and left behind. That's not the America we want to be.
- Instead of demonizing hard-working immigrant families, we should be giving them a real path to citizenship. Instead of a school-to-prison pipeline that keeps communities of color down, we need a cradle-to-college pipeline that lifts people up.
- We have to end discrimination against LGBT Americans wherever it exists. And I'll always defend Planned Parenthood. Republicans may say I'm playing the gender card. Well, if fighting for women's health and women's rights is playing the gender card – then deal me in.
- We also can't turn our backs on working-class families in struggling rural communities and crumbling Appalachian towns… in Coal Country and Farm Country… families who for generations worked their fingers to the bone keeping our lights on and our factories running and our crops growing.
- So many are hurting right now. In a lot of places, people are dying younger than their parents. The substance abuse I hear about everywhere I go in Iowa and across our country is a big part of it. But you know what my husband said to me the other day? He said folks feel the American Dream slipping away -- and they're dying of a broken heart.
- I think Bill's right. I hear it in the voices of parents who don't know how they're going to give their kids the opportunities they deserve. I see it in the eyes of people who don't expect anything to come easy but wonder why it has to be quite so hard.
- We're going to give the American Dream back to them. We're going to make this economy work for everyone – the struggling, the striving, and the successful. That will be my mission as President, from the first day to the last.
- Now, we're not just picking a President, we're also choosing a Commander-in-Chief. I'm the only candidate on either side with the experience and judgment to keep us safe at home and strong in the world.
- The Republican candidates keep asking about my accomplishments, so I sent them all a copy of my book, "Hard Choices." I figured there were so many of them, they could start a book club.
- They could read about how I got Russia and China to agree to tough new sanctions on Iran. Or how I brokered a cease-fire between Hamas and Israel that stopped terrorist rockets from falling on Israeli homes. Maybe they'd be interested in how you push for a global agreement on climate change… oh who are we kidding, they don't care about that at all!
- Well, it's all in the book. But I didn't get a single thank you note. And based on what they're saying on the campaign trail, it doesn't seem like they learned very much.
- Promising to carpet bomb until the desert glows doesn't make you sound strong – it makes you sound like you're in over your head. Bluster and bigotry are not credentials for becoming Commander-in-Chief. And it would be a huge mistake to send U.S. combat troops into another costly ground war in the Middle East.
- Now, Senator Sanders doesn't talk very much about foreign policy. But when he does, it raises concerns, because sometimes it sounds like he's hasn't really thought it through. For example, he suggested we invite Iranian troops into Syria. That's like asking the arsonist to be the firefighter. As terrible as things are in Syria, more Iranian troops are only going to make things worse.
- The world a President has to grapple with is beyond complicated, both at home and abroad. That's why this is the hardest job in the world. I've seen it up close and personal. And I know what it takes.

- I know how to find common ground and how to stand my ground. I teamed up with Republicans like Tom Delay to improve our foster care system and Lindsey Graham to extend health benefits for our National Guard and Reserves. We had deep disagreements. But we found a sliver of common ground. And that made life better for a whole lot of people.
- You can also count on me to stand my ground. Like how I'm taking on the gun lobby in this campaign. We're losing an average of 90 Americans every day to gun violence. It's wrong, it has to stop, and I won't back down no matter what they throw at me.
- But I can't do any of this alone. I need you. On February 1st, it's up to you. You have to decide who you trust to make a real difference in your lives. So I need you knocking on doors and making phone calls. I need you caucusing on February 1st. And I need you standing with me every day as President, working to build that better America.
- Please join me. You can text JOIN to 4-7-2-4-6 right now. And then visit hillaryclinton.com . Talk to your friends and family. Talk to your neighbors. Make sure they're all going to caucus on February 1st.
- The pundits might be surprised that this race is close, but I'm not. I never doubted that I'd have to work for every vote. I never doubted that I'd face tough attacks.
- I don't care how hard Karl Rove or the Koch Brothers hit us. I've spent my life working for children, families, and our country… from the kitchen table to the peace table… working to even the odds for people who have the odds stacked against them. And I'm just getting warmed up.
- I believe that progress is possible in America because I've seen it. I remember going to the Children's Hospital in Cleveland during our battle for health care reform in the '90s. I met with a group of parents who could not get insurance for their sick children because of their pre-existing conditions. One father of two little girls, both of whom had cystic fibrosis, told me the insurance company said, "Sorry, we don't insure burning houses." He looked at me with with tears in his eyes and said, "They called my little girls burning houses." Today, because of the Affordable Care Act, those kids can get the coverage they need.
- Democrats started fighting for universal health care under Harry Truman and we never quit. That's how progress gets made. You keep going. When you get knocked down, you get back up and push even harder. Step-by-step, day-by-day, you keep going, keep building.
- That's what our next President has to do. I know how to build on the progress we've made. My opponent's ideas are a recipe for gridlock, not action. The American people can't afford that. You shouldn't have to wait for results. You shouldn't have to wait for lower drug prices. You shouldn't have to wait for higher wages or help with college loans. You shouldn't have to wait to start that small business or to enjoy a secure retirement.
- You brought our country back from the worst economic crisis in our lifetimes. Now it's your time to get ahead. And, you know what? America succeeds when you succeed.
- So, I want to thank you and all the people of Iowa. I've had the opportunity to listen to thousands of Iowans. You've shared your concerns, your worries, your hopes, your dreams. Thanks to you, if I become President, I will be a better one, a more informed one, someone who really understands first hand from you what we have to do in our country. For that, I thank you. For all you have meant to me and all you have taught me.
- Iowa, I'm listening to you, I'm fighting for you, and, with your help, as President I'm going to deliver.

The core argument remains that you have the experience to get results while Sanders' ideas are a recipe for gridlock, and Americans can't afford to wait. As much as possible, I've drawn from language that you've used either on the stump or in speeches like the Wing Ding or in debate prep, especially lines that got good applause in the past. This also reflects the conversation I had with your husband yesterday and what he said in NH today. ASP Senior Officers Statement on Climate Change

July 30, 2014 - Today, retired senior officers from across the services, all members of ASP's Consensus for American Security, issued the following statement calling for action on climate change.

Today, the United States faces a looming threat to national security: climate change. As our service in all four branches of the military taught us, we must prepare for all threats, even those that are over the horizon.

We see that our armed forces are already acting to address the very real risks posed by climate change. They must be ready to conduct missions in a rapidly changing operational environment, and they must manage the consequences of climate change.

As the military says, climate change will be a “threat multiplier” or “accelerant of instability” around the world. That means it will make already existing threats like political instability, ethnic tensions, food insecurity, or poverty worse and more dangerous.

The worsening effects of climate change around the world will cause resources like food, water, and energy to become scarcer; states will seek to secure resources for their own populations at the expense of neighbors. Specific threats to security vary around the world depending on both the climate and on the society. While conflict is not inevitable, it is possible.

This is not just the future we are talking about. Extreme weather events are already demanding a military response. Typhoon Haiyan made landfall in the Philippines with maximum sustained winds estimated at 195 mph – the highest in recorded history. Over 13,000 soldiers, sailors, airmen, and marines from the USS George Washington's battle group responded – and they saved lives.

Climate change threatens the U.S. homeland as well – and the military will be called to respond: "Defense Support to Civil Authorities" is a growing military mission. In 2012, Active Duty and National Guard troops responded to New York and New Jersey after Superstorm Sandy.

For those who question the science, we note that reducing greenhouse gases while implementing measures to adapt to the effects of climate change is basic risk management. Military planners routinely operate under uncertainty and make decisions based on incomplete information.

While the military is planning to respond to climate change, our political leaders need to act now to reduce emissions in order to prevent the worst effects. It is appropriate to have a vigorous debate about how to effectively reduce emissions. The EPA is expected to finalize a rule soon that will be an important step forward in addressing the challenges of climate change. Congress can, and should, also work to consider and pass legislation that would reduce emissions.

The United States cannot act alone – carbon dioxide emitted from China, Russia, or Brazil is just as dangerous as pollutants from here. We must enlist international partners to ensure that all countries do their fair share. Negotiations in Paris this year should come to an agreement on a system that reduces global emissions in a way that is measurable, equitable, reportable, and verifiable.

If we fail in addressing climate change we know that our military will have to respond to more disasters, terrorists will have more recruits to draw from, the world will see more conflicts over increasingly scarce resources, and ordinary Americans will pay the price.

It is time that we all take a lesson from the military in risk management: we need to plan for the long term, prepare for the future, and reduce risks now.

As former members of the United States Armed Forces, we support the above statement:

- Lieutenant General Robert G. Gard Jr., USA (Ret.)
- Lieutenant General Arlen Jameson, USAF (Ret.)
- Lieutenant General Claudia Kennedy, USA (Ret.)
- Lieutenant General Norman Seip, USAF (Ret.)

Roundtable discussions revolved mainly around Obama's change of positions on public finance. (Nina Totenberg: "They're both flip-floppers! That's what politicians do!") Graham and Biden Debate over Drilling, Iraq and NAFTA on "Meet the Press" (NBC 06/22/08 10:46am)
LINDSEY GRAHAM: It means his word is broken forever on this issue. […] You tell people you're going to change this country. […] Senator McCain supported campaign finance reform, to his detriment, with Senator Fiengold on our side. It did not go over well but John did it anyway. He took a beating to try to change the campaign finance system. Senator Obama […] literally signed his name to I will accept public finance. And know for whatever reason he has broken his word. And is it 1.4 million donors that allow you to break your word. This is reinforcing everything that is wrong with politics. […]

JOE BIDEN: Obama did say, I'm going to be a game changer. He has been a game changer. Big money is not influencing his campaign. […]

GRAHAM: I would argue that MoveOn.org has played him like a fiddle on Iraq. He said we will never to cut off funding. It was a mistake to go into Iraq, but they're there and they need the equipment. MoveOn.org laid down the law and the next supplemental, there should be times tables for withdrawal. Within two or three days he's changed his position on Iraq. He has played very much to the left. He has been told what to do by the hard left. There are a million times […] how he is captive to the left.

BIDEN: That is not true.

BRIAN WILLIAMS: […] On campaign fundraising, you say he did this for whatever reason. We know the reason it's because the Internet appeal. That his campaign found out half way through.

GRAHAM: He can out raise John.

WILLIAMS: Had that been the McCain campaign wouldn't it have been just as easy […] to make this same decision?

GRAHAM: John supported campaign finance reform and paid a heavy political price […] the bottom line about Barack Obama whatever the position, whether it be Iraq, campaign finance reform or public financing.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

BIDEN: We haven't even gotten to John's flip-flopping yet. Wait till we get to oil. Talk about big influence.

WILLIAMS: […] What's broken about NAFTA?

BIDEN: No Environmental protection […] and not giving the workers in Mexico […] to work for very little wages without protection giving another advantage that not only hurt the Mexicans but hurts American workers […]

GRAHAM: I don't want anyone running for president telling the Unions what they want to hear […] it hurts the United States for us, someone in his position to be telling our neighbors we're going to withdraw from this deal. America doesn't do it that way.

BIDEN: […] this has nothing to do with Unions; this has to do with middle class jobs. […]

WILLIAMS: Positions mostly similar between John McCain and President George W. Bush. […] Senator John McCain called for an end of the Federal ban on offshore oil drilling. His announcement is a reversal […] The environmentalist came out […] they see this as a gift, this current energy crisis, $4 a gallon at the pump, a gift given to the United States to change the way the country does business. […]

GRAHAM: […] I think it gets you some immediate relief. […] The democratic solution here is to tax at home and get Saudi Arabia to drill more. […]

BIDEN: This is a gift. A gift to the oil companies from John McCain. […] 79% of all the offshore oil available […] lies within those acres that they now have. Why are they not pumping? […] Why are these greedy fellows deciding they want to go beyond that? They want to get it in before George Bush leaves the presidency. They're not pumping the oil to keep the price up. […]

GRAHAM: […] If you're looking for a difference on energy between Obama and Senator McCain he will allow American companies to go extract off our coasts with state consent. […] To get this country into energy independence and reduce the price of gas.

BIDEN: They can do that already!

GRAHAM: No they can't. There's a Federal moratorium on off coast drilling.

BIDEN: NO NO No! This is off coast. Where do you think the 40 million acres are Lindsey? They are off the coast. Off the coasts. 40 million acres off the coasts. They want to get to the other 600 million acres that are not included in that. 79% of the reserves they already have access to.

BIDEN: You're entitled to your own opinion but not your own facts. […]

[Visual of Graham's Quote against drilling from 2005]

"The Senate . . . may consider lifting bans on exploring for oil and natural gas along the East and West coasts of the United States. … 'I feel terrible about that,' Graham said 'the worst thing we can do as a nation is taking the easy way out. … If you start opening up offshore drilling, then you are buying time and you are not addressing the fundamental problem with fossil fuels.' "

GRAHAM: […] $4 a gallon has changed my mind.

WILLIAMS: […] We are just back from Afghanistan. […] More than one American commander, while I was there, showed me what they call a HAV a High value target and then said right now I don't have […] the assets, the fighters, the bombers, the predators to go get these high value targets in Afghanistan because, as they put it, the resources are going to the other war. […]

BIDEN: […] The commanding General in Afghanistan said to me "I do not have the forces I need here to deal with where Al Qaeda lives, where Al Qaeda resides, where the real threat of terror exists." […] John McCain is viewing this like he is the commander and chief of Iraq. The President of the United States has larger security concerns than just Iraq. And there needs to be a balance here […]

GRAHAM: The central battlefront of the war on terror according to General Petraeus is Iraq. […] NATO is in charge of Afghanistan. […]

Holtz-Eakin: Bush is an Eight-Year Disappointment to Americans (CNN 06/22/08 11:15am)
WOLF BLITZER: […] John McCain is warning that Barack Obama's economic policy would take the United States back to the 1970s and the troubles of Jimmy Carter's administration. […] this is a major reversal on the part of John McCain who earlier had opposed offshore drilling off the coast of Florida and California and elsewhere [and] now supports it. Is that right?

DOUGLAS HOLTZ-EAKIN: John McCain's always supported the state's ability to make this decision. When the states had no protection he wanted the federal moratorium in place. Now that there has been a deal, Louisiana has some drilling in the Gulf, Florida wants some protection, he thinks it's appropriate to get the Feds out of the way entirely and let the states make this decision.

BLITZER: How long after they start drilling off the coast of California and elsewhere, how long would it be before there was a real significant additional supply that could have an effect? Because Senator Obama and others say it could be ten years. Is that we're talking about?

HOLTZ-EAKIN: Well, it would take about five years to get the oil on shore and begin getting the real impacts in the supply and demand but it will send a signal to the world markets and send a signal to the futures markets and will send a signal, in particular, to futures markets that the United States is going to take control of its energy destiny and not have to go as the Bush Administration has hat in hand to the Saudis and ask for more oil.

The truth is Barack Obama has no plan in energy He's opposed to lowering gas taxes. He's opposed to additional exploration. He's opposed to nuclear power. He thinks higher gas prices are just fine. The just happened too quickly for his taste.

BLITZER: Well you heard [on an earlier segment] the whole litany of what Governor Richardson just said [Obama] wants to do to reduce America's addiction on imported oil.

HOLTZ-EAKIN: It's important. John McCain believes that we have to get rid of the strategic weapon that is oil. We have to stop being held victim to this around the world so what do we do? We take care of our business. Control a little bit at home and then move on to more nuclear power, renewables, alternatives. He's laid this all out.

BLITZER: The Saudis announcing they will increase oil production, oil exports, is that something you welcome?

HOLTZ-EAKIN: It's important to have greater global supply, but it would be better if the United States controlled its energy destiny. That's what John McCain wants to do.

BLITZER: Are you concerned about the United States simply going to become even more addicted to Saudi and other foreign oil sources?

HOLTZ-EAKIN: We've seen a bipartisan failure for 30 years, you know. In the 1970s we imported 30% of our oil and now we import 60% of our oil and our national security is at risk. Our economy is at risk and our environment is at risk. It's time to have some bipartisan leadership, take control of our destiny.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

BLITZER: Would it be wise, because Iraq is now exporting a lot and pumping a lot of oil, much more than it was with a relative quiet that's developed in certain parts of the country over the past year. They are exporting and pumping more oil. Should the Iraqis be selling oil to the United States at a discounted price?

HOLTZ-EAKIN: Oil should occur on the world market at market prices.

BLITZER: Why not—given the hundreds of billions of dollars the United States has spent to rebuild that country and try to bring some stability to the Iraqis, why not have them export oil to the United States at a reduced price? They would still make some money, but they wouldn't make as much as they are making right now.

HOLTZ-EAKIN: As Senator McCain, who has gone there and seen the conditions on the ground eight times correctly pointed out, we had to bring a new strategy to Iraq. We had to get some peace, a path to prosperity for the Iraqis, but that path doesn't lie in the U.S. being dependent on Middle Eastern oil. The entire strategy was built around getting the United States to be able to exit with peace and build energy security for ourselves at home.

BLITZER: So Senator McCain believes the Iraqis should export oil to the United States at the going international price, which right now is about $135 a barrel?

HOLTZ-EAKIN: Senator McCain believes there should be an international oil market but believes the United States should not leave itself dependent on that from the Iraqis or anyone else.

BLITZER: Here's the latest A.P./Ipsos poll asking this question: 'Which track is the economy heading?'76% of the American people said the U.S. is heading in the wrong economic track and 17% said they are heading in the right track. That's a pretty disproportionate number. Give me an example of what—other than pork barrel spending ear marks—a different strategy that John McCain would take on economic policy than President Bush is taking right now?

HOLTZ-EAKIN: Well, this is more than the Bush Administration which has disappointed Americans for eight years. This is about a democratic congress that cannot address great issues. It's about Washington being broken.

BLITZER: What would Senator McCain do differently, in the short term, if he were President of the United States, differently than what's already being done by President Bush, and I know you're going to say he would find ways to eliminate pork barrel spending, the so-called ear marks, but beyond that what would he do?

HOLTZ-EAKIN: Well that would be step one in reforming Washington. Senator McCain is a person who reached across the aisle that needed judicial appointments and got it done. When we recognized the importance of immigration he stood with Senator Kennedy [and] tried to solve this great problem. We'll see someone who wants to actually help America, not pursue partisan politics.

HOLTZ-EAKIN: Well, Senator Obama has a problem with his own in that he talks a lot about taxes, says he's going to cut taxes for 95% of Americans.

BLITZER: Is this true, the suggestion that he's saying you want to give a huge tax break to those Americans making $2.8 million a year and more. That's true, right?

HOLTZ-EAKIN: No. Senator McCain, if you examine the facts on the ground, right now the top marginal tax rate in America is 35%. Under Senator McCain's plan it would be 35%. Dividends, capital gains, the access for capital to small businesses: right now [is] 15%. Under Senator McCain's create jobs first plan 15%. Mr. Obama is talking about tax cuts for the wealthy. They're not anywhere.

What John McCain would do is reduce the corporate tax rate that Is sending jobs with pension benefits and health benefits and important security for Americans, he's cutting rates—

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

BLITZER: You want to cut capital gains rate.

HOLTZ-EAKIN: 15%.

BLITZER: You want to cut it?

HOLTZ-EAKIN: It'll be 15% under John McCain. This is flowing rhetoric but reality on the ground is that John McCain wants to create jobs in this country, he doesn't want to burden small businesses, he wants to keep jobs from going overseas. He's got a plan to do that.

Senator Obama, the one person who will raise taxes in this race is going to tax small businesses, put employer mandates on for health insurance they can't afford and really threaten the jobs that Americans need right now. John McCain has jobs first. Senator Obama has talk first.

Fiorina and Richardson Square off on Candidate 'Flip-Flops' (CBS 06/22/08 10:36am)
CARLY FIORINA: I think the record is pretty clear that Barack Obama has, in fact, said that all along he would accept public financing and now he's changed his mind. He certainly has the right to do that. [...] The truth is there are more 527s gearing up and currently attacking John McCain than exist to attack Barack Obama [...].

FIORINA: [...] John McCain is on the record as having asked a couple of 527s to stand down and it's been well-documented, just in the last week, that there are far more 527s gearing up and already announcing, for example, they're gonna spend $53million to attack John McCain. MoveOn.org is the one I reference. [...]

FIORINA: I think a good leader is influenced by the facts on the ground. Whether those facts are in Iraq or those facts are right here in the United States and the reality is we have never before faced a situation where a gallon of gas is over $4 and is likely to remain over $4. We've never before faced a situation where the price of a barrel of oil has doubled in the last 12 months.

So what John McCain has said is that we now need to take control of our own energy future and that involves, among other things, tapping our own resources whether that's clean coal or natural gas (Barack Obama would tax both coal and natural gas) or whether it's approaching the subject of offshore drilling in a sensible way. [McCain] would continue to maintain that ANWR is a pristine wilderness that shouldn't be touched but we have very sizable reserves of oil off our shores and now is the time to take control of our own energy future. We must. It's a matter of national security, economic security and environmental security as well.

Reliable Sources Scrutinizes Media Response to McBush Endorsement of Offshore Drilling (CNN 06/20/08 10:18am)
HOWARD KURTZ: [...] The first time John McCain ran for president [...] he opposed offshore oil drilling and blamed Washington special interests for pushing the idea. Three weeks ago he said it would be temporary fix, at best, for our energy problems. This week McCain flipped, coming out for offshore oil-drilling and joined the next day by President Bush. The media's reaction kind of seemed to be a collective yawn: 'Ho-hum, he changed his position.'

ANN KORNBLUT: Well, I think the national media's reaction might have been that. My understanding is that the local media reaction in places like Florida where this has obviously been a big deal was somewhat greater but [...] it's another example of an issue that seems to be very policy, detail-oriented that people don't really care about [...].

KURTZ: And McCain trying to position himself as not the typical republican on the environment and yet comes out with this position on offshore oil-drilling, which […], if you're in California or, if you're in Florida, it's a local issue. […] Is this the wrong scorecard to be using? Politicians are entitled to change their positions as new facts come in or they re-think something but what bothers me is they never admit changing their positions. They always try to rationalize it with some excuse.

LOLA OGUNNAIKE: Because, if they admit changing their positions, they're vilified. […] So they decide they'd rather dance around the subject then address it straight on.

KURTZ: Why are they vilified? Because the media likes to play gotcha? You said this then and you're saying this now and therefore you're not sincere?

OGUNNAIKE: Exactly. There's no room for evolution of thought. There's no room for, 'You know, I might have just changed my mind. Upon further investigation I've decided this as opposed to this.' There's no room for that. It's very black and white. There's no room for shades of grey anymore in the media at all.

KURTZ: Do reporters go a little easier on McCain, on issues like this because of the coziness that's built up among those who are riding the Straight Talk Express?

JULIE MASON: I think there is. I mean, I certainly think there's the perception that there is, which exacerbates the fact that there is some of that. Now there appears to be a lot of that.

In the case of this flip-flop, you know, Bush did come out the next day and endorse that plan, which sort of blew that second-day story out of the water, which would have been the flip-flop. You know, that would have made a nice second-day follow on McCain's story, which he made in Houston, which was a huge story for us [at the Houston Chronicle]. Then Bush comes out and endorses the plan and that becomes the story and then the debate becomes offshore drilling or not offshore drilling instead of McCain flip-flop?

KURTZ: Wasn't it your sense and [for] people at the Houston Chronicle that this was all very orchestrated. The president was going to come out the day after [the] republican nominee suddenly changes his position on offshore oil drilling?

MASON: Yes! Yes! Absolutely. Sure. Yeah, there was a clear sense of that.

KURTZ: And yet I have the impression that more attention was paid to Cindy McCain's cookie recipe, which was ripped off by an intern and turned out to be from some food network site.

KORNBLUT: […] That's easier to summarize in 30 seconds than to talk about the merits—pro and con—of offshore drilling and what the effect will be on gas prices 30 years from now, but nonetheless, there actually was a treatment of a serious issue. The campaign certainly took it seriously and we even heard the Obama campaign describing the McCain campaign as 'the Double-Talk Express,' trying to re-brand the Straight Talk Express. So I think actually that something has changed with this position this week, even if it didn't dominate the news coverage.

May Be "Impossible to Believe that Another Republican Could get Elected" (NBC 06/22/08 10:09am)
CHRIS MATTHEWS: The situation right now, it really does take a Houdini to get out of. It's almost like he is belted up with all these chains around him and he's in some safe at the bottom of the Atlantic. He's got to get out of the gas tax problem and defend that. He's got to defend himself against a recession, against a dollar that's worth like an Old Portuguese escudo right now. He's got every problem in the world economically, your laughing but its true. Everything is wrong and he's gonna say you think this is bad.

KATTY KAY: Every single number is going in the wrong direction. And at a time win 82% of American's think the country's on the wrong track it is almost impossible to believe that another Republican could get elected. But here is his silver lining, the Republican's ratings are going down but John McCain's ratings in comparison to his party are doing pretty well.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

MATTHEWS: How do you masquerade yourself as not the defender of status quo if you're John McCain? How do you just avoid all the hell that just comes with just being in the incumbent party this time?

KATHLEEN PARKER: Well he is clearly no longer the Maverick. He's the mainstream candidate. But I think what McCain is trying to do is paint Obama as the Jimmy Carter candidate and he's trying to leapfrog over Bush and over Clinton to Reagan, and attach himself to that legacy. And he's likely to do that well because he does have a taxpayer friendly economic plan. The problem is getting hurt at all. Because even if you say that the class warfare is over Obama's platform is being perceived as the poor people vs. the rich people. He wants to make it hard on corporate America. He's going to raise the taxes on corporate America. Which does, 140 million American's go to work in corporate America every single day.

KAY: But there are plenty of Republican's that don't trust John McCain on taxes either. Look how long it took Grover Norquest, the tax cuter of the Republican Party to come out and support John McCain. It took him a pretty long time. It's not as if John McCain is a completely solid pro-business candidate anyways. [...]

JIM CRAMER: Not at all, No one trusts him.

ANDREW SULLIVAN: The conditions are so overwhelming that it's very hard for him to get out of this Republican taint. But as a said before I do think the fear, the fear of a new young president raising taxes is an important fear […]

MATTHEWS: […] John McCain has to pay the piper for the bad times.

KAY: I just keep coming back to this 82% number, and I just find it very had to see how there is another term of the same party when so many people in the country, across the board, and these are Democrats and Republicans, are both saying that its going in the wrong direction.

MATTHEWS: Speak for the investor class […]

CRAMER: Investor class is sick of it. Investor class is sick of Republicans. They're sick of them. We have stagflation, it's the worst. It's the worst for the rich, it's worst for poor, It's worst's for the middle class. We need a new broom.

MATTHEWS: […] If Obama wins does the stock market go up?

CRAMER: Yes. […]

Severing ties with foundation won't insulate Clinton from past donations

BY GREG GORDON

McClatchy Washington BureauApril 13, 2015 Updated 16 minutes ago

US NEWS HILLARYCLINTON 8 ABA

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton and Chelsea Clinton, vice chair of the Clinton Foundation.

OLIVIER DOULIERY — MCT

WASHINGTON — Hillary Clinton's announcement that she's stepping down from her family foundation's board of directors while running for president was well received, but that won't shield her from the roiling controversy over the foundation's acceptance of tens of millions of dollars from foreign governments.

The boards of the Clinton Foundation and the affiliated Clinton Health Access Initiative are scheduled to meet this week to consider additional actions as a result of her candidacy, possibly including new curbs on foreign donations.

That won't hush the brouhaha, either, but it could, at least, shut off new attack avenues for rivals seeking to capitalize on her financial entanglements – likely the most extensive web of connections to private and foreign donors of any politician in modern times.

The former secretary of state has faced a barrage of questions and criticism in recent weeks about the foundation's acceptance of $2 billion in donations since 2001, especially those from Arab nations that engaged in human rights abuses or union-busting tactics.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Until 2013, the foundation was run by Clinton's husband, former President Bill Clinton. But many observers believe that some donors contributed in hopes of winning favor with Hillary Clinton, who led the State Department from 2009 to 2013 and has long been considered the front-runner in the 2016 Democratic presidential race.

Now that she's formally a candidate, Clinton is likely to become the focus of even more intense scrutiny from the news media, as well as from conservative groups and Republican committees seeking to sully her image.

She resigned from the foundation's board in an email Sunday, saying she was stepping down "to devote myself to this new, all-encompassing endeavor."

Her decision "is not unexpected and is an appropriate step to avoid any potential conflicts now that she is a presidential candidate," said Anthony Corrado, a professor of government at Colby College in Maine. However, it will change little with regard to the campaign, he said.

Foundation officials, who lacked authorization to speak for the record, said that directors of both the Clinton Foundation and the Clinton Health Access Initiative would consider changes to their donor policies, including whether to more frequently identify their contributors and "other changes."

Foundation officials have said its policy of accepting foreign donations would be reviewed if Hillary Clinton became the Democratic nominee. Before she became secretary of state, the foundation did agree to restrict foreign donations so that no foreign government could give "materially" more than in prior years, a policy that enabled countries like Qatar and Oman to continue to give.

But Sheila Krumholz, executive director of the Washington-based Center for Responsive Politics, said that "what's important is that the relationships with these high-rolling donors are already established, and the money's already raised."

As Hillary Clinton attempts to mold her image for her presidential bid, she likely will be confronted again and again about those financial connections, including the foreign donations that put her in awkward positions as secretary of state.

For example, the International Business Times reported last week that Clinton refused to stand up against the government of Colombia after its military rounded up union organizers during a strike against the country's largest oil company in 2011 and threatened them at gunpoint if they failed to disband. Instead, it said, the State Department publicly praised the South American country's progress on human rights.

At the same time, Pacific Rubiales, a sprawling Canadian oil company that was involved in the labor impasse, and its founder, Frank Giustra, were pledging millions of dollars to the Clinton Foundation, the Business Times reported.

No family has tapped so much money from companies, wealthy individuals and foreign countries as the Clintons, putting Hillary Clinton in uncharted waters even if she winds up winning the Democratic nomination.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Besides the foundation donations, Clinton and her husband have already raised billions of dollars in three presidential campaigns. Hillary Clinton has run two expensive New York Senate races. And after he left the White House and she left the State Department in 2001 and 2013 respectively, Bill and Hillary Clinton have together likely reaped as much as $120 million in fees for speaking engagements around the world.

“They have an extraordinary number of relationships developed around fundraising,” dating back more than 20 years, Krumholz said. “I think it’s fair to say that this is a dynastic family like the Bushes that has been courting very powerful interests and wealthy donors for decades and decades.”

'Exxon John' McCain Turns Back on Planet, Pushes Off-Shore Drilling

McCain gimmick is not solution to energy crisis; focus must be on affordable alternatives

WASHINGTON, D.C.—Friends of the Earth Action President Brent Blackwelder had the following statement in response to John McCain's plan to announce an off-shore drilling proposal tomorrow:

"If John McCain were looking for a way to prove he's running for George Bush's third term, he couldn't do better than this. Maybe we should start calling him 'Exxon John.'

"More drilling is not the answer to our energy crisis. Fortunately, Barack Obama is focusing on real solutions that are good for the planet and will ease pain at the pump. Obama is talking about fuel-efficient cars, expanded passenger rail, mass transit, and other clean ways of reducing demand for oil that can lighten the burden on Americans' pocketbooks immediately. That's the type of leadership we need."

Friends of the Earth Action endorsed Obama in May after he rejected a gas-tax holiday gimmick proposed by McCain. The group has also opposed McCain's efforts to award massive amounts of pork to the nuclear industry, and aired national network TV ads encouraging McCain to abandon this position before Earth Day. Those ads can be viewed at: http://www.foeaction.org/McCain/

Friends of the Earth Action (www.foeaction.org) provides extra muscle to our sister organization, Friends of the Earth, in legislative battles affecting our environment. FoE Action and our affiliated PAC also serve as Friends of the Earth's political arm, making thoughtful political endorsements, providing direct support to candidates, and placing environmentalists in the field on critical campaigns. Friends of the Earth Action's mission is to promote a clean, healthy and just world and to ensure that we have lawmakers who will work to protect the environment.

Politico: “Hillary Clinton to Barack Obama: Let's hug it out”

By Maggie Haberman

August 12, 2014, 2:56 p.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton called President Barack Obama on Tuesday to “make sure he knows that nothing she said was an attempt to attack him” when she recently discussed her views on foreign policy in an interview with The Atlantic, according to a statement from a Clinton spokesman.

The statement comes amid tension between the Clinton and Obama camps in the wake of the interview. It also comes as Obama and Clinton, his former secretary of state, are due to cross paths at a social gathering Wednesday night in Martha’s Vineyard.

In the interview, Clinton dismissed the Obama administration’s self-described foreign policy principle of “Don’t do stupid stuff.” And while she also praised Obama several times, Clinton nonetheless called his decision not to assist Syrian rebels early on a “failure.”

Earlier Tuesday, longtime top Obama aide David Axelrod took a swipe at Clinton on Twitter, writing: “Just to clarify: ‘Don’t do stupid stuff’ means stuff like occupying Iraq in the first place, which was a tragically bad decision.”

The statement from Clinton spokesman Nick Merrill noted that although Obama and Clinton have had disagreements, she has discussed these differences publicly before, including in her memoir, “Hard Choices.”

“Secretary Clinton was proud to serve with President Obama, she was proud to be his partner in the project of restoring American leadership and advancing America’s interests and values in a fast changing world,” said the statement, shared with POLITICO. “She continues to share his deep commitment to a smart and principled foreign policy that uses all the tools at our disposal to achieve our goals. Earlier today, the secretary called President Obama to make sure he knows that nothing she said was an attempt to attack him, his policies, or his leadership.

It continued: “Secretary Clinton has at every step of the way touted the significant achievements of his presidency, which she is honored to have been part of as his secretary of state. While they’ve had honest differences on some issues, including aspects of the wicked challenge Syria presents, she has explained those differences in her book and at many points since then. Some are now choosing to hype those differences but they do not eclipse their broad agreement on most issues. Like any two friends who have to deal with the public eye, she looks forward to hugging it out when ... they see each other tomorrow night.”

Clinton has always been more of a hawk than Obama; her vote in favor of authorizing the use of force in Iraq haunted her on in the Democratic primary against Obama when they were running for president in 2008, and she only recently, in her book, has said she was wrong to vote that way.

Now pondering a 2016 White House run, she spoke at length on a variety of foreign policy issues with The Atlantic's Jeffrey Goldberg, a preeminent establishment foreign policy writer who frequently writes about Israel.

She talked extensively about the situation in Gaza, aligning herself tightly with Israel, and spoke in tough tones about Iran's nuclear program. When asked about Syria's civil war, she reiterated her past position that the U.S. should have assisted the Syrian rebels sooner, the efficacy of which Obama has rejected as a "fantasy." And as far as the "Don't do stupid stuff" mantra, she said it was not "an organizing principle" — something that "great nations" need.

Despite her pains to praise Obama in the interview — and the fact that her positions on the issues were already publicly known — her comments were widely interpreted through a political prism that casts her as a calculating figure, and that therefore this must have been part of an intentional calibration away from the increasingly unpopular Obama.

Several Clinton supporters have stressed that she is entitled to her own views, and that she is in a bind — either criticized as overly calculating if she stays silent or faulted for being candid about what she thinks.

One of the criticisms about her interview relates to its timing: It comes as Obama is attempting to get his arms around a number of overseas crises, from Ukraine to Gaza to Syria.

Associated Press: "Clinton and Obama to Party and Maybe Even Hug"

VINEYARD HAVEN, Mass. (AP) -- Hillary Rodham Clinton is making her presence felt on President Barack Obama's summer vacation - in more ways than one.

The potential 2016 presidential candidate happens to be holding a signing of her memoir from her time as Obama's secretary of state Wednesday on Martha's Vineyard, where her former boss is on a two-week getaway from Washington.

And while the commander in chief has been trying to balance leisure time while engaging in global crises, Clinton weighed in with a magazine interview that distanced herself from some of his handling of foreign policy.

Clinton called the president at his vacation home Tuesday to tell him she wasn't trying to attack him. And her spokesman says she plans on "hugging it out" with Obama when both are scheduled to attend an island party Wednesday night for Ann Jordan, wife of Democratic adviser Vernon Jordan.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The White House initially said Obama didn't plan to see Clinton while she was on the island. But after Clinton's critical interview was published, the White House said Obama decided to go to the party.

Clinton, who carried out Obama's diplomacy in his first term, described a different approach she would take in places like Syria and the Mideast and rebuked Obama's cautious approach to global crises.

"Great nations need organizing principles, and `don't do stupid stuff' is not an organizing principle," she told The Atlantic, referring to a version of the phrase Obama and his advisers have used privately to describe his approach to foreign policy.

Clinton spokesman Nick Merrill said Clinton has frequently touted Obama's achievements and was honored to be part of his team, despite some differences.

"Some are now choosing to hype those differences but they do not eclipse their broad agreement on most issues," Merrill said in a written statement Tuesday. "Like any two friends who have to deal with the public eye, she looks forward to hugging it out when they see each other tomorrow night."

Clinton's signing of "Hard Choices" is scheduled at the Bunch of Grapes bookstore, an independent shop that Obama often visits to pick up some vacation reading.

CNN: "'Hugging it out': Hillary Clinton calls Obama to calm tensions"

By Dan Merica

August 12, 2014, 4:37 p.m. EDT

Washington (CNN) – Hillary Clinton reached out to President Barack Obama on Tuesday to tell him that headline-grabbing comments she made about his foreign policy were not meant as a political attack.

The potential presidential candidate called Obama to "make sure he knows that nothing she said was an attempt to attack him, his policies, or his leadership," Nick Merrill, a spokesman for the former secretary of state, said.

In an interview with the Atlantic published Sunday, Clinton dramatically distanced herself from Obama's approach to foreign policy.

In it, she trashed his self-coined mantra for a cautious foreign policy: "Don't do stupid stuff."

"Great nations need organizing principles, and 'Don't do stupid stuff' is not an organizing principle," Clinton said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

She later labeled Obama's decision not to arm Syrian rebels, something she disagreed with, a "failure."

According Merrill, though, Clinton "was proud to serve" with Obama.

"While they've had honest differences on some issues, including aspects of the wicked challenge Syria presents, she has explained those differences in her book and at many points since then," Merrill said. "Some are now choosing to hype those differences but they do not eclipse their broad agreement on most issues."

David Axelrod, Obama's former top adviser who now acts as his biggest defender outside the White House, rebuffed Clinton with a tweet that knocked her for her 2002 vote to authorize the Iraq War.

Clinton said in the interview that "don't do stupid stuff" did not really reflect Obama's big-picture thinking.

"I think that that's a political message. It's not his worldview," Clinton said. "I've sat in too many rooms with the President. He's thoughtful, he's incredibly smart, and able to analyze a lot of different factors that are all moving at the same time. I think he is cautious because he knows what he inherited."

Clinton's comments put into sharper focus an effort to put more space between herself and Obama, something she's been doing slowly in speeches and interviews since releasing her book, "Hard Choices," in June.

Obama's poll numbers are slipping and Clinton, who is widely considered the frontrunner for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2016, needs to separate herself from the negative numbers.

In her book, Clinton outlines how she and Obama disagreed on arming Syrian rebels. And during the book's promotional tour, she has drawn small divisions with him over second-term leadership and partnering with Iran to combat extremism in Iraq.

But the reaction to Clinton's comments, which inflamed the left, show how careful she has to be when trying to separate herself from her fellow Democrat while he's still in office. It's a task made even more complex by the fact that she served as America's top diplomat under him for four years.

MoveOn.org, a liberal advocacy and organizing group, also warned Clinton about taking too hawkish a tone, something it accused her of doing when she ran for president in 2008.

Clinton's call to Obama care a day before they were expected to attend the same party at the Martha's Vineyard home of Vernon Jordan, a former close adviser and golfing buddy of her husband.

"Like any two friends who have to deal with the public eye, she looks forward to hugging it out when they see each other tomorrow night," Merrill said.

A White House official declined to comment, saying they will leave it to Clinton's aides to handle this for now.

Wall Street Journal blog: Washington Wire: "Hillary Clinton to 'Hug It Out' With Obama Amid Foreign-Policy Flap"

By Beth Reinhard

August 12, 2014, 3:44 p.m. EDT

Q: What can generate nearly as much buzz as a quote from former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton taking a swipe at President Obama's foreign-policy record?

A: A tweet from a former adviser to Mr. Obama, David Axelrod, appearing to take a swipe at Mrs. Clinton's foreign-policy record.

The back and forth represented one of the early cracks in the relationship between an unpopular president and a former Cabinet member positioning herself for a likely campaign to succeed him.

On Tuesday, Mrs. Clinton called President Obama "to make sure he knows that nothing she said was an attempt to attack him, his policies, or his leadership," according to a spokesman, Nick Merrill.

"Secretary Clinton has at every step of the way touted the significant achievements of his presidency, which she is honored to have been part of as his Secretary of State," Mr. Merrill added in a written statement. "While they've had honest differences on some issues, including aspects of the wicked challenge Syria presents, she has explained those differences in her book and at many points since then. Some are now choosing to hype those differences but they do not eclipse their broad agreement on most issues. "

Mrs. Clinton "looks forward to hugging it out when they see each other tomorrow night," he said, "like any two friends who have to deal with the public eye."

Mr. Obama and and Mrs. Clinton are expected to cross paths Wednesday at a party at the home of Vernon Jordan, who served as an adviser to former President Bill Clinton.

The dustup started Sunday with an interview in which Mrs. Clinton suggested Mr. Obama should have intervened earlier to prevent the violent takeover of parts of Iraq and Syria by Islamic militants. "The failure to help build up a credible fighting force of the people who were the originators of the protests against Assad—there were Islamists, there were secularists, there was everything in the middle—the failure to do that left a big vacuum, which the jihadists have now filled," Mrs. Clinton said in an interview with the Atlantic magazine.

Mrs. Clinton was also asked about Mr. Obama's foreign policy mantra, "Don't do stupid s___." She replied: "Great nations need organizing principles, and 'Don't do stupid stuff' is not an organizing principle."

Her comments didn't sit well with close allies of Mr. Obama, including Mr. Axelrod. He posted Tuesday on Twitter: "Just to clarify: 'Don't do stupid stuff' means stuff like occupying Iraq in the first place, which was a tragically bad decision."

The remark was a sharp reminder of Mrs. Clinton's 2002 vote as a U.S. senator in favor of the war in Iraq, a stance that cost her during the 2008 primary against Mr. Obama. More broadly, Mr. Axelrod's online grenade toss served as a warning shot to Mrs. Clinton as she promotes her new memoir and weighs a presidential bid.

"If the purpose of her book was to embrace and own a piece of the president's foreign policy, to go out in her book tour and draw a strong line of demarcation was a bit bizarre," said one top campaign adviser to Mr. Obama. "It's not clear if this was an interview gone wrong because it seems at odds with the book itself, which embraced most of the president's policy in lockstep. Her interview deserved a response, though a certain level of distancing during a presidential campaign from the predecessor is inevitable."

Mr. Axelrod didn't respond to requests for clarification about what he said on Twitter, leaving his 140-or-fewer-characters up for grabs for the opposition party to use to advance its own agenda. The chairman of the Republican National Committee, Reince Priebus, said on Twitter: "Looks like David Axelrod is on @hillaryclinton push-back duty/legacy protection patrol." Tim Miller, a spokesman for the America Rising super-PAC, added, "About time somebody brushed her back."

At a time when polls show approval of his foreign policy at a record low, Republicans are eager to yoke the frontrunner for the Democratic nomination in 2016 to the current administration. A "memo" to reporters covering Mrs. Clinton from the RNC on Tuesday stated, "According to the State Department website, state.gov , "The Secretary of State, appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate, is the President's chief foreign affairs adviser."

National Journal: "Hillary Clinton Looks Forward to 'Hugging It Out' With President Obama"

By Emma Roller

August 12, 2014

[Subtitle:] "Don't do stupid stuff" can pertain to PR blunders, too.

Over the weekend, The Atlantic published a wide-ranging interview between Jeffrey Goldberg and Hillary Clinton about U.S. foreign policy. The nugget that gained the most attention was when Clinton appeared to deride President Obama's foreign policy mantra, "Don't do stupid stuff."

"Great nations need organizing principles, and 'Don't do stupid stuff' is not an organizing principle," Clinton told Goldberg.

David Axelrod, a former White House senior adviser, snapped back at Clinton's comment on Tuesday. "Just to clarify: 'Don't do stupid stuff' means stuff like occupying Iraq in the first place, which was a tragically bad decision," Axelrod tweeted, in an allusion to Clinton's vote to authorize force in Iraq in 2002.

Now, the Clinton camp is fighting back against coverage that suggests she's trying to distance herself from the president she served under as secretary of State.

"Earlier today, the secretary called President Obama to make sure he knows that nothing she said was an attempt to attack him, his policies, or his leadership," a Clinton spokesman told Politico's Maggie Haberman. "Like any two friends who have to deal with the public eye, she looks forward to hugging it out when she they [sic] see each other tomorrow night."

The "frenemies" narrative between Obama and the Clintons is well-trodden territory. Most recently, Ed Klein has made hay of it with his salacious-yet-shoddily-sourced book, Blood Feud. But despite the Clinton camp's best efforts to "hug it out," we can look forward to a lot more of this narrative as speculation about her 2016 bid ramps up. A Clinton Burn Book may be in order.

Politico: "Obama and Clinton: The rivalry returns"

By Maggie Haberman and Carrie Budoff Brown

August 12, 2014, 11:18 p.m. EDT

A split between Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama was inevitable. Now that they've made peace, keeping it will be the challenge.

The Obama and Clinton camps tried to mend their differences Tuesday, but certain dynamics won't be as easy to overcome in the months ahead as Clinton mulls a White House bid: Some advisers around both politicians have a hard time letting bygones be bygones. The press is determined to continue to dissect the relationship. And Obama and Clinton have genuinely different interests and instincts on some big questions facing the country.

The tiff began when, in an interview with The Atlantic, Clinton dissed the president's foreign policy philosophy and called his early approach to Syria a "failure."

White House aides then groused anonymously to The New York Times that Clinton was far more muted on areas of disagreement when she was actually serving in Obama's Cabinet. And hours later, longtime Obama adviser David Axelrod escalated the situation, swiping at Clinton on Twitter for her Iraq war vote years ago.

By Tuesday afternoon, Clinton had called Obama as part of a very public attempt to kill the ugly headlines.

Obama aides and some Clinton allies downplayed the 72-hour episode with dismissive complaints about a voracious media that have been looking for fissures between the two camps since the 2008 Democratic primary, and both sides made it clear they wanted to move on.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“To me, this story is a classic August self-licking ice cream cone,” said Tommy Vietor, a former Obama aide who assisted Clinton with the rollout of her recent memoir, “Hard Choices.”

But the maneuvering nonetheless demonstrated how the Obama-Clinton alliance, long viewed as mutually beneficial, will be tested repeatedly.

Obama has a record and a legacy to solidify in the public’s mind before leaving the White House. The shot by Axelrod underscored that the president’s allies aren’t going to take the criticism without some kind of fight.

Clinton, who served as secretary of state under Obama, faces the challenge of having to separate herself from an unpopular president but not so much that she looks inauthentic or opportunistic. Obama may have middling job approval numbers, but he still maintains a deep reservoir of support among constituencies that Clinton won’t want to alienate.

And while Clinton wants to shed the long-held public view of her as overly cautious and poll-tested, being candid also comes with a price. At the same time, her comments to The Atlantic’s Jeffrey Goldberg underscore that Clinton has never been a natural politician, remains far more gaffe-prone than many believe and has a rail-thin political operation with no master strategist.

The relationship between Obama and Clinton is so sensitive that few Democrats wanted to touch the issue Tuesday, particularly after Axelrod’s tweet. Many White House aides and allies declined to comment or ignored requests to talk about it.

Longtime Clinton ally James Carville, normally a chatty political observer, dodged by cheerfully saying, “There’s a town in Texas called El Paso. And I’m gonna El Paso” on this one.

Others tried to downplay the episode.

Ben Rhodes, a White House deputy national security adviser, told CNN late Tuesday afternoon that the Obama-Clinton relationship is “very resilient.” “They have been through so much together,” Rhodes said. “They agree about far more than they disagree about.”

Vietor, meanwhile, dismissed the notion of a growing rift. “The president and Secretary Clinton are extremely close,” Vietor said in an email. “So are their staffs.”

Clinton has spent months creeping away around the margins from the president, while primarily highlighting the areas where they agree.

In “Hard Choices,” which she was promoting in the interview with Goldberg, Clinton devoted a chapter to the mess in Syria, a topic that was one of her key policy differences with Obama. Shortly before she left the State Department, she and then-CIA head David Petraeus advocated a plan to arm Syrian rebels fighting President Bashar Assad’s regime — a plan Obama nixed.

In the Goldberg interview, however, she used more pointed language than in the past, describing Obama’s decision against aiding the rebels as a “failure.” But her toughest words were about Obama’s overall approach on foreign policy, which some of the president’s advisers have described as “Don’t do stupid sh—,” or “Don’t do stupid stuff.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Great nations need organizing principles, and ‘Don’t do stupid stuff’ is not an organizing principle,” she said.

It was that remark that ricocheted in the hours after the interview was posted Saturday night, dominating news coverage by Monday morning.

Some Clinton allies were thrilled that she was so upfront. “I loved it,” emailed one Clinton supporter.

Another described it as a “a trial balloon for the authentic Hillary. And if the Democrats won’t accept that then fine — maybe she won’t run.”

Through it all, Clinton’s aides stayed mum when asked to clarify the comments, or to explain the backstory of the interview, saying only that it was part of her book tour and that Goldberg had been a long-planned target.

But Clinton’s decision to call Obama on Tuesday underscored that her comments in the interview were not a planned attack — though at no point did the statement mentioning her outreach to the president suggest she was backing away from the substance of her remarks.

Clinton allies also pointed out that she praised Obama throughout the interview, threading her more pointed critiques with defenses of his approach. But the rule of politics is that the negatives will always get more attention.

Even as some White House aides faulted the media for the coverage, Clinton aides were clearly well aware of the time bomb the interview represented — they warned the White House after it took place, and before it ran.

With 2016 looming, White House aides have acknowledged that there would need to be a high tolerance for delineating differences with the president.

They want the Democratic nominee to win, no matter who it is, and if that means creating distance, that’s fine. But they didn’t expect that to happen for a while because they assumed Clinton would want to show that she was part of a successful presidency, and undercutting Obama wouldn’t help.

Several sources described Obama aides as angered by Clinton’s critiques, particularly because they came as the president is grappling with a string of global crises, from Ukraine to Iraq to Gaza. “I don’t think [they] expected her to say it while he’s in the middle of trying to resolve it,” said one of the Clinton backers.

The low-grade grumbling blew into the open when Axelrod aired his grievance on Twitter. “Just to clarify: ‘Don’t do stupid stuff’ means stuff like occupying Iraq in the first place, which was a tragically bad decision,” read the tweet from Axelrod. The tweet was an apparent swipe at Clinton’s vote to authorize the use of force in Iraq back when she was a senator, a vote she has described as the wrong choice in her memoir.

Axelrod declined repeated requests to explain his tweet. Meanwhile, sources said that Clinton’s call to Obama on Tuesday was in the works before Axelrod took to Twitter.

If anything, the overall flap has illustrated Clinton's challenge in being viewed as authentic. The broad assumption among political elites was that, in making the comments to The Atlantic, Clinton, whose calculated approach to politics bedeviled her in 2008, was making a deliberate, quick pivot away from a president whose poll numbers are sinking.

But Clinton has never been a natural performer — her muscle memory for politics is weak, and throughout her campaigns, she's had a window of re-engaging before working out the kinks. What's more, she has a skeleton political staff right now and has had difficulty switching toward a discussion of domestic policies. Because her memoir is about her time at the State Department, her views on foreign policy have been getting more attention.

Considering the chaos in the Middle East now, including with the rise of the Islamic State terrorist group in Iraq, Clinton appeared to be having a moment of vindication for her more hawkish views, which some derided as too bellicose in her 2008 primary against Obama. And many of her supporters forcefully noted that she was merely articulating long-held, and publicly known, differences of opinion with Obama.

The publicity over the tensions between the two camps seemed headed for overdrive in the lead-up to a cocktail party Wednesday night in Martha's Vineyard that both Obama and Clinton are expected to attend. The president is vacationing on the Massachusetts summer retreat, and Clinton will be signing books at a local store. Both are friendly with Vernon Jordan, the host and Democratic Party fixture.

In the statement revealing that Clinton had reached out to the president to assure him her comments to Goldberg were not meant as an "attack," her spokesman emphasized how well Clinton regards Obama.

"Like any two friends who have to deal with the public eye," spokesman Nick Merrill said, "she looks forward to hugging it out when she they see each other tomorrow night."

But while the call to the president may have effectively de-escalated this particular confrontation, it's not likely to be the last.

MSNBC: "Hillary Clinton promises to 'hug it out' with Obama"

[No Writer Mentioned]

As Hillary Clinton works to repair relations with President Obama following an interview in which she criticized his foreign policy, the progressive anti-war left that helped sink her 2008 presidential ambitions are threatening a return to barricades.

The interview with The Atlantic magazine sparked tensions between the otherwise friendly Obama and Clinton camps, which spilled into public Tuesday morning when Obama confidante David Axelrod took a thinly veiled shot at Clinton on Twitter. Both sides have worked hard since Clinton's loss in the 2008 Democratic presidential primary to present the politicians as close allies and like-minded policy thinkers.

Clinton's team moved to try to smooth things over Tuesday, even after saying previously they would not comment on the fracas. The president and potential future 2016 candidate will both be on Martha's Vineyard this week, where "she looks forward to hugging it out" with Obama Wednesday, according to a statement from a Clinton spokesperson first reported by Politico. Clinton called Obama Tuesday to "make sure he knows that nothing she said was an attempt to attack him, his policies, or his leadership," spokesperson Nick Merrill added.

But progressives, which have been quietly eyeing Clinton's re-emergence onto the political stage, may not be as quick to make up. After a long period of relative detente between the left and Clinton, the honeymoon appears to be over as numerous groups opened fire on Clinton. The response was slow in coming, with conversations happening behind the scenes Monday before gaining traction Tuesday afternoon.

Democracy for America, the grassroots organizing group founded by former presidential candidate Howard Dean, told msnbc in a statement that Clinton needs to decide which side of the party she represents, both on foreign policy and economic issues.

"The entire progressive movement is trying to figure out how Hillary Clinton has changed from the last election," said Neil Sroka, the group's communications director. "If she hasn't changed her stance on the foreign policy issues which she was disastrously wrong on in 2008, how are we to believe she's evolved on the issue that will define the 2016 election, income inequality?"

Obama's victory over Clinton in 2008 is widely credited to his vote against the Iraq War.

Stephen Miles of the Win Without War coalition told msnbc that Clinton's comments "confirmed suspicions" long held by the left. "It's not a surprise that once again we're finding out that she's more hawkish than the base of the party is. And it's going to give people a lot of deja vu and a lot of angst remembering some of the uncomfortable feelings they had back then," he said.

Miles added that the constant in Clinton's international posture is that it reflects the foreign policy consensus in Washington, but is "disconnected with the worldview of people outside the Beltway."

Meanwhile, MoveOn.org, which was founded to defend the Clintons in the late 1990s and then became a key figure opposing the Iraq War in the Bush era, fired a shot over Clinton's bow in a statement Tuesday. She needs to "think long and hard before embracing the same policies advocated by right-wing war hawks that got America into Iraq," said Ilya Sheyman, the executive director of the group's political arm.

Murshed Zaheed, the deputy political director of the liberal grassroots group CREDO Action and a former staffer to Harry Reid said on Twitter that "Hillary Clinton's Republican-lite neocon comments on foreign policy already making me nostalgic re. Obama presidency." On the social media site, it's easy to find rank-and-file liberals dismissing Clinton as a dreaded "neoconservative."

Gerry Condon, the vice president of the board of Veterans for Peace told msnbc that "as veterans who have experienced the horror and futility of war, we are quite concerned that Hillary Clinton seems to be promising an ever more aggressive foreign policy."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Indeed, Robert Kagan, the veteran Washington scholar of interventionist foreign policy, approved of Clinton's foreign policy in a recent interview.' "It's something that might have been called neocon, but clearly her supporters are not going to call it that; they are going to call it something else" he told The New York Times.

Polls show liberal Democrats overwhelming support Clinton. And as she considers a presidential bid, the standard line from progressive activists is that they would be happy to support her as long as she comes down the right way on a few key issues. So they've been mostly happy give her a pass when they could have attacked, such as when she skipped Netroots Nation in July, to wait and see what she does.

The question is whether this week is an aberration or marks the beginning of more open conflict from the left, and if she will offer the progressive base anything like hug she plans to give Obama.

Wall Street Journal blog: Washington Wire: "Vernon Jordan to Host Obama-Clinton Rendezvous Wednesday"

By Colleen McCain Nelson

August 12, 2014, 6:04 p.m. EDT

VINEYARD HAVEN, Mass. — Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton's critique of President Barack Obama's foreign policy had many speculating that the two Democrats might want to keep their distance. But a scheduling quirk will bring them face to face Wednesday evening.

The president and Mrs. Clinton will cross paths on Martha's Vineyard, where both plan to attend a party at the home of Vernon Jordan, who served as an adviser to former President Bill Clinton.

Mr. Obama is vacationing on the well-heeled island off the coast of Cape Cod, and his former secretary of state plans to do a book signing here before Wednesday night's social engagement.

The encounter comes just days after Mrs. Clinton suggested in an interview with the Atlantic magazine that the Obama administration contributed to the rise of militants such as the Islamic State by declining to do more to aid Syrian rebels as the uprising took hold. Mrs. Clinton also jabbed at the phrase the administration has used to describe its approach to foreign policy, saying, that "great nations need organizing principles, and 'Don't do stupid stuff' isn't an organizing principle."

Her pointed remarks seemed to portend potentially awkward cocktail-party conversation. But on Tuesday, both camps released statements predicting a pleasant evening.

"The president and first lady are very much looking forward to the occasion and seeing former Secretary Clinton," a White House official said.

Nick Merrill, a spokesman, for Mrs. Clinton confirmed Tuesday in a statement that the former secretary of state had called the president to underscore that nothing she said was an attempt to attack him, his policies or his leadership. He said that Mr. Obama and Mrs. Clinton have disagreed on some topics such as Syria but that those differences don't eclipse their broad agreement on most issues.

"Like any two friends who have to deal with the public eye, she looks forward to hugging it out when she they see each other tomorrow night," Mr. Merrill said.

The Atlantic: "Two Ways of Looking at the Hillary Clinton Interview"

By James Fallows

August 12, 2014, 5:46 p.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] Whichever way you look, the presumptive Democrat nominee has shown us something significant.

On return from a long spell away from the Internet, I was going to recommend that you read Jeffrey Goldberg's interview with Hillary Clinton, and not just the setup but the transcript as a whole. But such a recommendation is hardly necessary, since for several days the interview has been making news worldwide.

There are two ways to think about the political and policy implications of Hillary Clinton's deciding to say what she did, during this strange limbo period when she is clearly preparing to run for president but has more to lose than gain by officially saying so.

• One approach would be to think that we're primarily witnessing a media event—journalists doing what journalists do. It's in our nature as reporters, even when representing an institution as august as a 157-year-old magazine, to highlight what has changed rather than what's constant, what is controversial rather than what's agreed on, the one juicy, taken-in-isolation sentence that will make people stop and say, Did you see that? And it is in nature of the political commentariat to seize on any sign of rancor or big-shot melodrama.

Therefore if our Atlantic site runs a headline suggesting that Hillary Clinton is all but blaming Barack Obama for the ISIS/ISIL menace ("Hillary Clinton: 'Failure' to Help Syrian Rebels Led to the Rise of ISIS"), or if we emphasize the few places where she departed from his policy rather than the many more where she supported it, maybe we're just revealing the way we journalists think. When politicians start complaining that some comment was "taken out of context," this is the point they're trying to make. And in fairness, anyone who reads the whole transcript will find that the tabloid version of her comments—weakling Obama lost Syria!—is cushioned in qualifiers and complexities.

If this is the way the Clinton camp feels about our presentation of the interview, they are perfectly well versed in all the the formal and informal ways of getting that message across. Indeed, just this afternoon, a little while after I started typing this item (but several days after the interview ran), the first such indication appeared, in a "no criticism intended" story via Politico.

• The other approach is to think that Hillary Clinton, as experienced a figure as we now have on the national scene, knew exactly what she was saying, and conveyed to an interviewer as experienced as Goldberg exactly the impression she intended to—including letting the impression sink in through several days' worth of op-ed and talk-show news cycles before beginning to offset it with an "out of context" claim.

That impression is a faux-respectful but pointed dismissal of Obama's achievements and underlying thought-patterns. It's a picture of the president approximating that of a Maureen Dowd column. It also introduces into Democratic party discourse the “Who (re)-lost Iraq?” “Who lost Syria?” “Who lost Iran?” and “Who is losing the world?” queries that the Republicans are perpetually ready to serve up. All this is presumably in preparation for Sec. Clinton's distancing herself from a "weak" Obama when she starts running in earnest to succeed him.

If the former interpretation is right, Hillary Clinton is rustier at dealing with the press than we assumed. Rustier in taking care with what she says, rustier in taking several days before countering a (presumably) undesired interpretation.

I hope she's just rusty. Because if she intended this, my heart sinks.

It sinks for her, that she thought this would make her sound tough or wise; it sinks for the Democratic party, that this is the future foreign policy choice it’s getting; and it sinks for the country, if this is the way we’re going to be talked-to about our options in dealings with the world.

The easiest and least useful stance when it comes to foreign policy is: Situation X is terrible, we have to do something. Or its cousin: Situation X is terrible, you should have done something. Pointing out terribleness around the world is not even half of the necessary thought-work in foreign policy. The harder and more important part—what constitutes actual statesmanship—is considering exactly which “something” you would do; and why that exact something would make conditions better rather than worse; and what Pandora’s box you might be opening; and how the results of your something will look a year from now, or a decade, when the terribleness of this moment has passed.

Eg: Yeah, we should have “done something” in Syria to prevent the rise of ISIS. But the U.S. did a hell of a lot of somethings in Iraq over the past decade, with a lot more leverage that it could possibly have had in Syria. And the result of the somethings in Iraq was … ? A long story in the NYT tells us that the current leader of ISIS, Abu Bakr al-Baghdadi, the caliph himself, drew his political formation from America’s own efforts to “do something” in Iraq:

“He was a street thug when we picked him up in 2004,” said a Pentagon official who spoke on the condition of anonymity to discuss intelligence matters. “It’s hard to imagine we could have had a crystal ball then that would tell us he’d become head of ISIS.”

At every turn, Mr. Baghdadi’s rise has been shaped by the United States’ involvement in Iraq — most of the political changes that fueled his fight, or led to his promotion, were born directly from some American action. And now he has forced a new chapter of that intervention, after ISIS’ military successes and brutal massacres of minorities in its advance prompted President Obama to order airstrikes in Iraq.

Of course everyone including Hillary Clinton “knows” that you should only do something when it’s smart and not when it’s stupid. In her books and speeches, she is most impressive when showing commanding knowledge of the complexities and contradictions of negotiating with the Russians and Chinese, and why you can’t just “be tough” in dealings with them. In those specifics, she can sound like the description I just came across, in Christopher Clark’s The Sleepwalkers, about some pre-World War I Balkan leaders: “It is a characteristic of the most skillful politicians that they are capable of reasoning simultaneously at different levels of conditionality. [One Serbian figure] wanted peace, but he also believed — he never concealed it — that the final historical phase of Serbian expansion would in all probability not be achieved without war.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But in this interview — assuming it's not "out of context" — she is often making the broad, lazy "do something" points and avoiding the harder ones. She appears to disdain the president for exactly the kind of slogan—"don't do stupid shit"—that her husband would have been proud of for its apparent simplicity but potential breadth and depth. (Remember "It's the economy, stupid"?) Meanwhile she offers her own radically simplified view of the Middle East—Netanyahu right, others wrong—that is at odds with what she did in the State Department and what she would likely have to do in the White House. David Brooks was heartened by this possible preview of a Hillary Clinton administration's policy. I agree with Kevin Drum and John Cassidy, who were not. Also see Paul Waldman.

But really, go read the interview. Either way, the presumptive nominee has under Jeffrey Goldberg's questioning shown us something significant.

Politico: "Cocktail chatter with Barack and Hillary"

By Katie Glueck and Nicholas P. Fandos

August 13, 2014, 5:00 a.m. EDT

Ann Dibble Jordan's birthday party just got a lot more interesting.

Two of the guests — President Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton — have hardly been seeing eye-to-eye on foreign policy of late. So the big question is whether they can employ their expert political skills to diminish any awkward moments. In fact, Clinton's team says the two will be "hugging it out" Wednesday evening.

In that huggable spirit, here are some subjects that might be safe for Obama and his former presidential rival and secretary of state:

"Hey, we've been through worse, right?"

In any event, at least they aren't meeting as challengers, as they did during the 2008 presidential primary — or worse, as the vanquisher versus the vanquished.

While on tour to promote her memoir of her time at the State Department, "Hard Choices," Clinton has laughingly described a meeting with Obama after she dropped out of the contest in 2008 as akin to "an awkward first date." Now, they know each other well after serving together for Obama's first term. The president has even said that he and Clinton are now "buddies."

Sure, the meeting comes just days after Clinton dinged elements of Obama's foreign policy in an interview with The Atlantic's Jeffrey Goldberg, complete with dissing as a "failure" the early decision not to assist some Syrian rebels. And yes, her comments were seen by some as an attempt to create space from an unpopular White House. But she's already called Obama to assure him that her remarks weren't meant as an attack.

“[T]hey’re friends and human beings first,” said Tommy Vietor, formerly a veteran aide to Obama who also worked on Clinton’s book tour.

“There’s less than meets the eye,” said former Sen. Bob Kerrey (D-Neb.). “This is not going to be a difficult meeting between the two of them.”

With the benefit of hindsight, maybe they’ll be able to laugh it off.

“Ready to be a grandma?”

Clinton’s daughter, Chelsea, is pregnant — and Clinton has said repeatedly that she wants to try out being a grandmother before making any decisions regarding 2016. Luckily, Obama loves babies.

“One of the best perks about being president is almost anyone will hand you their baby,” Obama said earlier this summer as he reminisced about taking care of his own daughters. “… I get this baby fix, like, two or three times a week.”

And if Clinton needs a break from the president, plenty of other attendees will want to talk grandkids.

“I would not be surprised at all if she spent time talking to grandmothers about what it’s like to be a grandmother,” said William Galston, a former aide to President Bill Clinton.

“Stanford or Berkeley?”

Chelsea Clinton grew up in the White House and attended the prestigious Sidwell Friends School, just as Obama daughters Sasha and Malia do now, so that always offers a conversation out. Reports indicate that Malia also toured Stanford — Chelsea’s alma mater — and Berkeley, but according to a report in the San Francisco Chronicle, preferred the latter.

If that’s the case, a West Coast-centered, good-natured rivalry could take the focus off the appearance of policy differences.

“How’s John?”

Clinton’s interview in The Atlantic included a hefty section on Israel, one area in which she was perceived as using more hawkish language than her successor at Foggy Bottom, John Kerry. The interview also posted amid a slew of international crises embroiling places from Iraq to Gaza to Ukraine.

Amid all that, she could check in on how the current secretary of state is holding up, although some observers expressed doubt that the pair would wade into a big foreign-policy discussion. Vietor passed along a semi-serious list of nine hypothetical discussion topics, from the kids and spouses, to “beloved pets” and “hilarious movies,” with foreign policy and politics clocking in last.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And Galston said he would be “astounded if it became anything like a foreign policy seminar, let alone an argument.”

“And Joe?”

Vice President Joe Biden has not ruled out a presidential bid of his own, and Obama has been careful to toe a fine line in discussing both Biden and Clinton — the former secretary of state could use the party as a time to gauge whether Obama is still maintaining that balancing act.

“I don’t know what she’s going to decide to do, but I know that if she were to run for president, I think she would be very effective at that,” Obama said in a television interview in May. “I’ve been blessed to have some people around me like her, and Vice President Biden, and my chief of staff who are just great, hardworking, effective people, and I love them to death.”

“Know any good Realtors?”

The Clintons live in Chappaqua, N.Y., not far from New York City, from which they run their family foundation. Obama has indicated interest in both a similar kind of foundation and in moving to the Big Apple, once his presidency wraps up.

Both the Clintons and the Obamas could be spending some time in Brooklyn in 2016 — some prominent Democrats are making a big push for the borough to host the Democratic National Convention.

“Great party Vernon’s throwing”

The main event at the Farm Neck Golf Club is the 80th birthday party of Ann Dibble Jordan, who, along with her husband, former Bill Clinton adviser Vernon Jordan, is considered a friend of both Obama and Clinton.

“They will talk about Vernon and Ann, who are mutual friends,” said longtime Democratic strategist Bob Shrum. “I don’t think there will be heavy political conversation at all.”

“Come here often?”

Obama is on vacation on Martha’s Vineyard, while Clinton and her husband are out in the Hamptons — though the Clintons have also spent summers on the Vineyard.

“They are both frequent visitors to the island, so I imagine they would have a lot to talk about, comparing places, as islanders usually do,” said Molly Coogan, store manager of Bunch of Grapes bookstore, where Clinton is slated to do a book signing on Wednesday, ahead of the birthday party.

“How about that weather?”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Maybe the president will look at Hillary Clinton and say, ‘Nice weather we’re having, huh?’” Shrum said. “That’s what you talk about when you don’t want to talk about other stuff.”

Wednesday’s forecast doesn’t look so good. Showers, with thunderstorms possible after 2 p.m., according to the National Weather Service on Tuesday. Wind gusts possible up to 33 mph. “Chance of precipitation is 100 percent.”

Mother Jones blog: Kevin Drum: “How is Robin Williams Like Hillary Clinton?”

By Kevin Drum

August 13, 2014, 12:39 a.m. EDT

Tonight's Maureen Dowd column begins with an anecdote about an interview she once did with Robin Williams:

“As our interview ended, I was telling him about my friend Michael Kelly’s idea for a 1-900 number, not one to call Asian beauties or Swedish babes, but where you’d have an amorous chat with a repressed Irish woman. Williams delightedly riffed on the caricature, playing the role of an older Irish woman answering the sex line in a brusque brogue, ordering a horny caller to go to the devil with his impure thoughts and disgusting desire.

“I couldn’t wait to play the tape for Kelly, who doubled over in laughter.

“So when I think of Williams, I think of Kelly. And when I think of Kelly, I think of Hillary, because Michael was the first American reporter to die in the Iraq invasion, and Hillary Clinton was one of the 29 Democratic senators who voted to authorize that baloney war.”

That's, um, quite a segue. I wonder if there's anything left in the world that doesn't remind Dowd of Hillary Clinton?

New Yorker: “The Hillary Doctrine: ‘Smart Power’ or ‘Back to the Crusades’?”

By John Cassidy

August 11, 2014

This past weekend, Tom Friedman, of the Times, sat down with President Obama, and Jeffrey Goldberg, of the Atlantic, posted online a long interview with Hillary Clinton. With the grim events in Iraq, Gaza, and Ukraine dominating the news, it's fascinating to compare and contrast what the two former colleagues (and 2008 election rivals) had to say.

Goldberg, in a post introducing the interview, highlighted Clinton's claim that the Obama Administration's "failure" to build up a credible opposition in Syria created a vacuum that was filled by Islamic State in Iraq and al-Sham (ISIS), the Al Qaeda offshoot that U.S. warplanes are now bombing in northern Iraq. Other stories focussed on Clinton's apparent dismissal of a phrase Obama has reportedly used to describe his approach to foreign policy: "Don't do stupid stuff." A Bloomberg headline blared, "HILLARY CLINTON FAULTS OBAMA FOR 'STUPID STUFF' POLICY." Politico's Maggie Haberman wrote, "Hillary Clinton has taken her furthest, most public step away yet from President Barack Obama, rejecting the core of his self-described foreign policy doctrine."

By Monday, speculation had turned to Clinton's motives. Does this mean that she's definitely running? (That was Goldberg's interpretation.) Was it a cynical effort to distance herself from an unpopular President? Is she already looking beyond the Democratic primaries to appeal to independents and to moderate Republicans?

For folks inside the Washington politics-and-media bubble, these are endlessly fascinating questions. But what really stands from the interviews is the strident tone that Clinton adopted in her comments on Gaza and radical Islam. In defending the Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's deadly response to Hamas's rocket attacks, she sounded almost like a spokesperson for the American Israel Public Affairs Committee. In talking about the threat of militant Islam more generally, her words echoed those of Tony Blair, the former British Prime Minister, who has called for a generation-long campaign against Islamic extremism—a proposal that one of his former cabinet ministers dubbed "back to the Crusades."

Let's take Gaza first. When Clinton noted that Israel has a right to defend itself from Hamas attacks, Clinton was merely restating what President Obama has said numerous times. But, when she passed on the opportunity to condemn the Israeli strikes on U.N.-operated shelters, which killed dozens of people, she was conspicuously failing to follow the example of her former colleagues in the State Department, who described one of the attacks as "disgraceful." Clinton did acknowledge that the deaths of hundreds of children in the four-week-long military campaign was "absolutely dreadful." But, rather than put even a bit of the blame on the Israel Defense Forces for its aggressive tactics, she pointed the finger at Hamas, saying, "There's no doubt in my mind that Hamas initiated this conflict and wanted to do so in order to leverage its position…. So the ultimate responsibility has to rest on Hamas and the decisions it made."

Another area where Clinton entered the realm of AIPAC talking points was in accusing Hamas of "stage-managing" the conflict and criticizing the media for going along with it:

"What you see is largely what Hamas invites and permits Western journalists to report on from Gaza. It's the old PR problem that Israel has. Yes, there are substantive, deep levels of antagonism or anti-Semitism towards Israel, because it's a powerful state, a really effective military. And Hamas paints itself as the defender of the rights of the Palestinians to have their own state. So the PR battle is one that is historically tilted against Israel."

These statements will have delighted Benjamin Netanyahu, the Prime Minister of Israel, whom Clinton defended several times in the interview. She even endorsed Netanyahu's recent suggestion that Israel would never give up security control of the West Bank, a statement that some analysts have seized upon as the death knell for the two-state solution. "If I were the prime minister of Israel, you're damn right I would expect to have control over security," Clinton said of the West Bank, citing the need to "protect Israel from the influx of Hamas or cross-border attacks from anywhere else."

Even for a former New York politician, these were contentious statements. But what is their ultimate import?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The cynical view is that Clinton is simply trying up shore up her reputation as a staunch ally of Israel. Earlier in Clinton's career, pro-Israeli groups accused her of getting too close to the Palestinian cause. In 1999, a picture of her kissing Suha Arafat on the cheek ended up on the front page of the New York Post, under the headline "SHAME ON HILLARY." After moving to New York in 2001 and running for senator, she adopted the default stance of most elected officials from the Empire State: unstinting support for Israel. As Secretary of State, in 2009-2010, she took part in efforts to restart the peace process, which, partly as a result of Israel continuing to expand its settlements, didn't go anywhere. Unlike President Obama, however, Clinton maintained a reasonably cordial relationship with Netanyahu, and that was reflected in her supportive remarks to Goldberg.

If Clinton is courting the pro-Israel lobby, it wouldn't be exactly surprising. With the Republican Party busy trying to make inroads among wealthy Jewish campaign donors, it hardly behooves her to adopt a more critical approach to the Arab-Israeli conflict shortly before announcing a run for President.

If you study Clinton's words, though, there seem to be more to them than pandering. For one, she clearly believes that the best way to exert pressure on Israeli politicians, such as Netanyahu, is to win their confidence. Implicit in her comments is the suggestion that President Obama, by not making much of an effort to hide his dislike of the Israeli Prime Minister, or to win over the Israeli public, made another error. Referring to the failed negotiations at the end of her husband's Presidency, the last occasion on which the Israelis and Palestinians came close to making peace, the former Secretary of State said, "Bill Clinton is adored in Israel, as you know. He got Netanyahu to give up territory, which Netanyahu believes lost him the prime ministership"—in his first term—"but he moved in that direction, as hard as it was." A bit later in the interview, Clinton emphasized the point: "Dealing with Bibi is not easy, so people get frustrated and they lose sight of what we're trying to achieve here."

In this instance, the difference between Clinton and Obama is a tactical one on how to achieve a goal that they share. There is a bigger issue, however, which rises to the level of foreign-policy ideology. Ever since taking office, Obama has conspicuously tried to avoid making generalizations about Islamic extremism, or lapsing into loose talk about a clash of civilizations. In his interview with Friedman, he described the turmoil in the Middle East in terms of history and economics rather than religion. "I do believe that what we're seeing in the Middle East and parts of North Africa is an order that dates back to World War I starting to buckle," the President said. More specifically, he pointed to the rise of a disaffected Sunni population, stretching from Baghdad to Damascus, that was politically alienated and economically isolated: "Unless we can give them a formula that speaks to the aspirations of that population, we are inevitably going to have problems."

Clinton, by contrast, placed the threat of radical Islam front and center, and she didn't shy away from describing it. "One of the reasons why I worry about what's happening in the Middle East right now is because of the breakout capacity of jihadist groups that can affect Europe, can affect the United States," she said. "Jihadist groups are governing territory. They will never stay there, though. They are driven to expand. Their raison d'être is to be against the West, against the Crusaders, against the fill-in-the-blank—and we all fit into one of these categories."

The key issue, Clinton went on, is how to contain the jihadi threat, and the appropriate analogy, in her view, is the long battle against Marxism-Leninism. "You know, we did a good job in containing the Soviet Union," she said. "We made a lot of mistakes, we supported really nasty guys, we did some things that we are not particularly proud of, from Latin America to Southeast Asia. But we did have a kind of overarching framework about what we were trying to do that did lead to the defeat of the Soviet Union and the collapse of Communism. That was our objective. We achieved it."

Rather than explicitly calling for a new Cold War focussed on radical Islam rather than on Communism, Clinton talked about exercising "smart power" and about engaging an American public that is now instinctively hostile toward foreign entanglements. But, reading the interview as a whole, that appears to be what she is advocating—a sustained global campaign targeting radical Islam (some, doubtless, will call it a "crusade") that encompasses all of the options at the disposal of the United States and its allies: military, diplomatic, economic, political, and rhetorical.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As I said, the similarity to Blair's recent call to arms is striking. If Clinton continues with this line of argument, she will inevitably be compared to Henry (Scoop) Jackson, the anti-Communist Democratic senator from the state of Washington who became a hero to the neocons. She will also be compared to modern-day Republican interventionists, such as John McCain. Judging by what she said to Goldberg, Clinton won't necessarily mind the comparisons: "Great nations need organizing principles," she said. "And 'Don't do stupid stuff' is not an organizing principle."

Bloomberg View: Jonathan Bernstein: "Hillary Clinton Wouldn't Have Stopped the Tea Party"

By Jonathan Bernstein

August 12, 2014, 5:19 p.m. EDT

My Bloomberg View colleague Megan McArdle floats a counterfactual history of the last few years: If Hillary Clinton had defeated Barack Obama, the Affordable Care Act would have died, with all sorts of positive consequences:

"I think that Hillary Clinton would have pulled back when Rahm Emanuel (or his counterfactual Clinton administration counterpart) told her that this was a political loser and she should drop it. … I doubt she would have had the debt ceiling debacle or the deep gridlock of the last four years, because it was Obamacare that elected a fresh new class of deeply ideological Republicans who thought they were having their own transformative political movement, and they were willing to do massive damage to their party, their own political fortunes and, in my opinion, to the country in order to take a stand against 'business as usual' -- business that included legislating or paying our bills."

I think this logic (Obamacare and thus Tea Party) is mostly wrong, for a number of reasons. First of all, the Tea Party preceded the ACA; the original Tea Party mobilization was a response to the economic stimulus package in spring 2009, a few months before health-care reform became the crucial issue (Steve M. has the timeline).

But more broadly, I think it's wrong because, as Kevin Drum described it awhile ago, the Tea Party response is pretty much what happens every time a liberal Democrat is elected, from Roosevelt to Kennedy to Clinton to Obama. Basically, the 2010 Republican landslide was a function of a depressed economy (which hurt Democrats) and a liberal Democratic president (which brought out a particular type of Republicans). There is some evidence that health-care reform in particular cost Democrats some seats, turning a landslide in the House into a debacle (although I still am very skeptical of that finding), but there's very little chance that avoiding health care would have produced dramatic change. It's worth noting, too, that quite a few House radicals (Louie Gohmert, Michele Bachmann, Steve King) were in place before 2010. A radical-infested Republican Party simply wasn't new in 2010.

As for the other half of McArdle's alternate history, I think it's highly unlikely that Clinton, who ran on health-care reform just as much as Obama did, would have abandoned the No. 1 long-term priority of the Democratic Party after an election in which Democrats won a huge landslide. The odds are strong that she would have rolled out almost exactly the same plan that Obama tried, and that the initial reaction would have been practically identical: strong support from mainstream liberals, cautious but real support from moderate Democrats, and blanket opposition from Republicans.

The thing is that once the train was moving, there never really was any good place for the president to get off. Yes, Obama's chief of staff apparently advised cutting a deal, but Obama never had anyone to deal with or a logical deal to cut. McArdle suggests that perhaps Clinton would have settled for only Medicaid expansion, but it's unlikely that she could have found Republican votes for it (given that it would have to have been bundled with a pay-for such as the actual ACA Medicare cuts or increased taxes which Republicans were eager to run against), and it would have been easy to exploit as "distribute the wealth" program that had nothing for middle class voters.

No, once the president and congressional Democrats moved to the ACA, the least-bad option was always to pass it as long as that was possible, and as it moved through Congress passage always seemed, and in fact was, possible. That was particularly the case after the Scott Brown's Massachusetts victory in January 2010. By then every Senate Democrat and most House Democrats had already voted for reform; at that point, as they eventually realized after the shock wore off, they already had taken the plunge, and retreat would leave them equally vulnerable without at least salvaging the enthusiasm of partisan Democrats. Is it certain that Clinton would have accepted that logic? I suppose not, but it sure seemed obvious to me at the time.

What's a lot harder to know is whether small changes around the margins might have made a difference. With Clinton in office instead of Obama, would Arlen Specter have defected? Would Clinton have made any difference in the pace of the bill through Congress? Would she have been able to prevent Brown's victory? My general feeling is that Obama performed better than par on Specter, right at par on the pace of the bill, and worse than par on replacing Ted Kennedy. Any of those, and presumably several other small things, might have either made passage somewhat easier or impossible, and perhaps presidential skills really did matter.

But on the big point? No, the 2010 election results and the post-2010 Republican Party were probably cooked in regardless of which president the Democrats nominated in 2008. As long as it wasn't John Edwards, at least.

The Weekly Standard: "Cheney: Not Sure Hillary Will Be Democratic Nominee"

By Daniel Halper

August 12, 2014, 7:29 p.m. EDT

Vice President Dick Cheney tells radio host Hugh Hewitt that Hillary Clinton might not be the Democratic presidential candidate in 2016.

"Can Hillary Clinton be beaten?" Hewitt asked the former vice president. "And if so, how?"

"Well, I think she can. I'm not at all pessimistic about our prospects there. I think she's got a lot of things she'll have to answer for, a lot of baggage. She's got to explain why serving as Barack Obama's Secretary of State, she shouldn't be held accountable for being the one who implemented those policies such as they are. I don't think it's a slam dunk for her by any means. I'm not even sure that it's guaranteed she'll get the Democratic nomination. I think there's a lot to answer for – Benghazi and many other points that I think will be arguments against her," Cheney responded, according to a transcript sent out by Hewitt's show.

HH: But she has always eluded tough questions. Will the D.C.-Beltway-Manhattan elite ever ask her the tough questions?

DC: I don't, boy, I wouldn't want to make a wild guess there. Obviously, she's been very successful politically, as has her husband, but I think her performance in the last few months hasn't been all that sterling. You know, the book tour got her in a fair amount of trouble. She hasn't been as smooth an item as one might expect. And you know, she's, I think there are a lot of wannabes over on the Democratic side who are holding back, because she's still sort of occupying the space as the expected preferred option, but I'm not at all sure that'll be sure two years from now.

Elsewhere in the interview, Cheney had this to say about Hillary:

HH: Is it credible for Hillary Clinton to be attacking Barack Obama, Mr. Cheney?

DC: I don't know. She's lived with Bill for a long time. Maybe some of that rubbed off, too. You know, I'm sure she's as interested in putting distance between herself and Obama as are an awful lot of the Democratic candidates running for office this year. You know, they don't want to be associated with the abject failure that he apparently is turning out to be.

U.S. News & World Report: "Perry: Clinton Close to Right on Syria"

By David Catanese

August 12, 2014, 4:07 p.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] He's with her on earlier intervention and its impact on Iraq.

DES MOINES, Iowa – Rick Perry agrees with Hillary Clinton.

Or at least, pretty close to it.

Asked Tuesday at the Iowa State Fair whether he agreed with the former secretary of state's assessment that a lack of prior U.S. intervention in Syria emboldened jihadists to penetrate Iraq, the GOP governor of Texas found some daylight with the potential future presidential rival.

"I think on that issue she was closer to being right than she has been on some other ones," he replied.

In an interview with The Atlantic published over the weekend, Clinton said the failure of the U.S. to assist the rebels in Syria "left a big vacuum, which the jihadists have now filled."

Perry, on the final day of a four-day Iowa swing, recalled that he supported a no-fly zone in Syria back in the fall of 2011, when he was running for president. He maintained Tuesday that would have been a step in the right direction.

“If you allow [the Islamic State group] to continue to gobble up and take over areas – in this case, Kurdistan, northern Iraq – it’s going to cost us more. Early intervention in these areas, from my perspective, would’ve been wiser for us, would’ve been less costly and it would’ve gone substantially farther to pacify that part of the world,” he said.

Perry stopped short of calling for boots on the ground to curb Islamic State aggression, without entirely ruling it out, either.

He told reporters he began his day with a briefing on the situation in Iraq from a team of national security advisers. Aides declined to name who the advisers were.

The Hill: “Benghazi hearing set for September”

By Mario Trujillo

August 12, 2014, 1:50 p.m. EDT

Rep. Trey Gowdy (R-S.C.) on Tuesday laughed off the idea that the House select committee investigating the events surrounding the 2012 Benghazi, Libya, attack would finish its work before the midterm elections.

"No. Heavens no," said Gowdy, who is chairman of the committee, in an interview with ABC News. "I have decided that I would rather be right than first. So we are going to do it methodically, professionally."

Gowdy said the committee would hold its first public hearing in September, after members return from the August recess.

It will touch on the State Department's Accountability Review Board recommendations, and how well they have been implemented in the wake of the attack that killed three Americans, including Ambassador Christopher Stevens.

Gowdy said there will be other public hearings, but the committee would do most of its work in private.

"I can get more information in a five-hour deposition than I can [in] five minutes of listening to a colleague asking questions in a committee hearing," he said.

He added: "My view of public hearings — if there is a factual discrepancy, then the jury or our fellow citizens need to hear both sides, and they can determine where the greater weight or credibility is. But if there is a consensus on a point, there really is not any reason to litigate that in public."

Democrats considered boycotting the process after the committee was created in May. They perceived it to be politically motivated to damage former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton and motivate their GOP base ahead of the elections.

However, the issue has fallen largely outside public view lately, as the committee works behind closed doors.

In June, a poll found only about two in 10 people were closely watching the committee.

"You want to get on the news, go rob a bank," Gowdy said.

FULL Remarks:

Before I take your questions, I want to begin by talking about the issue in this campaign that Americans worry the most about – the American economy.

All of us know what is happening to the economy. It is slowing. More than 400,000 people have lost their jobs since December, and the rate of new job creation has fallen sharply. Americans are worried about the security of their current job, and they're worried that they, their kids and their neighbors may not find good jobs and new opportunities in the future. To make matters worse, gas is over $4 a gallon and the price of oil has almost doubled in the last year. The cost of everything from energy to food is rising.

I have a plan to grow this economy, create more and better jobs, and get America moving again. I have a plan to reform government, achieve energy security, and ensure that healthcare is available and affordable for all. I believe the role of government is to unleash the creativity, ingenuity and hard work of the American people, and make it easier to create jobs.

At its core, the economy isn't the sum of an array of bewildering statistics. It's about where Americans work, how they live, how they pay their bills today and save for tomorrow. It's about small businesses opening their doors, hiring employees and growing. It's about giving workers the education and training to find a good job and prosper in it. It's about the aspirations of the American people to build a better life for their families; dreams that begin with a job.

There are many things the next president must do to get our economy running at full strength again, and to create the good jobs Americans need. But no economic challenge today is more urgent than strategic energy independence.

Our dangerous dependence on foreign oil has been thirty years in the making, and was caused by the failure of politicians in Washington to think long term about the future of the country. By 2030, America's demand for energy will rise by nearly twenty percent. Our jobs, our way of life, and our security depend on the next President beginning to solve this challenge.

Two weeks ago, I announced the Lexington Project. This project – named for a place where Americans asserted our independence once before – will secure our energy future, and it will create hundreds of thousands of new jobs for Americans.

We have billions of barrels of oil available to us in the United States, and vast reserves of natural gas as well. So we will begin by producing more of both, to send a message to the market and result in lower prices for oil and gas.

We will develop more clean energy. Nuclear power is the most dependable source of zero-emission energy we have. We will build at least 45 nuclear plants that will create over 700,000 good jobs to construct and operate them.

The development of clean coal technology will create jobs in some of America's most economically disadvantaged areas. Clean coal demonstration projects alone will employ over 30,000 Americans. Ohioans get 86 percent of all their electricity from coal. Your energy future and this economy require us to find and deploy a clean coal technology.

My proposal to help automakers design and sell new generations of cars that don't depend on gasoline will re-invigorate that struggling industry. In the development and manufacture of hybrid, flex-fuel, and electric cars, jobs will grow at auto plants, parts manufacturers, and in the communities that support them.

My plan to develop wind and solar power and renewable technologies will drive innovation and create high tech jobs. Ohio alone has more than 60 companies in the wind turbine supply chain, and wind and solar energy can become a research mission for the state's universities, and a new focus for Ohio's manufacturing base.

My opponent's answer to the Lexington Project is no; no to more drilling; no to more nuclear power; no to research prizes that help solve the problem of affordable electric cars. For a guy whose "official seal" carried the motto, "Yes, we can," Senator Obama's agenda sure has a whole lot of "No, we can't."

To achieve full economic recovery, we need to think as well about the leading job creators in America. Small businesses have created 233,000 jobs so far this year while other sectors are losing jobs. Small businesses are the job engine of America, and I will make it easier for them to grow and create more jobs. My opponent wants to make it harder by imposing a healthcare mandate on small business that will add a crushing $12,000 to the cost of employing anyone with a family. That means new jobs will not be created, existing jobs will be cut, and small-business employees who keep their jobs will likely have their wages cut to pay for this mandate. My plan attacks the real problems of health care – cost, availability and portability.

We also need to keep the IRS from taking more of your income and making life harder for small business. If you believe you should pay more taxes, I am the wrong candidate for you. Senator Obama is your man. The choice in this election is stark and simple. Senator Obama will raise your taxes. I won't, because jobs are the most important thing our economy creates. And when you raise taxes in a bad economy you eliminate jobs. I'm not going to let that happen.

If you are one of the 23 million small business owners in America who files as an individual rate payer, Senator Obama is willing to raise your tax rates. If you have an investment for your child's education or own a mutual fund or a stock in a retirement plan, your taxes could be higher. He will raise estate taxes to 45 percent. I propose to cut them to 15 percent. And for those of you with children, I will double the child deduction from $3,500 to $7,000 for every dependent, in every family in America.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

My opponent also believes America would be better off by foregoing opportunities to sell in growing foreign markets. I disagree. Twenty-five percent of all jobs in this country are linked to world trade. In just five states – Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan, Wisconsin and Colorado – over five million jobs depend on open markets. To promote job creation, I will expand foreign markets for our goods and services.

Because the vast benefits of a global marketplace come at a cost for many, we have an obligation to help our workers receive the training they need when plants close and jobs are lost. Under my reforms, we will use our community colleges to help train workers for specific opportunities in their hometowns. And for older workers who have lost a job that won't come back, if they move rapidly to a new job we'll help make up the difference in wages between their old job and the new one.

To promote job creation, we must also get government's fiscal house in order. Government has grown by 60 percent in the last eight years, because this Congress and this Administration have failed to meet their responsibilities. When I'm president, I will order a stem to stern review of government, modernize how it does business and save billions of dollars. I will veto every single bill with wasteful spending. We aren't going to continue mortgaging this country's future for things Americans don't want or need.

My opponent has a very different record on this issue. He voted for an energy bill stuffed with give-aways to oil companies at a time of record profits. I voted against it. He supported the $300 billion pork-laden agricultural subsidy bill. I opposed it. As for earmark spending, I have never asked for a single earmark in my entire career. In his Senate career, Senator Obama has requested some $930 million for earmark projects. That comes to more than a million dollars in pork for every working day since he became a United States Senator. There is never a good time to put your parochial and political interests above those of the nation – and least of right now, during an economic downturn.

For many, it is a very tough time. But my friends, we've been through worse, and beaten longer odds. Even in these difficult days, we must believe in ourselves. Nothing is inevitable in America. We've always been the captains of our fate. All you've ever asked of government is that it stand on your side, not in your way. I intend to do just that: to stand on your side; to help business and not government create jobs; to fight for your future and not the personal ambitions of politicians and bureaucrats.

We have much work to do if we are to end the self-interested partisanship that prevents us from fixing problems that need to be fixed and changing government to keep this country prosperous and at peace. I make you one promise I will always keep, no matter what.

In war and peace, I have been an imperfect servant of my country. But I have been her servant first, last and always. Whenever I faced an important choice between my country's interests or my own interests, party politics or any special interest, I chose my country. Nothing has ever mattered more to me than the honor of serving America, and nothing ever will. If you elect me President, I will always put our country first. I will put its greatness; its prosperity and peace; and the hopes and concerns of the people who make it great before any personal or partisan interest. I will keep that promise every hour of every day I am in office. And I will ask you to help me convince Congress, Republicans and Democrats, to keep that promise as well. There is nothing beyond our ability to achieve. We are Americans, and we don't hide from history. We make history. All we need is to believe in ourselves as we always have, and to cherish the beautiful country we are so blessed to call home.

Question and Answer:

1 Q) [holding a no nukes sign] My father worked at the Piketon plant and him and my mother died of cancer. I want to clean-up the area. I don't want other people to work in a very toxic industry.

MCCAIN: I believe that nuclear power is and can be safe. As you know, I've served in the Navy. And we've sailed nuclear ships around the world for 60 years -- and there's no report of people getting sick. I know about Three Mile Island and Chernobyl. I do believe nuclear power is safe. I think other energy sources aren't safe -- greenhouse gas emissions are also harming us. The evidence I have is that nuclear power is safe and nuclear energy needs to be part of our solution.

FOLLOW-UP: Workers going into the plant need to be protected. I've contacted the authorities on this matter and no one is getting back to me.

MCCAIN: One, I will take information from you and two, I will try to help track down that information for you. I'll be back in contact with you. And again, please accept my sympathy for the loss of your mother and father. I promise you I will learn and read the information you send me.

2 Q) [College Student] What's your stance on TRIO funding -- it's support for the upper-bound programs for college.

MCCAIN: Yes. I strongly support it.

MCCAIN: Thanks members of Divided We Fail.

3 Q) [Divided We Fail member] Health care is a major issue for every American -- especially here in rural Appalachia. Also the issue of financial security for all of us in our older years -- but young people too. I like your bipartisan approach to things. Can you talk about that?

MCCAIN: Americans are sick and tired of being sick and tired of the partisan politics in Washington. The approval rating of Congress is now in the single digits -- 9%. The last time Social Security was on the brink of disaster, what happened? There was a liberal Democrat, Tip O'Neil and Ronald Reagan sat down at a table together and worked it out. And the fixed Social Security for awhile. And that's what Americans want to happen. I will sit down with Harry Reid or Nancy Pelosi. It's time to put partisanship behind and get things done. We will sit down together and fix that system. I have a history of reaching across the aisle.

MCCAIN: One other organization here I'd like to highlight -- ONE.

4 Q) [ONE volunteer] Thank you Mr. McCain and your wife Cindy. We have 60,000 members in OH dedicated to the issue of global poverty. You played a huge role in helping us pass legislation. You spoke about malaria - what will you do to make eradicating malaria a priority as president?

MCCAIN: I'd like to commend this administration for their work to eliminate AIDS in Africa. I would obviously support organizations like yours and others. Also, clean water -- that's important. I believe when the economy's of these nations are better, they will be able to solve their problems better. I commend ONE.

5 Q) Divorce rates are high and marriage rates are low. How can we fix our economy if we can't even fix our families?

MCCAIN: I think that families are the foundation and strength of our nation. The two-parent family organization, statistics show are better. The president did a good job with his faith-based program. But I also think we need to protect the rights of the born and the unborn. It's one of the big differences between me and my opponent. Obama voted against a partial-birth abortion ban. Every life is precious and there's a family in America for every child. If we inspire Americans to serve a cause greater than their self-interest, I think its obvious that families and America is strengthened because of it. I do think all the time how we can strengthen our values and nation -- but I'll think more about it now because or your question.

6 Q) We hear that you're not the third-term of Bush. I know you're not. When are you going to say, read my lips I am not the third term of Bush?

MCCAIN: I've agreed and disagreed with the president. I respect him. But I believe we need change. We have to stop the out of control spending -- pork-barrel spending. It's your money, not our money. I will veto all those bills and make famous those sponsoring them.

When this war was conducted and we succeeding initially, I went over there and said things aren't working. We need a new strategy. And that wasn't popular. And I said, I'd much rather lose a political campaign than a war. [standing ovation] We've got a strategy that is working, a great general and the best men and women fighting. If we set a date of withdrawal, we could erase all of our success. We should realize the benefits of winning. Our troops should come home, but with victory and honor, not in defeat.

Senator Obama has said now after 900 days he is going to Iraq. I'm glad he's finally going and finally sitting down with the commander. I offered to go with him. We do not want a situation where we have to send our soldiers back again because we haven't seen this through.

7 Q) I never knew a farmer to ask for a handout. Why don't we take the restrictions off the farmers and not pay them subsidies not to grow?

MCCAIN: I'm with you. Congress just passed a bill with tons of money for asparagus subsidies and ethanol subsidies. I voted against that, Obama voted for it. It's hard to vote against something called the Farm Bill because we all love farmers. But as president, I would veto that bill.

We need to repeal the death tax. Farmers should be able to hand down their farms.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

8 Q) How can we speed up the process to get relief from gas prices?

MCCAIN: We need to lift the ban on offshore drilling. Can we get it immediately? No. Some say it could take 5-10 years, but imagine if we had started it 5-10 years ago. Clean coal we need to do. And nuclear power, the French are doing it and it's working for them. We should not be sending 700 billion dollars a year overseas and sometimes to terrorist organizations. This is a national security issue.

9 Q) [hospice founder] DHL is closing that airpark -- we're losing 80,000 jobs. [crying] Will you investigate this? Will you come to Wilmington and accept our petition with 10,000 signatures?

MCCAIN: This is a terrible blow. I believe it was 8,600 jobs. If there are anti-trust issues associated with this, I will have that investigated fully. We have to offer people the opportunity of job training programs I gotta look you in the eye and give you some straight talk -- I don't know if I can stop this, in fact it's unlikely. But we have to give people another opportunity and give them programs to retrain for other jobs. We need to retrain the workers that need it and deserve it. My heart goes out to you.

10 Q) What is your feeling about No Child Left Behind?

MCCAIN: Cindy was in special education -- that honest line of work before I took her out. Thank you for being a teacher. I think that NCLB needs to be fixed. However, I think it was the right beginning. I think we need to be able to test and measure performance across the board. I think we need to have goals and measure that. But we also need to fund the things that aren't being funding -- like special education. I'm for choice and competition. We had the money to send our children to private school. I want every American to have a choice. Charter schools are good. Competition is good.

11 Q) Proud to be a navy guy like you. Do you agree with the timetable it takes for a veteran to get his benefits?

MCCAIN: Clarify please.

QUESTIONER: Details injuries from Iraq. As of today, I get medically disqualified for jobs now and I am only 40% qualified to get my benefits.

MCCAIN: Walter-Reid situation -- we passed legislation after that to fix the problems there. I believe it's going to take awhile to implement those changes. And we should be taking care of our soldiers for the sacrifices that they've made for us.

12 Q) You are trying to inspire college students, young people. I come from a small school where the College Republican's have shrunk because they are not happy with the direction of the party. How can you address the concerns of the people of my age?

MCCAIN: A lot of Republicans are upset because of the out of control spending. The first thing I need to do is go to the venues where the young people are. And then, use as effectively as possible -- we have a lot of work to do -- use the internet effectively because that is where young people are communicating. There's nothing that convinces young people like other young people. I understand the challenge we face. And this election about your generation -- and I believe I have the inspiration that young people are looking for.

13 Q) Thank you Senator for the opportunity. PENAC - wrote a document. Can you tell us about your role in the organization related to PENAC and is this ... [9-11 conspiracy question] ...?

MCCAIN: Lieberman and I sponsored legislation to make a commission to assist with the 9-11 aftermath. I am proud of what the 9-11 commission did. I will stand by their recommendations and conclusions and I am proud to have been one of those who established the 9-11 commission.

14 Q) I'm a school bus driver. I paid into a pension plan. My husband worked and paid into Social Security. He's passed and now I can't afford to retire, because I'm not going to get social security. Do you think that's fair?

MCCAIN: No you should not have to be penalized because of the death of your husband. Please accept my sympathy for your husband's passing.

15 Q) Can we take Ahmadejinad seriously? Would you consider a 16 year old running mate?

MCCAIN: If he is as attractive and articulate as you, then yes. I worry that the president of Iran's comments are not just crazy talk. We all know they just tested a missile. I worry when any leader says they want to wipe Israel off the map. They are sending into Iraq the most explosive devices to kill our young men and women. We should enact sanctions against the Iranians. If there's an outbreak of conflict, I worry that

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Americans will be drawn into it. I'm all for diplomacy. I'm not going to sit down with the head of Iran until he adheres to certain conditions. If anyone is concerned that we don't have communications with Iran -- that is not a problem. We have an ambassador that speaks to them.

Conclusion

Ohio is a battleground state. I gotta be hear a lot -- I need your help and support. We need to drive around this state and stop in every town. You can help me in that. I will never let you down. And I will always, always put you first.

BANGKOK

THE STORY

Yesterday, a bomb exploded at a busy tourist site in Thailand's capital. At least 20 people were killed.

WHAT DO I NEED TO KNOW?

The pipe bomb went off during evening rush hour in front of a popular Hindu shrine. No one has claimed responsibility, but police are now looking for a suspect seen in a surveillance video. It shows a man carrying a backpack near the shrine at the time of the explosion. It's been a rough year for Thailand: last year, after months of unrest, the prime minister was kicked out in a military coup . She was popular with the rural poor majority, but not so much with the upper class. Things have mostly calmed down since then. Until yesterday. Officials say the attack was "intended to destroy the economy."

This is the worst bombing in Thailand in years. And many are worried it could make tourists pause before booking their trips. Not good, since tourism is a critical part of the otherwise shaky Thai economy.

COLLEGE FOOTBALL

Last year, Northwestern University's football team got the go-ahead to unionize. Yesterday they were told 'nope, never mind.'

EXPLAIN.

Schools like Northwestern make big $$$ on their sports teams (think: broadcast deals and ticket sales). But athletes don't see a lot of that upside. Last year, Northwestern's football team said it wanted to form a union to bargain for things like medical care and other benefits. A director at the NLRB (National Labor Relations Board) gave them the A-OK, saying that athletes with scholarships should be considered "employees" under US law.

BUT...?

Yesterday, the NLRB decided that allowing Northwestern's team to form a union would open a sort of Pandora's box in college sports. Meaning, some schools might be at a competitive disadvantage if they don't offer the same benefits as a unionized school. So now, Northwestern's football team is back where it started: the athletic department's friend without benefits.

:heSKIMM

Yesterday's decision shuts the door on one team's fight for student athletes to have a seat at the table. Northwestern football players aren't the only ones who want benefits…so this won't be the last time you hear about this.

This is worse than I thought. Welcome to the IRS. Earlier this year, it came out that hackers accessed the tax info of more than 100,000 Americans. Then yesterday, the IRS said great news: it was actually more than 300,000 Americans, and the hack started earlier than everyone thought. The hackers – who were allegedly in Russia — got into a system that houses tax returns. Nyet good. In order to get into the system, the hackers needed to know a few little things, like a taxpayer's Social Security number, address, and birthday. Really nyet good. The goal? To cash in on these people's tax returns, according to the IRS. Cue Uncle Sam taking a shot of vodka. To the face.

Did you hear about St. Paul's? The New Hampshire prep school with a distinguished alumni list (think: John Kerry) is involved in a not-so-distinguished scandal. Yesterday, a 19-year-old former student went to trial for allegedly raping a 15-year-old girl while he was a senior. He pleaded not guilty. But in a previous interview with police, he mentioned a competition at the school called the "senior salute" – which sounds like a plot line out of a very bad version of "American Pie." It's a contest to see how many younger girls senior guys can hook up with. Except in this case, the girl says it wasn't consensual. Now, the former student is standing trial and there's expected to be a big ol' spotlight on the 'sexual culture' at the boarding school. You're going to keep hearing about this one.

Fusion: “Hillary Clinton is in much better shape with a key demographic than she ever was in 2008”

By Brett LoGiurato

February 6, 2015

One of the potential hiccups with an all-but-certain Hillary Clinton campaign for president in 2016 is a perceived problem with young voters.

There’s good precedent for this perception: In 2008, the last time she ran for president, Clinton was walloped by President Barack Obama among youth voters in the Democratic primary. He tripled her share of the youth vote in Iowa, prompting a top Clinton adviser to famously say, “Our people look like caucus-goers and his people look like they are 18.”

But a new poll released Friday finds that, so far, Clinton is avoiding that trip heading into 2016. The poll, from the University of New Hampshire and WMUR, shows Clinton with not only a commanding lead among young voters in the state. It also shows young voters as her biggest supporters.

The 18-34 age group is the one that appears most firm about voting for Clinton in a 2016 Democratic primary. Three-quarters of that group says they would vote for her if the Democratic primary were held today. Just 9 percent choose Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Massachusetts), a liberal firebrand who has repeatedly said she won’t run for president. And 4 percent would vote for Vice President Joe Biden.

The results align with those from Fusion’s Massive Millennial Poll, which surveyed 1000 people aged 18-34 about everything from politics to dating to race issues. The poll found 38 percent of the millennials surveyed — including 57 percent of millennial Democrats surveyed in the poll.

Clinton has bigger problems — if they can be called problems — with the 50-and-over crowd of the possible Democratic primary voters in New Hampshire, who carried her to a surprise victory there in 2008. That year, more than two-thirds of Democratic primary voters were over the age of 40. She beat Obama by at least 9 points among the age 40-49, 50-64, and 65-and-over age groups.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This time, according to the UNH/WBUR poll, her lead is smaller than with young voters. But she still leads Warren by at least 30 points in each age group.

Some liberal groups have continued their efforts to push Warren into the race, even as she has become more firm in saying she will not challenge Clinton. This week, the "Run Warren Run" campaign — which is being led by the groups Democracy for America and MoveOn.org Political Action — announced the opening of a field office in New Hampshire.

The group, which already has offices in the early-caucus state of Iowa, said it plans to open more offices in New Hampshire. It also hired a New Hampshire state director for its campaign. It's being led mostly by younger activists who want Clinton to face a primary challenge.

MSNBC: "Behind Hillary Clinton's 2016 campaign launch window"

By Alex Seitz-Wald

February 6, 2015, 3:06 p.m. EST

Hillary Clinton is running for president, so when does she plan to tell the world? It's one of biggest questions in politics right now. Speculation originally focused on January, before turning to April, and now even July – but why not anytime in between those months?

Launching a presidential campaign is like launching a rocket – there's a ton of careful preparation and you have to wait for a window to open before conditions are right. But instead planetary movements, a campaign launch window is determined by the cyclical nature of federal elections laws and the power of money in modern American politics.

Every four months, presidential campaigns are required to report their fundraising hauls for the previous quarter to the Federal Election Commission. Campaigns want as much time as possible to show strong results in those end-of-the-quarter reports, so an ideal launch window opens on the first day of every new quarter, and begins closing at the end of that month it gets closer and closer to the deadline for reporting fundraising figures.

That's why, when Clinton ruled out a January (the beginning of the first quarter) campaign launch, advisors and outside speculation immediately turned to April, which is the beginning of the second quarter. And when some of Clinton allies recently started urging another postponement, speculation immediately turned towards July, the beginning of the third quarter. Launching in, say, June would be malpractice, insiders say, since her campaign would have only half as much time to raise money.

This also helps explain why Clinton's potential primary opponents are almost all saying they'll make a decision on their own runs in March or "spring," in time for the April launch window.

For Republican hopefuls, who are a facing a fluid and crowded presidential primary field, other considerations might be more important than maximizing their first fundraising window.

But for Clinton, who has time on her side and can set the pace of the Democratic primary at her leisure, insiders say the reporting window is critical. She knows all too well just how important a presidential campaign's first finance report can be.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

During her 2008 presidential bid, the first major sign that Clinton was in mortal trouble came from her first fundraising report to the FEC. To great fanfare, her campaign unveiled that they had raked in a whopping $36 million in the first four months since Clinton announced her candidacy in January of 2007. It turned out that only about $20 million of that was actually raised during the previous quarter for the primary campaign, though even that number was still seen as impressive.

But four days later, Obama stunned the political world with his own eye-popping number: $23.5 million. For a first-term senator who, despite all his natural talents, was not given much of a chance when it came to fundraising against the Clinton juggernaut, the number was a sign of unexpected strength that immediately put him on the same level as the far more experienced Clinton.

Voters are hardly paying attention this early in the race, and probably don't care how much a campaign raises in their first four months of operation, but early fundraising is key to the so-called "invisible primary," when candidates jockey for money and endorsements. A strong number that surpass expectations can open new doors (and checkbooks) for an underdog candidate, while a weak number can pull the rug out from under a frontrunner.

Clinton does not want a repeat of 2008 this time around.

Fortunately for Clinton, she has a massive network of eager donors ready to open their checkbooks the moment she gets in the race. Unfortunately for her, even if none of her potential 2016 primary opponents raise anywhere near the money Obama did, the high expectations that come from her prohibitive frontrunner status mean Clinton is under pressure to report an enormous figure in her first haul.

While allies are loath speculate about specific numbers, some worry that anything less than historic will be seen as a disappointment.

The Hill: "Sanders promises 'clash of ideas' with Hillary Clinton if both run in 2016"

By Ben Kamisar

February 7, 2015, 10:29 a.m. EST

Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) said Saturday morning that voters will see stark differences between himself and Hillary Clinton if the two both decide to run for the White House in 2016.

"Trust me, there will be a real clash of ideas," Sanders said on MSNBC's "Up with Steve Kornacki."

"I happen to like and respect Hillary Clinton, but I suspect on issues like massive investments in infrastructure, on real tax reform, on the need to deal in a very bold way with the planetary crisis of climate change, with the transpacific partnership, I suspect we will have some real differences."

Sanders is flirting with entering the 2016 Democratic presidential primary, but Clinton is a prohibitive favorite. Despite her huge lead for the nomination in opinion polls, however, there are signs of discontent among progressives, especially when it comes to Clinton's economic worldview.

If Sanders runs, he'd likely trumpet the goals of the progressive wing of the party, which wants bold policies aimed at addressing rising income inequality.

“I think we need a political revolution in this country, we need to get people once again actively involved in the political process and take on the people who have the real power in America,” Sanders said. He added that income inequality is at its starkest since 1929 and that, since the 2008 recession, the vast majority of all new income generated has gone to the wealthiest one percent.

His wish-list includes robust infrastructure spending, raising the minimum wage and a “national health care program that guarantees health care” to all.

His proposals would both increase government spending and expand the bounds of government more generally — neither of which are things that Republicans are likely to support. But Sanders said that if progressives can rally a majority of Americans behind their message, they could force change in Congress.

“If some of us are successful in mobilizing the American people and in a sense, giving the Republicans an offer they can’t refuse, yes, we can be successful,” he said.

“We may not get everything we want, I think we can push the Republicans to raise the minimum wage a lot higher than it is right now.”

Washington Post: “Healthy economy forces Republicans to rethink Obama-skewering strategy”

By Chico Harlan and Jim Tankersley

February 6, 2015, 10:10 p.m. EST

A robust economy marked by a boom in jobs and a plunge in gas prices is threatening the longtime Republican strategy of criticizing President Obama for holding back growth and hiring, forcing the GOP to overhaul its messaging at the beginnings of a presidential campaign.

On Friday, the government announced that 257,000 jobs had been created in January and that wages over the past year had increased 2.2percent. The bump in wages, together with the sharp decline in gas prices, is providing financial relief that could be worth as much as $2,000 a year to an average worker.

The unemployment rate ticked up by one-tenth of a point to 5.7percent, largely because a wave of people reentered the workforce — or resumed job hunts — after years of discouragement.

“We’re finally getting to that point where a self-sustaining recovery is going on,” said Jeremy Lawson, chief economist at Standard Life Investments, an asset management firm.

The improvement may mark a turning point in the nation’s seven-year-long debate over the state of the economy. Obama came to office amid a financial crisis, promising to turn the economy around. Republicans repeatedly — and, in the 2014 midterm campaign, successfully — argued that he had fallen short, with an economy suffering slow growth and unnecessarily high unemployment.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But a broad consensus among economists that the economy has come to life in recent months appears to be turning that GOP strategy on its head. Some leaders, such as Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, have acknowledged and sought to claim credit for the improvement, which has coincided with Republicans taking control of both houses of Congress.

Other Republicans, while agreeing that the economy is improving, focused on the most glaring problems in the labor market, criticizing Obama for not accomplishing enough.

“We need to build on this recent momentum and continue closing the Obama recovery’s private-sector jobs gap when compared to average recoveries,” Rep. Kevin Brady (R-Tex.), the top House Republican on the Joint Economic Committee, said Friday.

Republican economic strategists say that the economy’s improvement poses a tough challenge for the GOP, potentially undermining the party’s hopes of recapturing the White House in 2016 if they don’t have a message that goes beyond assailing Obama.

“When Hillary Clinton runs, she’s going to say, ‘The Republicans gave us a crappy economy twice, and we fixed it twice. Why would you ever trust them again?’” said Kevin Hassett, a former economic adviser to GOP nominees Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney. “The objective for the people in the Republican Party who want to defeat her is to come up with a story about what’s not great” in this recovery, especially wage growth, he said.

Some in the party have already started to do that, acknowledging the economy’s improvements and tailoring their critiques to an issue more frequently championed by Democrats: the failure of the recovery to adequately boost wages for middle- and low-income workers.

“What you can argue is, yes, right now the economy has the wind at its back,” said Kevin Madden, a former Romney adviser who is a partner at Hamilton Place Strategies in Washington. “Let’s seize this opportunity to deliver broader, sustained growth.”

Former Florida governor Jeb Bush, considered a leading candidate to win the GOP nomination next year, began testing a message this week in Detroit, speaking directly to the struggles and frustrations of the middle class.

McConnell, House Speaker John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) and Rep. Paul Ryan (R-Wis.), the chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, have all said in television interviews that the recovery is not lifting ordinary Americans in the way that it should.

Meanwhile, Obama said on Friday that the stronger economy is a case for his vision of economic populism.

“My number one priority is making sure the American peoples’ wages and incomes are going up, because right now the stock market has gone up [and] corporate profits are at an all-time high,” Obama said.

“At a time when the economy is finally picking up steam, we’ve got to work twice as hard in Washington,” he said.

The U.S. economy has created more than 1 million jobs over the past three months, the best stretch of hiring in 17 years. That job growth, along with improved consumer confidence and spending, suggests the recovery has finally found a higher gear, more than five years after the Great Recession officially ended.

Most economists expect that 2015 will be the best year for American workers since the recession. Less important than the pace of hiring is the emergence of solid wage growth, an indicator of full labor market health that comes when employers feel pressured to fight for workers.

The average hourly worker saw a 12-cent-per-hour raise in January, the best one-month increase since 2007. Since the Great Recession, real wages have remained stagnant, but this is slowly beginning to change. Over the past year, wages have risen 2.2percent. Meantime, consumer prices are seeing inflation below 1percent, because cheaper oil has caused gasoline prices to plummet.

“The pickup in average hourly earnings gains was a belated Christmas present,” Scott Anderson, chief economist at Bank of the West, said in an e-mail. “It should help the Fed look past a temporary drop in inflation this year and keep their eye on gradually normalizing interest rates.”

The typical 40-hour-per-week American worker, according to government data, makes about $1,100 more than he did one year ago. Meantime, savings from gasoline could prove just as important. The typical American spent some $2,400 at the pump in 2013, when prices averaged $3.44 per gallon, according to a government survey of consumers. If gas prices hold steady at the current $2.01, Americans will save $1,000 for the year.

It remains unclear how long gasoline prices will stay low — oil has rallied slightly over the past week — but they’ve already helped drive a psychological change in the way Americans view the economy. Consumer confidence is at a post-recession high, and in January, a wave of people reentered the job hunt after months or years on the sideline. As a result, January’s data showed at least some evidence that these workers are again looking for work. The labor force participation rate — which tracks the proportion of Americans holding or seeking a job — nudged up from 62.7 to 62.9percent.

“When I look at this report, I see a confident economy,” Department of Labor Secretary Thomas E. Perez said Friday in an interview. “Companies that are bullish. New job seekers who are more optimistic. And when you factor low gas prices and wage growth, that adds up to money in people’s pockets, a greater hop in their step.”

Des Moines Register: “Sources: Biden to make Iowa trip next week”

By Jennifer Jacobs

February 6, 2015, 3:48 p.m. CST

[Subtitle:] The vice president will be in Des Moines Thursday, sources familiar with event planning told The Des Moines Register

Joe Biden, the vice president and an underdog in the race for the Democratic presidential nomination, is scheduled to be back in Iowa next week, The Des Moines Register has learned.

Biden will speak in Des Moines on Thursday, according to sources familiar with preparations for his trip.

The news comes in the wake of the release this past weekend of a new Iowa Poll that shows Biden trails both Hillary Clinton and Elizabeth Warren in the horse race for most popular presidential pick among likely Democratic caucusgoers.

Biden's timing suggests he wants to keep his name in circulation as presidential material - any time top-shelf politicians make a trip here it reinforces the notion that they harbor aspirations for the top job. He is currently in Belgium, meeting with European leaders in part to talk about sanctions against Russia and security and aid to Ukraine. He'll also attend a security summit in Germany.

Democrats generally think the 2016 Democratic nomination is Clinton's if she wants it, although she has yet to announce an official candidacy. In September, Biden made headlines for chasing Clinton here just three days after she made her Iowa comeback after a seven-year absence; she spoke before an audience of 10,000 and a horde of media at the Harkin Steak fry.

Biden's event Thursday, like the one in September, will be an official White House trip to talk about the Obama administration's economic policies. Biden remarks in September, with the Iowa Capitol in the background, had the air of a campaign stump speech, as he called for raising the minimum wage and making life better for the middle class.

Biden, 72, was here more recently, in late October, to campaign in Davenport for two Iowa Democrats running for federal office, Dave Loebsack, who was re-elected to Congress, and Bruce Braley, who lost his bid for U.S. Senate.

This will be Biden's fourth post-2012 trip here. He spoke at the 2013 Harkin Steak Fry, and he did a private event with invited guests at Des Moines' ballpark, Principal Park, beforehand.

Biden has a network of connections in Iowa after running for president here in both 1987 and 2007, then campaigning extensively with President Barack Obama in 2012.

Known as a champion for the middle class and an expert on foreign policy, Biden has been described by Iowa Democrats as forceful, engaging and direct, but also has a reputation for long-windedness and verbal gaffes collectively known as Bidenisms. An Iowa Poll in September 2012 found that 47 percent of Iowans considered Biden a drag on the ticket.

Among Democratic activists, opinions of him are high, the new Iowa Poll shows. He's viewed favorably by 78 percent of likely 2016 Democratic caucusgoers, the Jan. 26-29 poll found. Just 20 percent have a negative view of him.

That means his popularity among those core Democratic voters is almost as high as Clinton's (84 percent favorable). But he's the first choice of just 9 percent of likely caucusgoers, while Clinton is the top choice for 56 percent. Warren, a U.S. senator from Massachusetts, is the first choice for 16 percent.

Washington Post blog: The Fix: “New Hampshire, and the case for Hillary Clinton not quite being ‘inevitable’”

By Scott Clement

February 6, 2015, 2:30 p.m. EST

New Hampshire has been very good to the Clintons, making Bill Clinton the "comeback kid" in its 1992 primary and helping Hillary Clinton to a badly needed victory after Barack Obama won Iowa in 2008. And Hillary Clinton is a strong favorite there again this year -- as she is nearly everywhere.

But as we enter the 2016 campaign, it's worth remembering that New Hampshire likes to surprise us. And there are plenty of reasons to keep an eye on the Granite State when it comes to Clinton's supposed "inevitability" as the Democratic nominee.

Despite vast coverage of Clinton's dominance in lining up for a presidential run, three in four likely New Hampshire Democratic primary voters in a new WMUR Granite State Poll say they're "still trying to decide" who they'll vote for in the state's 2016 primary. Just 7 percent say they've "definitely decided."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The widespread lack of commitment in the poll, conducted by the University of New Hampshire, is unsurprising roughly one year before voting. But it is a reminder there's ample room for volatility in a Democratic race which thus far has looked like a looming Clinton rout. People are at least open-minded.

Between the courting of top strategists and Democratic donors, polls asking how Democrats would vote "if the election were held today" have found Clinton dominating other hopefuls. Indeed, 58 percent in the same sample of Democrats said they would support Clinton today, with Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) in a distant second at 14 percent and Vice President Biden at 8 percent. This does not imply much hemming and hawing, but the "still trying to decide" number assures she hasn't put the Democratic nomination on ice just yet (nor should we expect her to have done so).

The lack of final decision is not itself worrisome for Clinton; voters simply don't decide this early. At this point in 2011, the Republican field was in a very similar situation, with 78 percent of Republican likely voters in February 2011 survey still trying to decide who to support -- even as Mitt Romney held a 30-point lead over other potential contenders in a state he wound up dominating in 2012. Romney won by 16 points over Ron Paul, smaller than his initial edge but still a no-doubted from the beginning.

But the survey offers other clues as to Clinton's vulnerabilities among primary voters and makes clear Democratic voters are not thrilled about their options so far. Fewer than one in five Democrats say they're "very satisfied" with the choice of candidates for the Democratic nomination (18 percent); 63 percent take poll choice equivalent of "meh," saying they are "somewhat satisfied." And despite nearly six in 10 preferring her to other Democrats, just 32 percent say she is the most likable and 31 percent say she's the most believable. No other candidate, though, beats her on these attributes.

The rest of the poll is gravy for Clinton's prospects, and bodes particularly poorly for Joe Biden, one of her strongest potential rivals. More than eight in 10 have a favorable impression of her (83 percent) and just 9 percent are unfavorable -- by far the best favorable-unfavorable margin (+74). Others like Warren and Sanders are similarly well-liked by those who know them, but aren't as well-known.

Biden's image is weaker according to the poll. His favorability margin is a modest +23 (53 percent favorable/30 percent unfavorable), which far weaker than Warren or Clinton and worse than surveys by the same pollster in October and July (+32 and +47 favorability margins, respectively.) Biden is less popular in New Hampshire than Iowa, where a Des Moines Register/Bloomberg Politics poll found a 78/20 percent favorable/ unfavorable split on general impressions.

The poll underscores how much Clinton's candidacy banks on other Democrats failing to make strong impression ahead of primaries this fall, and the importance of maintaining her own positive image. When New Hampshire voters do begin to decide, she'll want voters' opinions to look a lot they do right now.

The WMUR Granite State poll was conducted on landline and cellular phones Jan. 22 to Feb. 3 among a random sample of 297 likely voters in the 2016 New Hampshire Democratic primary. The margin of sampling error is 5.7 percentage points.

The case for reforming the federal coal program

By David J. Hayes

President Obama has overseen the most sweeping and successful reforms of federal energy policies in recent memory. From strengthening environmental standards for oil and gas drilling and cutting pollution from power plants to accelerating the construction of large-scale solar and wind projects on public lands, the Obama administration has worked to modernize nearly every element of U.S. energy policy.

The remaining exception is the federal coal program.

No element of the federal government's energy program is more outdated, more unfair to taxpayers, and more inconsistent with our nation's energy and environmental goals than the Department of the Interior's coal leasing policies.

Forty percent of U.S. coal is mined on taxpayer-owned public lands, primarily in the Powder River Basin. Through a fundamentally non-competitive process that has been criticized by independent investigators, coal companies are able to buy the rights to strip-mine taxpayer-owned coal for about a dollar per ton. Taxpayers are shortchanged a second time when coal companies use loopholes to dodge royalty payments that are owed from production.

What's more, when this artificially cheap federal coal is burned in power plants, it contributes to respiratory illness, distorts U.S. energy markets, and is a major source of climate change – accounting for one-tenth of all U.S. greenhouse gas pollution.

Secretary of the Interior Sally Jewell is absolutely right: it is time to reform the federal coal program.

In a landmark speech this spring, Secretary Jewell called for "an honest and open conversation about modernizing the federal coal program," citing concerns about fairness to taxpayers and climate change.

Starting today, this conversation will unfold in a series of listening sessions in Washington DC, Billings, Montana, Gillette, Wyoming, Denver, Colorado and Farmington, New Mexico. It will be the first time in more than thirty years that the Department of the Interior has conducted a high-level review of how it manages taxpayer-owned coal.

At these listening sessions, the Obama administration will undoubtedly hear the coal industry's case for the status quo, and the continuation of policies that are intended to maximize production with little regard to external costs or the fair return that is owed to taxpayers.

The Interior Department will also hear from reformers: ranchers in Wyoming who worry about who will clean up the mines in their backyards; sportsmen who are seeing development cut up big game and other wildlife habitat; Western mayors who know that fewer loopholes and higher royalties will bring much-needed revenues to their communities; and taxpayer advocates who argue for parity between coal royalties and other federal energy policies.

Jewell should use the listening sessions to develop a clear and comprehensive plan for reform that incorporates the best ideas that were heard. A top appointee should present this plan to the Secretary within 60 days of the end of the Interior Department's public comment period for coal reform.

Four ideas, in particular, deserve consideration in this reform plan.

First, the Obama administration should modernize the revenue policies for federal coal to ensure taxpayers get a fair return and account for coal's carbon costs. Interior should establish a minimum bid required to buy a coal lease and increase the royalty rate for surface mining production from 12.5 percent to a minimum of 18.75 percent – the rate applied to offshore oil and gas drilling. Payments by companies mining taxpayer-owned coal also need to account for its high carbon content and climate change impacts.

Second, the Interior Department's Bureau of Land Management (BLM) should rethink how it conducts lease sales in the Powder River Basin to restore competitiveness among companies and to clearly identify areas that are too special to mine. No comprehensive environmental and economic review has been undertaken in more than 30 years; BLM and the Department of Energy should launch one now.

Third, the Interior Department should immediately evaluate whether coal companies that are mining on federal lands have adequate resources to pay to clean up their own mines. With some coal companies facing financial troubles – largely as a result of competition with natural gas – there is growing concern that taxpayers could be left to foot the bill if there are defaults or bankruptcies. Help also is needed for coal communities who are bearing the brunt of the falling demand for coal.

Finally, and importantly, the Interior Department should call a time-out from selling new coal leases or renewing old leases until it completes its internal review of the program and announces a comprehensive suite of reforms. Taxpayers deserve a fair deal from any new coal leases that are sold on their public lands.

To be sure, the task of reforming the federal coal program will not be easy nor will it be met with enthusiasm from the coal industry. The reality is, however, that America's energy markets are changing fast and – like the federal government's oil, gas, and renewable energy programs – it is time to bring federal coal policy into the 21st century.

Hayes is the former deputy secretary of the Department of the Interior. He is a visiting senior fellow at the Center for American Progress.

Subject: Holocaust Survivors Condemn Israeli Assault on Gaza

Tikkun { tē-kün } to heal, repair, and transform the world

Editor's Note: The ad below appeared in the New York Times. While I do not agree that the appropriate response to Israel's actions in Gaza is a blanket boycott of Israel (though I do support boycotting firms providing support for Israel's Occupation of the West Bank and non-Palestinian firms that operate in the West Bank and help Israeli settlements there), I believe that it is important to publicize the growing sentiment of revulsion at the consequences of the Occupation, the blockade of Gaza, and the destruction of Gaza and its people among Jewish people who are unwilling to subordinate their ethical sensibilities to blind support for the policies of the current government of Israel. Below that letter we reprint a disturbing article from the Israelis newspaper Ha'aretz about growing racism among Israeli youth. While in my view the article is overblown and doesn't give enough attention to counter-tendencies among some Israeli youth, it nevertheless does describe an aspect of Israel society that is deeply troubling. --Rabbi Michael Lerner

Jewish survivors and descendents of survivors of Nazi genocide unequivocally condemn the massacre of Palestinians in Gaza

As Jewish survivors and descendents of survivors of the Nazi genocide we unequivocally condemn the massacre of Palestinians in Gaza and the ongoing occupation and colonization of historic Palestine. We further condemn the United States for providing Israel with the funding to carry out the attack, and Western states more generally for using their diplomatic muscle to protect Israel from condemnation. Genocide begins with the silence of the world.

We are alarmed by the extreme, racist dehumanization of Palestinians in Israeli society, which has reached a fever-pitch. In Israel, politicians and pundits in The Times of Israel and The Jerusalem Post have called openly for genocide of Palestinians and right-wing Israelis are adopting Neo-Nazi insignia.

Furthermore, we are disgusted and outraged by Elie Wiesel's abuse of our history in these [NY Times] pages to promote blatant falsehoods used to justify the unjustifiable: Israel's wholesale effort to destroy Gaza and the murder of nearly 2,000 Palestinians, including many hundreds of children. Nothing can justify bombing UN shelters, homes, hospitals and universities. Nothing can justify depriving people of electricity and water.

We must raise our collective voices and use our collective power to bring about an end to all forms of racism, including the ongoing genocide of Palestinian people. We call for an immediate end to the siege against and blockade of Gaza. We call for the full economic, cultural and academic boycott of Israel. "Never again" must mean NEVER

Israeli teenagers: Racist and proud of it

Ethnic hatred has become a basic element in the everyday life of Israeli youth, a forthcoming book finds.

By Or Kashti in Ha'aretz

"For me, personally, Arabs are something I can't look at and can't stand," a 10th-grade girl from a high school in the central part of the country says in abominable Hebrew. "I am tremendously racist. I come from a racist home. If I get the chance in the army to shoot one of them, I won't think twice. I'm ready to kill someone with my hands, and it's an Arab. In my education I learned that ... their education is to be terrorists, and there is no belief in them. I live in an area of Arabs, and every day I see these Ishmaelites, who pass by the [bus] station and whistle. I wish them death."

The student's comments appear in a chapter devoted to ethnicity and racism among youth from a forthcoming book, "Scenes from School Life" (in Hebrew) by Idan Yaron and Yoram Harpaz. The book is based on anthropological observations made by Dr. Yaron, a sociologist, over the course of three years in a six-year, secular high school in the Israeli heartland – "the most average school we could find," says Harpaz, a professor of education.

The book is nothing short of a page-turner, especially now, following the overt displays of racism and hatred of the Other that have been revealed in the country in the past month or so. Maybe "revealed" isn't the right word, as it suggests surprise at the intensity of the phenomenon. But Yaron's descriptions of what he saw at the school show that such hatred is a basic everyday element among youth, and a key component of their identity. Yaron portrays the hatred without rose-colored glasses or any attempt to present it as a sign of social "unity." What he observed is unfiltered hatred. One conclusion that arises from the text is how little the education system is able – or wants – to deal with the racism problem.

Not all educators are indifferent or ineffective. There are, of course, teachers and others in the realm of education who adopt a different approach, who dare to try and take on the system. But they are a minority. The system's internal logic operates differently.

Much of the chapter on racism revolves around the Bible lessons in a ninth-grade class, whose theme was revenge. "The class starts, and the students' suggestions of examples of revenge are written on the blackboard," the teacher told Yaron. A student named Yoav "insists that revenge is an important emotion. He utilizes the material being studied to hammer home his semi-covert message: All the Arabs should be killed. The class goes into an uproar. Five students agree with Yoav and say openly: The Arabs should be killed."

One student relates that he heard in the synagogue on Shabbat that "Aravim zeh erev rav" ["Arabs are a rabble," in a play on words], and also Amalek, and there is a commandment to kill them all," a reference to the prototypical biblical enemy of the Children of Israel. Another student says he would take revenge on anyone who murdered his family, but would not kill them all.

"Some of the other students are outraged by this [softer stance]," the teacher reported. "The student then makes it clear that he has no love for Arabs and that he is not a leftist."

Another student, Michal, says she is shocked by what she is hearing. She believes that the desire for revenge will only foment a cycle of blood; not all Arabs are bad, she adds, and certainly they don't all deserve to die. "People who decree the fate of others so easily are not worthy of life," she says.

Yoav himself claims to have heard Michal say: "Too bad you weren't killed in a terrorist attack."

"The students all start shouting," the teacher says, according to Yaron. "Some are personally insulted, others are up in arms, and Michal finds herself alone and absorbing all the fire – 'Arab lover,' 'leftist.' I try to calm things down. The class is too distraught to move on to the biblical story. The bell rings. I let them out and suggest that they be more tolerant of one another."

In the corridor during the break, the teacher notices that a crowd has gathered from all the ninth-grade classes. They have formed a human chain and are taunting Michal: "Fie, fie, fie, the Arabs will die." The teacher: "I contemplated for five seconds whether to respond or keep going down the corridor. Finally I dispersed the gathering and insisted that Michal accompany me to the teachers' room. She was in a state of shock, reeling under the insult, with tears to come instantly."

Six students are suspended for two days. The teacher reports on his conversation with Michal: "She continues to be laconic. This is what always happens, she says. The opinions are racist, and her only regret is speaking out. I just want to hug her and say I'm sorry I put her through this trauma. I envy her courage to say aloud things that I sometimes am incapable of saying."

Leftists as 'Israel-haters'

In his research, Yaron spoke with Michal and Yoav, with other students in the class and with the homeroom teacher and the principal. The multiplicity of versions of the goings-on that emerge suggest a deep conflict and a lack of trust between the educators and the pupils. Each world functions separately, with the adults exercising little if any influence on the youngsters. It's hard to believe that the suspension, or the punishment inflicted on some of the students – for example, to prepare a presentation for the ninth-grade classes on the subject of racism – changed anyone's opinion.

The same goes for the principal's unequivocal declaration that, "There will be no racist comments in our school." Even the essay Michal was asked to write on the subject was soon forgotten. "The intention was to launch an educational program, but in the meantime it was postponed," the homeroom teacher admits.

A year later, however, the incident itself was still remembered in the school. The same student who told Yaron that she won't think twice if she gets the opportunity "to shoot one of them" when she serves in the army, also said, "As soon as I heard about the quarrel with that leftist girl [Michal], I was ready to throw a brick at her head and kill her. In my opinion, all the leftists are Israel-haters. I personally find it very painful. Those people have no place in our country – both the Arabs and the leftists."

Anyone who imagines this as a local, passing outburst is wrong. As was the case with the girl from the ORT network vocational school who alleged earlier this year that her teacher had expressed "left-wing views" in the classroom – in this case too a student related that he cursed and shouted at a teacher who "justified the Arabs." The students say that workshops to combat racism, which are run by an outside organization, leave little impression. "Racism is part of our life, no matter how much people say it's bad," a student said.

In the concluding discussion in just one such workshop, the moderator asked the students how they thought racism might eradicated. "Thin out the Arabs," was the immediate reply. "I want you to leave here with the knowledge that the phenomenon exists, for you to be self-critical, and then maybe you will prevent it," the moderator said. To which one student shot back, "If we're not racist, that makes us leftists."

The moderator, in a tone of despair: "I'd like it if you took at least something small from this workshop." A student responds to the challenge: "That everyone should live the way he wants, that if he thinks he's racist, let him think what he wants, and that's all."

As an adjunct of racism and hatred, ethnic identities – Mizrahi (Jews from Middle Eastern and North African countries) and Ashkenazi – are also flourishing. Yoav believes that there is "discrimination between Mizrahim and Ashkenazim. We were severely punished for the incident [with Michal], but if it were the other way around, that wouldn't have happened." Yoav later told Yaron that he found the common saying, "What's this, an [open-air] market?" offensive, because his whole family works in the local produce market.

"Our business has existed since the state was established," he said. "I am proud of my father, who is a man of the market. What are they trying to say, that my father isn't cultured? When people say something about 'Arabs,' it's considered a generalization, but when they say 'market,' that's alright. When people say 'market,' they are actually talking about Mizrahim. We need to change the prejudices about the market and about the Mizrahim. People say I am a racist, but it's just the opposite."

"There is no discussion about the topic of racism in the school and there probably will not be," the principal admits. "We are not prepared for the deep, long-term process that's necessary. Even though I am constantly aware of the problem, it is far from being dealt with. It stems in the first place from the home, the community and the society, and it's hard for us to cope with it. You have to remember that another reason it's hard to deal with the problem is that it also exists among the teachers. Issues such as 'human dignity' or 'humanism' are in any case considered left-wing, and anyone who addresses them is considered tainted."

Threat of noise

Prof. Yoram Harpaz is a senior lecturer at Beit Berl Teachers College and the editor of Hed Hahinuch, a major educational journal. Recalling the recent promise of Education Minister Shay Piron that classes in the first two weeks of the coming school year will be devoted to "emotional and social aspects of the summer's events," including "manifestations of racism and incitement," Harpaz observes that schools in their present format "are incapable of dealing with the racist personality and identity."

He adds: "The schools are not geared for this. They can only impart basic knowledge and skills, hold examinations on them and grade the students. In fact, they have a hard time doing even that. In classes of 40 students, with a strict curriculum and exams that have to be held, it is impossible to engage in values-based education."

Yaron, a senior lecturer in sociology at Ashkelon Academic College, emphasizes how important teachers and the principal (and the education system in general) feel it is to stick to the curriculum and the lessons schedule – two islands of quiet amid a risk-laden reality.

"Doing this makes it possible for the teachers not to enter a dynamic sphere, which obligates openness and is liable to open a Pandora's box, too," he notes. "The greatest threat to the teacher is that there will be noise – that someone will complain, that an argument will break out, etc. That danger looms especially large in subjects that interest young people, such as sexuality, ethnicity, violence and racism. Teachers lack the tools to cope with these issues, so they are outsourced, which only emasculates educational personnel even more."

The demand for quiet in the schools is not only an instrumental matter, deriving from the difficulty of keeping order in the classroom. There is also an ideological aspect involved. In general, there is a whole series of subjects that are not recommended for discussion in schools, such as the Nakba (or "catastrophe," the term used by Palestinians to denote the establishment of the State of Israel), human rights and the morality of Israeli army operations. This was one of the reasons for the warnings issued by Tel Aviv University and Ben-Gurion University of the Negev during the fighting in the Gaza Strip about "extreme and offensive remarks."

Harpaz: "In Israel, the most political country there is, political education has not been developed as a discipline in which high-school students are taught how to think critically about political attitudes, or the fact that those attitudes are always dependent on a particular viewpoint and on vested interests."

What, then, can be done? According to Harpaz, the solution will not be found in discussions between the homeroom teacher and the students. Nor is a condemnation, however late, by the education minister sufficient. A more radical change is needed.

"Values and outlooks are acquired in a lengthy process of identification with 'significant others,' such as teachers," Harpaz explains. "This means that every aspect of the schools – patterns of teaching, evaluation methods, curricula, the physical structure and the cultural climate – has to change in the direction of becoming far more dialogical and democratic."

And he has one more recommendation: not to flee from political and moral dilemmas, or from possible criticism. "Our leaders are so fearful of criticism, but they don't understand that critical education is what generates close ties and caring. We get angry at those we love."

Subject: [big campaign] GUARDIAN: We'll talk with US but Cuba s tays socialist, insists Raúl Castro

http://www.guardian.co.uk/world/2009/aug/02/castro-cuba-usa-diplomatic-relations

We'll talk with US but Cuba stays socialist, insists Raúl Castro

• Scorn for idea president will restore capitalism
• Speech comes amid grim economic news

Cuba 's president, Raúl Castro, has offered to talk to the US and ease half a century of enmity following olive branches from the Obama administration .

Castro said he wanted to respond to Washington's effort to recast diplomatic relations but insisted Cuba's communist system was solid and would not be diluted. "We are ready to talk about everything but not to negotiate our political and social system," he told the national assembly on Saturday.

The 78-year-old leader, who formally succeeded his ailing brother Fidel last year, made the announcement amid grim economic news which will curb spending on health and education, twin pillars of the 50-year-old revolution.

The government warned of further austerity in the wake of hurricane damage and a sputtering economy, a sharp contrast to glimmers of diplomatic detente.

Castro said there was a chance for negotiations now that the White House had toned down Bush-era hostility towards Havana. "It's true there has been a diminution of the aggression and anti-Cuban rhetoric on the part of the administration."

Barack Obama has slightly eased the draconian US embargo against the island, a policy from the Kennedy administration, and made symbolic gestures such as stopping the electronic ticker from the US mission in Havana which used to taunt Cuba's rulers with pro-democracy slogans.

Castro noted however that the embargo remained in effect and he rejected comments by the US secretary of state, Hillary Clinton, linking improved relations with concessions from Havana.

"I have to say, with all due respect to Mrs Clinton ... they didn't elect me president to restore capitalism in Cuba, nor to hand over the revolution. I was elected to defend, maintain and continue perfecting socialism, not destroy it," he said to a standing ovation.

He scorned those who believe the Cuban regime would crumble once he, Fidel and other ageing figures from the revolution died, saying: "If that's how they think, they are doomed to failure."

The US used to look forward to a so-called "poof moment" when the communist system 90 miles off Florida collapsed upon Fidel Castro's death. But when illness sidelined him three years ago his younger brother seamlessly took over.

Raúl Castro has offered to talk to Washington before, but doing so in a national assembly address gave the words added weight. There was no immediate response from the state department.

"What we have here is an important and continuing effort by Raúl to signal that discussions with the US are something he very much wants," said Larry Birns, director of the Council on Hemispheric Affairs thinktank.

"Raúl is conducting himself like someone who wants to be accepted as a serious discussion partner. He has been non-judgmental in his relations with the US and on occasion been relatively warm. From the US viewpoint

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Cuba has been on good behaviour."

The US is the only country in the hemisphere to not have diplomatic ties with Havana, a position many critics consider anachronistic and self-defeating.

Obama has authorised the resumption of talks over migration and disaster preparedness, low-level contacts which were severed during the Bush administration.

European diplomats, and many US commentators, are impatient for bolder moves and call Cuba a "low-hanging fruit" ripe for engagement in contrast to recalcitrant regimes in Iran and North Korea. The Cuban-American community which once lobbied for complete isolation of the Castros is now split, with a new generation urging closer ties with Cuba.

Havana, once a pariah, has returned to the international fold and recently hosted leaders from Latin America, Asia, Russia and the EU.

But that diplomatic shine contrasts with a darkening economy which has seen growth projections for this year slashed form 6% to 1.7%, with even the lower figure considered optimistic.

Castro said the government cut its budget for the second time this year to confront Cuba's worst financial crisis since the "special period" of the 1990s when the end of Soviet Union subsidies left the population close to starvation.

Tropical storms last year caused £6bn worth of damage and since then the global slowdown has hit nickel exports and tourism revenues. "We've been forced to renegotiate debts, payments and other commitments with foreign entities," said the president.

Spending on education and health care, which are free and universal, would be cut, he said, without much elaboration.

Many Cubans grumble that schools and hospitals have already degraded because teachers and doctors prefer to hustle on the parallel economy than work for monthly state salaries of just £12.

Protester outside McCain event ticketed

By Joey Bunch
The Denver Post
Article Last Updated: 07/07/2008 09:04:40 PM MDT

A 60-year-old librarian received a trespassing ticket today after a liberal group's protest outside a John McCain town hall meeting Monday.

Clutching a sign that read "McCain = Bush," Carol Kreck was removed from the atrium at the Denver Center for the Performing Arts by four Denver police officers.

Kreck, a former Denver Post reporter who works part-time as a librarian for an education think tank, said she was removed as she quizzed a police officer about whether he could deny her free speech "on city property" by taking away her sign, while McCain supporters wore buttons inside.

Jenny Schiavone, a spokeswoman for the performing arts center, said the venue is city-owned rental property, but is not legally defined as public property.

The liberal group ProgressNowAction had called before the event and asked about being inside the atrium, she said. The group was told it would have to rent space or use previously designated protest areas along the street, Schiavone said.

Michael Huttner, who organized the rally, said Progress NowAction was not told to rent space or stand anywhere.

A Youtube video of Kreck's removal, posted by Progress NowAction, shows a performing arts center security officer asking Kreck to put down her sign, noting he had asked her and other protestors to do so earlier. In the same video, a police officer tells her she can attend the event if she gets rid of the sign.

A McCain spokesman said no one, including McCain supporters, were allowed to carry signs.

Detective John White, a spokesman for the Denver Police Department, said officers acted as they would for any complaint on private property.

"Our officers received a signed complaint from a security guard at a private event and acted accordingly," he said.

Tom Kise, a spokesman for the McCain campaign, did not know about Kreck's ouster, but said the town hall-style meeting was open to supporters and opponents.

"All the campaign asked for is a respectful dialogue," Kise said.

Pea Pod Protesters at McCain event: Ditch signs or get arrested

By Jason Kosena 07/07/2008 | 5 Comments

Protesters with ProgressNow outside today's John McCain town hall meeting in Denver were told to throw their signs away or risk being arrested for trespassing.

McCain's secret service detail told the Denver Police that if the three protesters, one dressed in a pea costume with pictures of President Bush and McCain on it, were told to shut their protest down about an hour before the campaign event began.

"McCain's secret service has told us we can't exhibit our first amendment rights of free speech," said Michael Huttner, executive director of ProgressNow.

The protesters were not told to leave the premises but were told they couldn't display their signs.

McCain is expected to speak on the economy at today's town hall meeting at the Denver Center for Performing Arts starting today at noon.

Presidential contender John McCain focused on the economy at rowdy town hall meeting in Denver on Monday, where he pledged to make government "a catalyst for growth and good jobs."
"I have a plan to grow this economy, create more and better jobs and get America moving again," the Republican candidate said.
"I have a plan to reform government, achieve energy security, and ensure that health care and a quality education are affordable and available for all."
McCain also pledged to give bigger tax breaks for families with children.
"At a time of increasing gas and food prices, American families need tax relief and I, not my opponent, will deliver it," McCain said in a 30-minute speech before about 325 people at the Denver Center for the Performing Arts.
The Arizona senator took several jabs at Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, the presumed Democratic nominee.
"If you believe you should pay more taxes, I am the wrong candidate for you. Sen. Obama is your man," McCain said. "The choice in this election is stark and simple. Sen. Obama will raise your taxes. I won't."
Several people outside the complex held signs that said "McCain = Bush" and at least one person was asked by security to leave.
The McCain campaign said it does not screen town hall participants. And during the question-and-answer period, the candidate found himself defending his record on various issues, from veterans to immigration. His backers said McCain did great.
"I'd like to see Barack Obama come here and take 20 unscripted questions and see how he does," said former GOP Gov. Bill Owens, who attended the event with son Brett and daughter Monica.
But Colorado Democrats ripped McCain after the meeting.
"It's part of his 'I'm exactly like George Bush — or worse — economic tour,'" said Pat Waak, chairwoman of the Colorado Democratic Party.
"It's the same old stuff he's been talking about. He says he's going to balance the budget but stay in Iraq. How is he going to do that?"
The town hall event began at noon as scheduled with music from the soundtrack of the movie Rudy playing as McCain and his wife, Cindy, entered the room.
Beth Isern of Bethany Manufacturing in Nederland introduced Cindy McCain, who got a laugh when she talked about Denver's weather.
"In the McCain family, rain is good luck," Cindy McCain said.
John McCain referred to Isern in his opening remarks.
"Beth tells me it gets harder every year, not because of the market and competition, but because of government regulations, taxes and the cost of health care," he said. "Beth, I promise you, if I'm elected president, we're going to remove these obstacles to your continued success, and make government a catalyst for growth and good jobs."
McCain also mentioned another Colorado company, Crocs, maker of the funky footwear, in talking about free trade.
"This former small business now employs 600 people in Colorado alone, and sells over 50 percent of its products in 90 countries around the world," McCain said. "Building barriers to Crocs or any American company's access to foreign markets will have a devastating effect on our economy and jobs, and the prosperity of American families.
"I understand free trade is not a positive for everyone. If a worker loses a job we must retrain them and prepare them for 21st century jobs."
McCain's only reference to the president was unflattering.
"Government has grown by 60 percent in the last eight years. That is simply inexcusable," McCain said. "We aren't going to continue mortgaging this country's future for things Americans don't want or need."

No beans about it, the silly season is upon us

By Cara DeGette 07/07/2008

John McCain is coming to Denver today to talk about the economy, and the liberal group Progress Now has vowed not to disappoint, this time by trotting out a giant eight-foot pea pod to deliver a message that when it comes to the economy, McCain and George W. Bush are “two peas in a pod.”

Meanwhile, over the weekend the McCain campaign announced that it has begun to run TV ads — the first major buy of the presidential campaign — questioning Barack Obama's commitment to energy reform. The ads will run in four battleground states, though not in Colorado.

As the WashingtonPost.com’s Chris Cillizza writes in his blog The Fix, this is about how the McCain ad goes:

"Record gas prices, a climate in crisis," says the ad's narrator. "John McCain says solve it now." The spot then details McCain's "balanced" plan on energy and notes that the Arizona Senator is "pushing his own party to face climate change."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Obama, on the other hand, says nothing but "no" when it comes to addressing the energy problems the country is facing. "He just says no to lower gas taxes ... No to nuclear ... No to more production," says the narrator before concluding: "No new solutions. Barack Obama: Just the party line."

The response from the Obama campaign, Cillizza reports, is “stunned skepticism.”

At least they don’t have Obama depicted in the ad as an energy efficient light bulb — or even a wind turbine.

Which brings us back to Progress Now’s planned publicity stunt for today. The guys and gals who’ve brought us nicknames for GOP candidates, including Big Oil Bob (Schaffer), and perpetuated nicknames for others, including Both Ways Bob (Beauprez), is planning its giant Pea Pod Political Theater to coincide with McCain’s visit to Denver.

The idea, according to the group’s executive director Michael Huttner, is to lay claim that, when it comes to economic policy, McCain and Bush are “obviously two peas in a pod.” They also plan to hand out pea pods to people who plan to attend McCain’s town hall meeting, which begins at 10 a.m. at the Denver Center Performing Arts downtown.

"No matter how many green beans you eat, Bush and McCain's economic policies are bad for America," Huttner says, mixing his vegetable metaphors in a press release.

Press Release; February 1, 2014

UABA Statement in support of H. RES. 50 and S. RES. 52 calling for the release of Ukrainian fighter pilot Nadiya Savchenko

On January 26, 2015, Congressional Representatives Mr. Levin, Ms. Kaptur, Mr. Fitzpatrick, Mr. Quigley, and Mr. Pascrell submitted House Resolution H. RES. 50 "Calling for the release of Ukrainian fighter pilot Nadiya Savchenko, who was captured by Russian forces in Eastern Ukraine and has been held illegally in a Russian prison since July 2014." On January 28, 2015, a similar resolution – S. RES. 52 - was introduced in the Senate by Mr. Cardin and Mr. Wicker; both resolutions were referred to the respective Foreign Relations Committees in both chambers of Congress.

The Ukrainian American Bar Association (UABA) strongly urges that these proposed resolutions be expeditiously reviewed and approved in their respective committees, and placed on the floor for a full vote by the Senate and House. Swift and affirmative passage of these resolutions will show the world that the United States stands behind its pronouncements in support of international rule of law and respect for human rights. Speedy adoption of these resolutions will also signal to Russia that its aggression against Ukraine will not go unnoticed, cannot continue, and will be rebuked accordingly by the international community.

Nadiya Savchenko, a former military pilot in the Ukrainian Air Force, serves as a current member of the Parliament of Ukraine, and a Delegate from Ukraine at the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe (PACE).

In the middle of June 2014, she was captured by Russians in the Luhansk region of Ukraine – the area where Russian troops and Russia-supported terrorists and mercenaries are fighting against the Ukrainian army and Ukrainian civilian volunteers. Russians illegally and forcibly transported Savchenko across the border into Russia, with a bag over her head, while handcuffed. In Russia she was falsely accused of, and charged with, the alleged killings of two Russian members of the press. These members of the Russian press appear to have died in shellfire, and not at the hands of Ms. Savchenko as Russian propaganda machine would want the world to believe. According to Ms. Savchenko and her attorneys, not only was Ms. Savchenko nowhere near the area where the two members of the Russian press died, but they actually died AFTER the Russians had captured Savchenko and brought her over to Russia from Ukraine.

Ms. Savchenko is being kept in a Russian prison, undoubtedly on direct orders from Putin, without proof of having committed any of the alleged crimes with which she has been charged, without trial and without due process of any kind. According to her attorneys, Messrs. Mark Feygin, and Nikolai Polozov, Ms. Savchenko has an irrefutable alibi that proves her innocence and the falsity of the Russian charges against her.

She has been held in solitary confinement in prison, with no access to mail. Her two attorneys have had very limited and sporadic access to Ms. Savchenko in prison. Often times her attorneys are not allowed to visit her in prison for several days on end despite repeated requests and attempts.

Putin pays no attention to repeated demands for release by Ms. Savchenko's attorneys, or by various organizations. Attorney Feygin has recently published his open letter to Putin online, appealing to reason and demanding that Putin release Nadiya Savchenko. The US Department of State has twice called on Russia to release Ms. Savchenko. Memorial Human Rights Center has declared her to be a political prisoner in Russia. PACE has demanded that Savchenko be released. Needless to say, Ms. Savchenko is still in prison. It is clear that Putin is keeping Savchenko imprisoned as his bargaining chip in his negotiations with the West.

In protest against her unlawful and groundless detention while Putin ignores International calls for her release, Ms. Savchenko began a hunger strike in prison on December 13, 2014.

Ms. Savchenko has continued her hunger strike for over 50 days now and is in poor, rapidly deteriorating health. She has lost catastrophic and life-threatening weight. According to her attorneys, she is facing a virtually certain death in prison very soon, if she is not released from detention immediately. She shows no desire to stop her hunger strike protest against her unlawful detention. Putin will not release her from detention until he has obtained some concessions from Europe.

PACE issued emergency request to release Ms. Savchenko, a PACE Delegate from Ukraine who has diplomatic immunity, in order for her to participate in the PACE session that started this week. On January 28, 2015, PACE issued a resolution to free Savchenko, within 24 hours, and to return her to Ukraine, or to hand her over to a third country.

Putin continues to ignore PACE. The Russian delegation at PACE, however, hinted at a possibility of Savchenko's release in exchange for reactivation of Russia's voting rights at PACE, which were stripped from it on January 28, 2015 pursuant to PACE's resolution of the same date. Russia went as far as demanding the removal of all of the Council of Europe's sanctions against Russia in exchange for Savchenko's release. These demands by Russia demonstrate that the real reason for detention of Ms. Savchenko is as a bargaining chip by Putin in his negotiations with Europe.

Last week, the Russian Federal Security Service (the FSB) initiated yet another trumped-up charge against Savchenko. The new charge alleges Ms. Savchenko illegally crossed the Ukraine-Russia border. Please note, as mentioned above, that Nadiya Savchenko was kidnapped by Russians in Ukraine, and was transported across the border into Russia by force with a bag over her head. This is yet another attempt by Putin to ensure that Ms. Savchenko will continue to be detained, perhaps realizing that the original false charges against her that were probably concocted in a haste and cannot stand up to scrutiny in light of the timing of the alleged offense and Savchenko's strong alibi defense to the original charges.

Please make no mistake that it is Putin, and he alone, who decides the fate of Nadiya Savchenko, not a Russian court. Thus, the only way Savchenko may be released from the Russian prison is if Putin decides to release her. Putin's pocket courts in Russia have no say in the matter. Presumption of innocence does not travel very far in Russia. The only way Putin may be forced to relent in his unlawful detention of Savchenko, will be if extreme pressure and condemnation is put on him by the civilized world and the international community as a whole.

The US Congress must forcefully denounce Putin's unlawful detention of Nadiya Savchenko by passage of H. RES. 50 and S. RES. 52. We urge you and every progressive citizen of the world to take a stand against Putin by demanding the immediate release of Nadiya Savchenko.

The United States of America, its European allies, and the international community must stand up together to Putin's tyranny. He must be made aware that there is a heavy cost associated with keeping innocent victims as political prisoners for his own gains. We must not remain silent. We must achieve the immediate release of Nadiya Savchenko.

Subject: Rick Perry announcement speech

Friends,

I wanted to flag Rick Perry's announcement speech. Admittedly, he reminds us throughout the speech that he is extremely conservative. However, I was struck by his talk on the economy. Similar messages & themes.

Thank you. I was born five years after the end of a global war that killed more than 60 million people.

I am the son of a veteran of that war, who flew 35 missions over war-torn Europe as a tail gunner on a B-17.

When dad returned home, he married mom, and they started a life together.

They were tenant farmers.

They were raised during a time of great hardship, and had little expectation beyond living in peace, putting a roof over our heads and putting food on our table.

Home was a place called Paint Creek. Too small to be called a town, but it was the center of my universe.

For years we had an outhouse, and mom bathed us in a number two washtub on the back porch. She also hand-sewed my clothes until I went off to college.

I attended Paint Creek Rural School, grades one through 12. I played 6-man football. I was a member of Boy Scout Troop 48, became an Eagle Scout, and went off to Texas A&M where I was a member of the Corps of Cadets and an animal science major.

I was proud to wear the uniform of our country as an Air Force officer and aircraft commander.

After serving, I returned home to the rolling plains and big skies of West Texas, and I returned to farming.

There is no person on earth more optimistic than a dryland cotton farmer. We always know a good rain is just around the corner, no matter how long we'd been waiting.

The values learned on my family's cotton farm are timeless: the dignity of work, the integrity of your word, responsibility to community, the unbreakable bonds of family, and duty to country.

These are enduring values. Not the product of some idyllic past, but a touchstone of American life in our small towns, our largest cities, our booming suburbs.

I have seen American life from the red dirt of a West Texas cotton field, from a campus in College Station, from the elevated view of a C-130 cockpit, and from the Governor's office of the Texas Capitol.

I served a small rural community in the Texas Legislature, and I led the world's 12th largest economy.

I know that America has experienced great change, but what it means to be an American has never changed: we are the only nation in the world founded on the power of an idea that all "are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable Rights, that among these are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness."

Our rights come from God, not from government, and our people are not the subjects of government, but instead government is subject to the people.

It has always been the case that there has been a social compact between one generation of Americans and the next: to pass along an inheritance of a stronger country full of greater promise and possibility.

And that social compact has been protected at great sacrifice. This was never more clear to me than when

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I took my father to the American cemetery that overlooks the bluffs at Omaha beach.

On that peaceful, wind-swept setting, there lie 9,000 graves, including 45 pairs of brothers, 33 of whom are buried side by side, a father and a son, two sons of a president. They all traded their future for ours in a final act of loving sacrifice.

In that American Cemetery, it is no accident each headstone faces west: west over the Atlantic, towards the nation they defended, the nation they loved, the nation they would never come home to.

It struck me as I stood in the midst of those heroes that they look upon us in silent judgment. And that we must ask ourselves: are we worthy of their sacrifice?

The truth is we are at the end of an era of failed leadership.

We have been led by a divider who has sliced and diced the electorate, pitting American against American for political purposes.

Six years into the so-called recovery, and our economy is barely growing. This winter, it actually got smaller.

Our economic slowdown is not inevitable, it is the direct result of bad economic policy.

The president's tax and regulatory policies have slammed shut the door of opportunity for the average American trying to climb the economic ladder, resigning the middle class to stagnant wages, personal debt, and deferred dreams.

Weakness at home has led to weakness abroad.

The world has descended into a chaos of this president's own making, while his White House loyalists construct an alternative universe where ISIS is contained and Ramadi is merely a "setback" – where the nature of the enemy can't be acknowledged for fear of causing offense, where the world's largest state sponsor of terrorism, the Islamic Republic of Iran, can be trusted to live up to a nuclear agreement.

No decision has done more harm than the president's withdrawal of American troops from Iraq.

Let no one be mistaken, leaders of both parties have made grave mistakes in Iraq. But in January, 2009 – when Barack Obama became Commander-in-Chief – Iraq had been largely pacified.

America had won the war. But our president failed to secure the peace.

How callous it seems now as cities once secured with American blood are now being taken by America's enemies, all because of a campaign slogan.

I saw during Vietnam a war where politicians didn't keep faith with the sacrifices and courage of America's fighting men and women, where men were ordered into combat without the full support of their civilian commanders.

To see it happen again, 40 years later, because of political gamesmanship and dishonesty, is a national disgrace.

But my friends, we are a resilient country. We have been through a Civil War, we've been through two world wars, we've made it through a Great Depression – we even made it through Jimmy Carter. We will make it through the Obama years.

The fundamental nature of this country is our people never stay knocked down. We get back up, we dust ourselves off, and we move forward. And we will again.

I want to share some important truths with my fellow Americans, starting with this truth: we don't have to settle for a world in chaos or an America that shrinks from its responsibilities.

We don't have to apologize for American exceptionalism, or western values.

We don't have to accept slow growth that leaves behind the middle class, and leaves millions of Americans out of work.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

We don't have to settle for crumbling bureaucracies that target taxpayers and harm our veterans.

And we don't have to resign ourselves to debt, decay and slow growth.

We have the power to make things new again. To project American strength again, to get our economy going again.

And that is why today I am running for the presidency of the United States of America.

It is time to create real jobs, to raise wages, to create opportunity for all. To give every citizen a stake in this country. To restore hope, real hope to forgotten Americans, millions of middle class families who have given up hope of getting ahead, millions of workers who have given up hope of finding a job.

Yes, it's time for a reset, time to reset the relationship between government and citizen.

Think of the arrogance of Washington, DC, representing itself as some beacon of wisdom, with policies smothering this vast land with no regard for what makes each state and community unique. That's just wrong.

We need to return power to the states, and freedom to the individual.

Today our citizens and entrepreneurs are burdened by over-regulation and unspeakable debt.

Debt is not just a fiscal nightmare, it is a moral failure. Let me speak to the millennial generation: massive debt, passed on from our generation to yours, is a breaking of the social compact.

You deserve better. I am going to offer a responsible plan to fix the entitlement system, and to stop this theft from your generation.

To those forgotten Americans drowning in personal debt, working harder for wages that don't keep up with the rising cost of living, I come here today to say your voice is heard.

I know you face rising health care costs, rising child care costs, skyrocketing tuition costs, and mounting student loan debt. I hear you, and I am going to do something about it.

To the one in five children in families on food stamps, to the one in seven Americans living in poverty, to the one in ten workers who are unemployed, under-employed or given up hope of finding a job: I hear you, you are not forgotten.

I am running to be your president.

For small businesses on Main Street struggling to just get by, smothered by regulations, targeted by Dodd-Frank: I hear you, you're not forgotten. Your time is coming.

The American People see a rigged game, where insiders get rich, and the middle class pays the tab.

There is something wrong when the Dow is near record highs, and businesses on Main Street can't even get a loan.

Since when did capitalism involve the elimination of risk for the biggest banks while regulations strangle our community banks?

Capitalism is not corporatism. It is not a guarantee of reward without risk. It is not about Wall Street at the expense of Main Street.

The reason I am running for president is I know for certain our country's best days lie ahead. There is nothing wrong in America today that cannot be fixed with new leadership.

We are just a few good decisions away from unleashing economic growth, and reviving the American Dream.

We need to fix a tax code riddled with loopholes that sends jobs overseas and punishes success.

We have the highest corporate tax rate in the western world. It is time to reduce the rate, bring jobs home and lift wages for working families.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By the time this Administration has finished with its experiment in big government, they will have added more than 600,000 pages of new regulations to the Federal Register.

On my first day in office, I will issue an immediate freeze on all pending regulations from the Obama administration. That same day, I will send to Congress a comprehensive reform and rollback of job-killing mandates created by Obamacare, Dodd-Frank and other Obama-era policies.

Agencies will have to live under strict regulatory budgets. And health insurers will have to earn the right to your money, instead of lobbying Washington to force you to hand it over.

On day one, I will also sign an executive order approving the construction of the Keystone Pipeline.

Energy is vital to our economy, and to our national security. On day one, I will sign an executive order authorizing the export of American natural gas and oil, freeing our European allies from dependence on Russia's energy supplies.

Vladimir Putin uses energy to hold our allies hostage. If energy is going to be used as a weapon, I say America must have the largest arsenal.

We will unleash an era of economic growth, and limitless opportunity. We will rebuild American industry. And we will lift wages for American workers.

It can be done because it has been done in Texas.

During my 14 years as governor, Texas companies created almost one-third of all new American jobs.

In the last seven years of my tenure, Texas created 1.5 million new jobs. Without Texas, America would have lost 400,000 jobs.

We were the engine of growth because we had a simple formula: control taxes and spending, implement smart regulations, invest in an educated workforce, and stop frivolous lawsuits.

Texas now has the second highest high school graduation rate in the country and the highest graduation rates for African-American and Hispanic students.

We led the nation in exports, including high-tech exports. We passed historic tax relief, and I was proud to sign balanced budgets for 14 years.

We not only created opportunity, we stood for law and order.

When there was a crisis at our border last year and the president refused my invitation to see the challenge that we faced, I told him, "Mr. President, if you won't secure the border, Texas will."

Because of the threat posed by drug cartels and trans-national gangs, I deployed the Texas National Guard.

The policy worked. Apprehensions declined by 74 percent. If you elect me your president,
I will secure this border.

Homeland security begins with border security. The most basic compact between a president and the people is to keep the country safe.

The great lesson of history is strength and resolve bring peace and order, and weakness and vacillation invite chaos and conflict.

My very first act as president will be to rescind any agreement with Iran that legitimizes their quest to get a nuclear weapon.

Now is the time for clear-sighted, proven leadership. We have seen what happens when we elect a president based on media acclaim rather than a record of accomplishment.

This will be a "show-me, don't tell me" election, where voters look past the rhetoric to the real record.

The question of every candidate will be this one: when have you led? Leadership is not a speech on the senate floor, it's not what you say, it's what you do.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And we will not find the kind of leadership needed to revitalize the country by looking to the political class in Washington.

I have been tested. I have led the most successful state in America. I have dealt with crisis after crisis – from the disintegration of a space shuttle, to Hurricanes Katrina, Rita and Ike, to the crisis at the border, and the first diagnosis of Ebola in America.

I have brought together first responders, charities and people of faith to house and heal vulnerable citizens dealing with tragedy.

The spirit of compassion demonstrated by Texans is alive all across America today. While we have experienced a deficit in leadership, among the American People there is a surplus of spirit.

And among our great people, there is a spirit of selflessness – that we live to make the world better for our children, and not just ourselves.

It was said that when King George the Third asked what General Washington would do upon winning the war, he was told he would return to his farm and relinquish power. To that, the monarch replied, if he did that, he would be the greatest man of his age.

George Washington lived in the service of a cause greater than self.

If anyone is wondering if America still possesses the character of selfless heroes, I am here to say, "Yes, I am surrounded by such heroes."

They are of different generations, but they are woven together by the same thread of selfless sacrifice.

They are heroes like Medal of Honor Recipient Mike Thornton, who survived an ambush by enemy forces in Vietnam, and made it back to the safety of a water rescue, only to find out a fellow team member had been left behind, presumed dead.

He didn't leave though, he returned through enemy fire and retrieved Lieutenant Norris who was still alive – and then swam for two hours keeping his wounded teammate afloat until they were rescued.

Heroes like Marcus Luttrell, who survived a savage attack on the side of a mountain in Afghanistan, losing his three teammates and 16 fellow warriors shot down trying to rescue him.

He is not just the lone survivor, to Anita and me he is a second son.

And Taya Kyle, who suffered the deep loss of her husband Chris, an American hero. When I think of Taya Kyle, I think of a brave woman who carries not just the lofty burden of Chris' legacy, but the grief of every family who has lost a loved one to the great tragedy of war, or its difficult aftermath. Anita and I want to thank her for her tremendous courage.

America is an extraordinary country. Our greatness lies not in our government, but in our people.

Each day Americans demonstrate tremendous courage. But many of those Americans have been knocked down and are looking for a second chance.

Let's give them that chance. Let's give them real leadership. Let's give them a future greater than the greatest days of our past.

Let's give them a president who leads us in the direction of our highest hopes, our best dreams and our greatest promise.

Thank you, and God bless you.

Dear Mr. Podesta,

I am contacting you with a somewhat unusual request and the hope that you might be able to convey this wish by my children to an appropriate staff person for President Obama in spite of the short notice.

Thank you. And thank you so much for the work you have been doing. I hope you are able to encourage Hillary Clinton to come out strongly to address dangers from Climate Change.

Sincerely,
Pam Vergun, Ph.D., M.P.A.

Dear Mr. President,

I hear that you are coming to our hometown of Beaverton tomorrow down the street from where my children were in a two-way Spanish immersion public school. I know this is a long shot, but I would like to tell you about the work my children and I are doing to help you stop Climate Change in case you would like to meet them.

Also, months ago, my son, who is also one of your fans, asked me to invite you to his Bar Mitzvah. Although we just learned that you will only be in Beaverton during the morning, I'm sure you would like Isaac's D'Var teaching will be on taking even more serious action on Climate Change.

My son is African-American, my daughter was born in the Marshall Islands, and my husband and I are European-American, and together we are doing all we can to impact policies especially the ones most needed to protect our planet. My son has been talking with the City of Beaverton about his petition to Mayor Doyle regarding fossil fuels and nuclear power. The links below are to the little websites I made for their Mitzvah projects, so Miko and Isaac can speak for themselves. I also missed SEAB, but John says it was a very good meeting. Feel like getting back to SEAB? Would love to have you.

One frustration following your departure has been the painful process of getting QER converged. The principal conclusion/recommendations are little changed from the meeting you were in at Jeff's office late January. We miss having you as a closer. We are pissing away an opportunity for a little bipartisan work with Congress as they have grown tired of waiting. On the plus side, we did get the defense nuclear waste out. Cheers.

Subject: Sandy Berger in Politico on a policy to defeat both ISIL and Iran

Hello,

We thought you would be interested in the op-ed that Sandy published today in Politico along with Stephen Hadley, James Jeffrey, Dennis Ross, and Robert Satloff. It addresses threats to the state system in the Middle East from ISIS and Iran, and a U.S. strategy to preserve it.

Below is the link to the article, as well as the full text.

Link: http://www.politico.com/magazine/story/2015/05/a-policy-to-defeat-both-isil-and-iran-118299.html#.VWVHXib3bCR

A Policy to Defeat Both ISIL and Iran
By SAMUEL BERGER, STEPHEN HADLEY, JAMES JEFFREY, DENNIS ROSS and ROBERT SATLOFF

The Middle East today is consumed by conflict, driven primarily by struggles over identity and interest. Individually, these struggles threaten the survival of states across the region, including Syria, Iraq and Yemen. Collectively, they risk the collapse of the entire Middle East state system.

This distant phenomenon has direct impact on U.S. interests. The weaker the states in the Middle East become, the easier it is for terrorist groups and terrorist-supporting states to plan, recruit and operate against the U.S. and its partners. Should this loss of control continue, the U.S. more and more will be forced to contend with plots against not just its friends but also against the American homeland.

There are two main external threats to the Middle East state system. The Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant, also known as ISIS or the Islamic State, embodies the most direct threat, particularly with its declaration of a caliphate designed to replace existing states. The Islamic Republic of Iran also constitutes a threat, perhaps not as blatant in its assault but no less real. It uses its militia proxies to undermine states and deny them authority throughout their territory, a process that has already given Tehran leverage over four Arab capitals — Baghdad, Damascus, Beirut and Sanaa.

Compounding these two challenges are profound governance issues — from political leadership to economic management, from social inequities to educational development. These could threaten even the most homogeneous states in the region, such as Egypt. A comprehensive U.S. strategy that addresses the external threats will give the United States greater leverage to focus effectively on these internal problems.
On ISIL, President Barack Obama has made clear that the challenge is more than a military one, although providing military support to governments fighting ISIL on the ground is critical. But military action is only one dimension; ISIL cannot be defeated unless it is also discredited. Only Muslims can undermine ISIL's fanatical ideology, and they must take the lead in doing so. Ultimately, U.S. strategy depends on inflicting setbacks on ISIL while building a broad coalition of partners in support of Arab-based efforts to defeat it. The loss of Ramadi, the capital of Iraq's Anbar province, underscores the enormity and the urgency of this challenge.

Some see such a coalition as offering the possibility of bringing the Iranians and the Saudis together in their common enmity toward ISIL. Although the traditional view that "the enemy of my enemy is my friend" might apply to Sunni readiness to cooperate covertly with Israel, it does not work for the Saudis, Emiratis, Bahrainis and others when it comes to the Iranians. They see their struggle against Iran in existential terms, and the more the Iranians seem to be intent on encircling Saudi Arabia, the more the Saudis and other Arabs will position themselves to counter Tehran. This objective is so fundamental to them that Saudi Arabia, Egypt and others have now agreed to mobilize an Arab force — not to fight Israel but to counter Iran-backed militias and, perhaps, jihadi forces.

We, too, have to judge the Iranians based on their behavior. Iran will surely fight to prevent ISIL's domination in Syria and Iraq, an arena in which our objectives converge and our operations may sometimes run in parallel. But while tactical points of convergence are possible, the Iranian strategic view of the region is fundamentally at odds with ours.

Perhaps this outlook could be different if economic integration with the outside world and internal aspirations cause Iran to alter its strategic objectives in the region. But we need to judge Iran on how it acts.

The most powerful elements in Iran today still see the United States as their enemy. This is not simply because of a conspiratorial mind-set about American determination to subvert the Islamic Republic, but also because they see America as the main impediment to their domination of the region. Even if the U.S. seeks to reassure them about its aims, they are highly unlikely to believe it unless the U.S. is prepared to acquiesce in their regional hegemony. The combination of their interest in weakening the state structures of their Sunni adversaries and the belief of our traditional friends that they are locked in an existential conflict with Iran should give us pause about partnering with the Iranians and the Iran-backed Shiite militias in the fight against ISIL.

Ultimately, if the U.S. hopes to mobilize Sunni Arab populations of Iraq and Syria in opposition to ISIL — an essential element to marginalizing it — Iran cannot be seen as a presumed ally. That would pre-empt any serious Sunni effort to delegitimize ISIL, put the Sunni states on the defensive and, worst of all, increase the prospect that ISIL will present itself as the only real protector of the Sunnis.

To be sure, the Saudis have a history of playing a negative role in proselytizing the ideology of Sunni extremism. Today, however, they recognize they have a stake in combating its most radical elements. And unlike the Iranians, the Saudis also see the danger of undermining the state system in the Middle East.

While Iran cannot be a partner in discrediting ISIL, a comprehensive nuclear agreement with Iran, nonetheless, could make sense if it allows Iran a peaceful nuclear energy program but denies it the capability of becoming a nuclear weapons state. Every conflict that Iran touches today would be much more difficult and more dangerous in the future should Iran acquire a nuclear weapons capability.

An agreement, however, would feed Saudi and other Arab concerns about the Iranian threat and require that the U.S. manage their reactions and invest in reassuring them. This needs to include pushing back on Iran throughout the region. Ironically, if the Iranian leadership sees that the U.S. will raise the cost of Iran's aggressive behaviors even while remaining open to opportunities, this may make cooperation with Iran on specific issues more likely; perhaps, over time, it will even alter Iran's political calculation.

Here, a change in American policy toward Syria is critical. The administration has understood that ISIL cannot have a safe haven in Syria if the U.S. is to be able, in time, to defeat it in Iraq. But the Assad regime is exploiting American attacks on ISIL and often carries out dramatically more bombing runs against its non-ISIL opposition than the U.S. conducts against ISIL.

To restore U.S. credibility and make it possible to build a more cohesive opposition that could change the balance of power on the ground, there needs to be a different kind of safe haven inside Syria — one that would make it possible to house refugees inside the country and to allow a legitimate, credible opposition to become more politically and militarily relevant within the country.

The ultimate aim is to make a political settlement possible by showing that Assad cannot win. Assad's backers, especially Iran, will surely hate this and could choose to react. But the Iranians need to see that the U.S. will compete and that the costs for them will only go up without a political settlement.

With vanishing borders, a tangled web of transitory alliances and transnational groups — both Sunni and Shiite — operating outside the constraints of state power, the Middle East state system is under relentless pressure. A strategy to preserve it requires a long-term vision for shoring up U.S. allies, rolling back ISIL and countering the Iranians. The United States will not define the future for the region, but it has a distinct national interest in preventing the collapse of its state system.

Samuel Berger, Stephen Hadley, James Jeffrey, Dennis Ross and Robert Satloff are co-authors of a new Washington Institute report, "Key Elements of a Strategy for the United States in the Middle East ."

Title: "Serious cooperation on issues like food security, climate change, and environmental preservation serves all of our interests"

Food Chain Reaction put the fate of the world's food supply on the shoulders of 65 private and public sector leaders. The players were transported to the year 2020 and a burgeoning global food security crisis. Over the course of two days, they collaborated, negotiated, and played out how the world would respond over the next ten years. The biggest takeaway was how their individual decisions could set off a chain reaction of effects in halls of government, boardrooms and communities around the globe.

But in reality, food security is no game. The players were passionate about how they will carry forward the lessons they learned through the game to real life. That call to action was echoed in a keynote address by John D. Podesta, founder of the Center for American Progress, one of the partners responsible for Food Chain Reaction. His remarks energized players, reminded them of the urgency to find solutions, and encouraged them to continue to find innovative ways to solve this critical global issue.

Remarks by John D. Podesta, as delivered
November 10, 2015 | Washington, DC

It is really a pleasure to be here.

First, I want to thank you all for joining the Food Chain Reaction and giving us two full days of your time, your attention, and your expertise. We know how busy you all are – you've come from all parts of the world to do this – and the fact that you've all come here demonstrates the importance of the issues you've grappled with over the course of the game.

I'd like to thank the people who worked so hard to make this event happen. This exercise was the product of a remarkable collaboration by experts across a really diverse coalition of organizations – including the World Wildlife Fund, CNA, Cargill, Mars, of course the Center for American Progress, and many others who came together to put this on. CAP's first effort at gaging the effects of climate change started in 2008 when we brought together again a similar collaboration to think about the direct effects of climate change and what policy needed to change, both here in the United States and globally. I think it had a direct impact, I can say that as someone who ran President Obama's transition, and many of the people who participated in that game have had a role in participating in the Obama Administration. I think the teachings, the learnings, the experience gave them the ability to really contemplate these global scenarios – a really important step in being able to plan and move policy forward. Indeed, I think the accomplished and diverse group of people gathered here tonight is a testament to the growing importance of the food security as a challenge for policymakers worldwide.

You spent your time grappling over the last couple of days with crises that the world is already confronting, and likely to be more frequent, and potentially more devastating, as I'm sure you experienced. The cascading crisis in our global food supply chain: water shortages, food scarcity, price disruptions, all combined with population growth and political instability— these are the ruptures that can truly shake societies and governments.

So let me be clear, social disruptions can be traced directly to at least the acceleration that comes from climate change. Globally, 9 of the 10 warmest years on record have occurred this century. July was the hottest month in what has so far been Earth's hottest year on record. I don't need to explain to the people in this room how the added stress of climate change will come to bear on our global agricultural system, on our stressed out oceans, and on the billions of people they support.

Here in the United States, we lost 9 million acres to wildfires this year alone. In the past 3 decades, ocean acidification has cut in half the number of corals covering the Great Barrier Reef. I could go on and on. The scientific news just keeps pouring in.

This week, the World Meteorological Organization reported that average levels of carbon dioxide exceeded 400 parts per million in early 2015. That's an increase of 43 percent over pre-industrial levels. Again, in the spring as the Northern forest began to take some of that carbon, it dipped below 400 parts per million, but they are fully expecting that coming into the new year we will see the carbon dioxide levels in the atmosphere exceed 400 parts per million and stay there.

In a separate report just hours later, the Met Office and Climatic Research Unit at Britain's University of East Anglia reported that the Earth's average temperature has crossed the symbolically important 1-degree Celsius warming mark, with temperatures over the first nine months of 2015 surpassing historic norms by exactly 1.02 degrees Celsius. I think these reports only compound the evidence that 2015 is almost certain to surpass 2014 as the hottest year in recorded history.

Dramatic changes in weather patterns are often associated with immediate consequences, particularly when extreme weather events are compounded by poor governance and poor policy choices. Political instability, social unrest, and in extreme cases armed conflict, as you grappled with, these secondary and tertiary impacts are really devastating.

Extreme weather events force farmers large and small to adapt their techniques and their crops. Declining fisheries exacerbate already-increasing tensions in maritime trade. Washed-out roads prevent movement of people and goods. Armed conflict destroys critical infrastructure. These changes lead to food scarcity or sudden and unsustainable price increases. And that's why we call it the Food Chain Reaction.

In 2010 and 2011, we saw what could be just the future that is coming for us. We saw the impacts of climate change, of environmental degradation, and political instability converge. As many of you will remember, a series of cataclysmic weather events drove the price of wheat from $4 to $9 a bushel in less than a year. Record rainfall in Canada, the world's second-largest wheat exporter, cut the country's harvest by nearly a quarter.

Drought and brushfires in Russia, Ukraine, and Kazakhstan cut those countries' wheat production by a third. The U.S., Australian, Argentinean and Chinese crops were also damaged by drought and storms.

But when the Arab Spring Awakening began, few people asked the question—isn't it strange that these social uprisings are happening just at the moment that the world food prices hit record highs?

But, in hindsight we can appreciate that the Arab awakening was driven not only by political and economic factors, but by environmental, migratory and climate stressors as well. If we continue to focus only on the former, that is the political factors, and not the latter, the environmental factors, that lead to mass migration, that lead to environmental degradation, that lead to food insecurity, we will never be able to effectively stabilize societies in crisis.

So I hope that this game has underlined those core points and perhaps clarified some new issues for further study. That is why we are here. There is a simple reason: We have to begin to prepare for the inevitable next crisis. When disaster strikes the people gathered in this room tonight will have critical roles to play as leaders and decision-makers.

I believe that in most crises there is opportunity. Hopefully this simulation has shown that, too. That cooperation can overcome conflict.

Now, the past decade has been a tough one for multilateralism. From the wars in Iraq and Syria to the slow pace of climate negotiations, multilateralism and global cooperation can sometimes seem out of reach.

But over the past two days, in this exercise, we saw the risks we face when nations go it alone, and the effort to secure resources becomes competitive rather than cooperative. We also saw the benefits we all accrue when we come together to build a more effective response and more cooperation.

So as we approach the new climate negotiations in Paris, I have hope that our leaders finally recognize that cooperation is indeed imperative. We have achieved success in the past – 15 years ago the world's nations came together to create the millennium development goals, which had a set a hugely ambitious targets to improve humanity the world over.

We didn't achieve all of these goals and we didn't achieve them in all places, but we made a big difference by working together. The rate of people living in extreme poverty was cut in half 5 years ahead of the 2015 deadline, mainly thanks to efforts of China, India, and Brazil. The world is also on track to halve the proportion of people who suffer from hunger this year.

The debate about the Millennium Development Goals proved that multilateralism can reshape our world for the better. I had the privilege to help shape the "first draft" of the Post-2015 Sustainable Development Agenda. As Marcia noted, I served on the Secretary General's high-level panel that spent over a year in an intensely consultative process listening to people from around the globe, particularly very poor people, young people, and learning about their aspirations for a new set of global goals. And I can tell you with absolute conviction that the opportunity for real progress on these issues is still there, and the multilateral ideal is alive and well.

I had the privilege of working with Paula Caballero who worked in that enterprise, and I think she would agree with my assessment from what we saw in the high level panel. But more importantly, what we saw in September when Pope Francis kicked off the new SDG special meeting of the UN General Assembly and the new SDG's were approved by a unanimous vote of the United National General Assembly.

At their core, the new SDG's call for a new global partnership with a commitment to ending poverty, within a framework of sustainability. The goals established global commitments, leaving no one behind, particularly women and girls – thank you Kathleen for raising that.

I think that everyone can see themselves and their efforts in these universal goals, from a young child, to a farmer, to a street vendor, to a business owner, to the President of the United States. That ideal, building a new global partnership, will again be put to the test in just a few weeks when the world gathers in Paris to negotiate a new global climate deal. The deal that must help address many of the challenges you have faced in this simulation over these past two days. I think these enterprises at the international level really link.

In order to build the kind of resilience that we are going to need, that you discussed over the past two days, we need to focus on the goals that are embedded in the SDG's and build new forms of sustainable economies, but we also need to tackle the climate challenge. Paris is obviously the moment when the world could come together to do that, to negotiate that new global climate deal, a deal that must help address these challenges.

We have not yet crossed the finish line on a global climate agreement. But there have been some big diplomatic breakthroughs that make me optimistic about the prospects for success in Paris, the foremost being the U.S.-China joint announcement of mutual action and emission reduction, which galvanized the commitment to put forward ambitious INDC's. China committed to deploy an additional 800-1,000 gigawatts of nuclear, wind, solar, and other zero emission generation capacity by 2030. That's a lot of clean energy – equivalent to total current electricity generation capacity in the United States. The U.S. pledged to double the pace of its GHG reductions and keep on a path to deep de-carbonization by midcentury, which as I understand it, what the group agreed to at the end of the fourth turn of this game.

But as we know, reducing emissions won't be enough. We need to ensure that resilience and adaptations are also key pillars of the agreement in Paris. Without focusing on how climate change and environmental degradation will impact the livelihoods of the most vulnerable, we're completely ignoring the full scope of the challenge. So as world leaders gather in Paris, they must build an agreement that reflects both of those 21st century realities.

First, all of the world's major polluters must act to cut their baseline greenhouse gas emissions, and at the same time they must stay focused on helping the most vulnerable. We must not only help them weather the impacts of climate change, but we must help them martial resources to build, as I noted, sustainable, resilient economies for the future that are inclusive. That bring in the extreme core that connect them to the societies, to the politics, and to the economies of their countries.

Such an agreement is achievable, but we cannot fall back on old habits that pit region against region, North against South, or rich against poor.

There will invariably be moments of frustration, brinkmanship, and even crisis. That is how such talks always seem to go when there is a great deal at stake. I would only urge that in those moments, negotiators of the countries that will attend the meeting in Paris remember that billions of people around the globe are looking to them to work in a spirit of collaboration, cooperation, and partnership to shape the world we all want—for our children, our economies, and our societies.

Put simply: we can't afford to wait, we can't afford finger pointing, and we can't afford half measures.

You've seen over the past few days the potential for decisions by big players to interact in unanticipated ways. And you've seen how the negative impacts often fall upon the most vulnerable. The Africa team has seen the importance of increasing its influence in the global policy arena. The United States, Europe and India have proven that they can successfully cooperate when it comes to increasing research and establishing funding streams to address pressing issues, put a price on carbon.

The last two days have also shown that although traditional security challenges that we face today will not disappear, the Cold War-era thinking will not provide the solutions that we so desperately need. By broadening the discourse over what constitutes "security," we will diminish distrust between countries and mobilize powerful civic and corporate partnerships.

Perhaps this seems Pollyannaish in today's context, but I hope you will all take away the belief that serious cooperation on issues like food security, climate change, climate security, and environmental preservation serves all of our interests across the globe. Providing safe, affordable food supplies to a growing population is of course not a new problem, but it's never been more challenging than it is today. Population growth, rapid urbanization, eroding infrastructure, climate change, extreme weather, ocean degradation, ocean acidification, new strains of crop disease, political instability and conflict are only making it more difficult for us to feed the world, in particular our most vulnerable.

If we focus on the challenges of human security, livelihood protection, and sustainable development, I believe we all stand to benefit greatly. If we can revise our traditional conceptions of security to more reflect the world we live in today, we can hope to mobilize greater resources in times of crisis. And if we work together to address the root causes of conflict and instability, we just might be able to insulate the most vulnerable states and societies against these threats.

As I spoke with some of you after the game, I heard a lot of great ideas. Molly already went through some of them. I particularly like that "blue sky science" model – that's a particular passion of mine. Some were focused on improving or better-resourcing our existing multilateral framework for addressing these issues. Some put forward ideas for entirely new institutions meant to fill existing gaps. Some put forward ideas about how we resource challenge in front of us. That is, produce the funds necessary to make the right investments and produce those sustainable economies.

Here is what I'm going to ask all of you: Take them home with you. Keep working on those ideas and expanding them. Talk about this exercise and the lessons you learned from it. And keep talking to each other – I hope this is the beginning of a great global food security network. All of our work is strengthened by maintaining these ties and continuing to work outside and across our areas of expertise.

So with that: thank you all for gaming with us. Thank you all very much for your time, your expertise, and your contributions. Most of all, thank you for your commitment to solving what will be the future generations' most important security challenge. Thank you for taking these two days and taking time to do something I couldn't think of as more important than the enterprise of ideas and the solutions that you hopefully have been able to map out in your two days. Thank you very much.

Is Europe's Foreign Policy Under Threat from its Economic Dependence?

Hans Kundnani January 26, 2016

BERLIN—As Europe struggles to deal with the refugee crisis, it seems like a long time ago that Greek Prime Minister Alexis Tsipras threatened to undermine EU sanctions against Russia. His flirtation with Russian President Vladimir Putin last year was widely seen as a way for Greece to increase its leverage in negotiations with its eurozone partners and the International Monetary Fund, which were reaching a critical stage in the spring. In the end, a deal was struck in the summer that prevented a default and allowed Greece to remain in the single currency, though it is unlikely to do much to solve Greece's deeper economic problems — and Greece remained supportive of European policy toward Russia.

However, as I argue in a new GMF policy brief , the situation of an EU member state seeking external help — or coming under external pressure to undermine an EU policy — is likely to recur in the future. Long-term changes in the structure of global trade are transforming the economic basis of the EU's external relations. In particular, for nearly all EU member states, trade with other member states is decreasing as a share of total trade. Intra-EU exports have declined as a share of the EU's overall exports from 68 percent in 2000 to 63 percent in 2014. This shift away from intra-EU trade raises difficult questions about the future of European integration...

LAST NIGHT'S EVENING NEWS

CBS and ABC did not report on 2016 issues. NBC reported that Donald Trump filed his FEC report; says it was "difficult" because, his campaign reports, the forms are not meant for someone of his "massive wealth," and that forms left many questions answered but stated in all caps that he's worth $10 billion. His campaign said Trump's income last year was $362 million, stock gains were over $27 million, and salary from 14 seasons of 'The Apprentice' was $213.6 million but released very little information on assets or debt. Commentators say that he might actually be worth less than he asserts.

TODAY'S KEY STORIES

Hillary Clinton Reports Raising Almost $47 Million for Primary Campaign // NYT // Nicholas Confessore – July 15, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton raised $46.7 million for her primary campaign, more than half of it from women, according to campaign officials and reports filed on Wednesday with the Federal Election Commission.

Mrs. Clinton had $28 million in cash on hand at the beginning of July after spending more than $18 million since starting her campaign in April, as she moved rapidly to establish infrastructure in key primary states after months of waiting to enter the race. And while her campaign has focused on raising contributions for the primary, Mrs. Clinton accepted $824,620 in money earmarked for the general election should she win the Democratic nomination.

About one in six dollars of the almost $47 million Mrs. Clinton raised came from donors giving less than $200, a smaller proportion than some Democratic and Republican rivals, such as Senators Bernie Sanders of Vermont and Ted Cruz of Texas. Mr. Sanders raised far less than Mrs. Clinton overall — about $15 million, including money transferred from his Senate account — though more than two-thirds of it came from smaller donors.

"Thanks to the more than 250,000 Americans who have stepped up to support Hillary Clinton's campaign, we have had the ability to make critical investments in our organization that will put us in position to win the primary and the White House," Robby Mook, Mrs. Clinton's campaign manager, said in a statement. "With Republicans tapping their billionaire backers for unlimited sums of money, we are glad to be able to have such broad support to be able to show why Hillary Clinton is the only candidate who will fight for policies that allow everyday Americans to get ahead and stay ahead."

An earlier version of this article misstated when Hillary Rodham Clinton's campaign finance reports were filed with the Federal Election Commission. They were filed on Wednesday, not Monday.

Female donors help Hillary Clinton bring in $47.5 million in second quarter // WaPo // Matea Gold – July 15, 2015

The $47.5 million Hillary Rodham Clinton raised during her first two and half months as a presidential candidate this year was boosted by a predominantly female donor base, her campaign said Wednesday.

Of the more the 250,000 contributors who donated to Clinton, 61 percent are women. That puts her on track to outstrip the presidential high-water mark set by President Obama in 2012, when 47 percent of donors who gave him more than $200 were women, according to the Center for Responsive Politics.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The surge of female-driven contributions for Clinton could fuel a partisan divide when it comes to gender and political money. In 2012, women gave 52 percent of their federal donations to Democratic candidates, a slight edge the party has held since 1998, according to the Center.

All but $824,000 of Clinton's war chest is money raised for the Democratic primary contest. Her campaign entered July with nearly $29 million in cash on hand.

Donations under $200 made up just under 17 percent of Clinton's total raised. That was in sharp contrast with Republican Jeb Bush: Just 3 percent of the $11.4 million he raised came from such low-dollar donations.

Clinton's small-donor base is larger than it was in her first quarter of fundraising in the 2008 race, when just 9 percent of her money came from contributions under $200, according to data analyzed by the Campaign Finance Institute. But it is smaller than that of then-candidate Barack Obama, who raised 22 percent of his money that same quarter from small donors.

It is also dwarfed by that of primary season rival Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.). Nearly 76 percent of the $13.5 million in individual donations he received were under $200.

“With Republicans tapping their billionaire backers for unlimited sums of money, we are glad to be able to have such broad support to be able to show why Hillary Clinton is the only candidate who will fight for policies that allow everyday Americans to get ahead and stay ahead," campaign manager Robby Mook said in a statement.

Clinton also released the names of 122 fundraisers who have bundled at least $100,000 for the campaign. In all, they have raised at least $12.2 million since April 12, 2015.

The Clinton bundler list included many familiar and longtime Democratic Party fundraisers, as well as some of the Clinton’s biggest long-time donors. Haim and Cheryl Saban, who built a fortune marketing the “Mighty Morphin Power Rangers” and other entertainment offerings, were on the list as they have been for past Clinton presidential, Senate and foundation activities.

Longtime donor Fred Eychaner, a reclusive Chicago business and media titan, is on the list. In 2012, he was one of the largest donors to Democratic outside spending groups, and has been particularly supportive of same sex marriage legislation.

The list also includes many familiar Washington names, including Elizabeth Frawley Bagley, longtime Democratic donor and former ambassador to Portugal, and veteran Clinton adviser Minyon Moore. Washington lobbyist Steve Elmendorf – who worked on the presidential campaigns of Richard Gephardt, John Kerry and Hillary Clinton – was listed, along with Tom Nides, who was Hillary Clinton’s deputy secretary of state before joining Morgan Stanley as a top executive.

Other notable Wall Street bundlers listed include hedge fund magnate Orin Kramer and Marc Lasry.

Unlike Obama, Clinton is allowing lobbyists to bundle for her campaign. Among those raising money for Clinton were former Sen. Robert Torricelli of New Jersey and K Street power Heather Podesta. Others included David Leiter, a lobbyist who served as former chief of staff to John Kerry; and Jackson Dunn, a managing director at FTI Consulting who served as an aide to President Bill Clinton and other national figures.

Hillary Clinton Lags in Engaging Grass-Roots Donors // NYT // Nicholas Confessore and Maggie Haberman – July 15, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Rodham Clinton's presidential campaign has been slow to harness the fund-raising power of the Democratic Party's legions of grass-roots donors, according to reports filed Wednesday, a weakness that her campaign is racing to combat.

Of the $47.5 million that Mrs. Clinton has raised, one-fifth has come from donors giving less than $200. That is a far smaller proportion than that of her Democratic and Republican rivals who have excited grass-roots donors on the left and right, such as Senators Bernie Sanders of Vermont and Ted Cruz of Texas. While Mr. Sanders raised far less than Mrs. Clinton over all — about $15 million, including money transferred from his Senate account — about four-fifths of that amount came from smaller donors.

The slow response of grass-roots donors is a consequence, Mrs. Clinton's aides and advisers said, of the deliberately low-key approach she has taken on the campaign trail — with few of the big rallies and campaign events that can help build voter lists and drive donations — along with the challenge in persuading some donors that Mrs. Clinton, who is far ahead in primary polls, needs their money.

The deficit could represent a financial and strategic liability for Mrs. Clinton if she were to win the nomination. The pool of Republican donors willing to write the maximum $2,700 check has grown so large that no Democrat, not even Mrs. Clinton, is likely to be able to match a mainstream Republican nominee on high-dollar fund-raising over the long term. In 2012, President Obama and his party were able to match the Republican candidate, Mitt Romney, only by raising far more money than Mr. Romney from small donors.

"Given the prodigious amount of money on the Republican side, the Democratic nominee absolutely has to overperform" among small donors, said David Axelrod, who advised Mr. Obama's two successful presidential campaigns.

Campaign officials said that operational hurdles and administrative delays also have impeded her outreach to small donors. On the day that Mrs. Clinton sent out emails in April announcing her presidential bid, a campaign official said, many of the messages bounced back. Fewer than 100,000 of the 2.5 million email addresses collected during her 2008 campaign, it turned out, were still active. The campaign did not gain access to a huge list of supporters, built over two years at substantial expense by a pro-Clinton "super PAC," Ready for Hillary, until a month and a half after Mrs. Clinton's announcement.

Some of Mrs. Clinton's allies acknowledge that Mr. Sanders has done a better job of engaging small donors on the left. "The small donors right now are very much attracted to what Bernie is saying," said Ed Rendell, a former Pennsylvania governor and a Clinton supporter.

Mrs. Clinton's campaign has responded with a new program, the Hillbuilder Initiative, intended to build a more robust online presence and harvest the grass-roots money and enthusiasm that can come with it. But the slow start has bewildered some longtime supporters, who recall small-donor enthusiasm as a crucial piece of Mr. Obama's win over Mrs. Clinton in 2008.

Relying more heavily on large donors could also present an unwanted contrast not only to other candidates, like Mr. Sanders, but with Mrs. Clinton's own statements about fighting for those who feel locked out of the economy. Mrs. Clinton has attended 46 fund-raisers since she entered the campaign, many of them for donors giving the largest possible check. Mr. Sanders has attended two.

"We're spending our time talking to people, rather than sitting around in small rooms talking to very wealthy people," Mr. Sanders said in an interview on Wednesday, as he prepared for a campaign rally in Phoenix. "These are working people, middle-class people who are making these contributions."

Wednesday's campaign filings underscored not only how small donors have powered insurgent candidates, but how the growing world of super PACs and outside spending have upended conventional measures of fund-raising strength.

Mrs. Clinton's campaign has taken in three times more money than any of her Democratic or Republican rivals, according to Federal Election Commission data filed by the 2016 candidates on Wednesday.

But super PACs and other outside groups set up by allies or former aides to the Republican candidates have dwarfed the top Democratic super PAC — as well as most of the Republican campaigns — collectively raising in excess of $200 million and startling some in Mrs. Clinton's camp.

Jeb Bush's super PAC, Right to Rise, raised more than $103 million, on top of $11 million raised by his campaign, giving him an effective war chest twice as large as Mrs. Clinton's. Priorities USA, the lead Democratic super PAC, has raised $15 million, and Mrs. Clinton's allies are struggling to persuade her wealthiest backers to make seven- and eight-figure donations to the group.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The only silver lining, Democrats said, was the knowledge that much of the Republican super PAC money would be used to savage other Republicans, in what is likely to be a long and hard-fought primary campaign.

“What it means is that they are going to tear each other apart in the primary season,” said Mr. Rendell, who predicted that Mrs. Clinton’s small-dollar fund-raising would grow substantially in the months ahead.

Some Democrats privately said that Mrs. Clinton’s campaign fund-raising is less impressive than it appears. Aside from Martin O’Malley, the former Maryland Governor, who reported raising $2 million for his campaign, Mrs. Clinton has no competition for the Democrats’ big-donor establishment, which handed out a combined $80 million to a crowded Democratic primary field during the equivalent fund-raising period in 2007, the last open primary.

She also has been slow to seize the chance to raise money jointly with the Democratic National Committee. Under legislation passed in December, the party can accept up to $334,000 from each donor every calendar year — 10 times the amount in past years. One leading Democratic donor, who asked not to be identified so as not to damage his relations with Mrs. Clinton, estimated that the Democrats could be leaving $60 million to $70 million on the table.

While some Clinton allies say they are not concerned about the campaign’s potential to excite small donors, the difficulty that Mrs. Clinton has faced presents a paradox of her position as a kind of de facto incumbent in the fight for the Democratic nomination. Without a pitched primary battle — like the one she faced against then-Senator Barack Obama eight years ago — it is far more difficult for Mrs. Clinton to create urgency among her financial and political base this early in the campaign.

But an all-out fund-raising blitz, or a campaign built around larger events, could stoke the aura of “inevitability” that she is determined to avoid.

A spokesman for Mrs. Clinton, Josh Schwerin, said the campaign was “thrilled to have 250,000 donors in our first quarter in the race, and our Hillbuilder program is already paying off with a rapidly growing list that is active and engaged.”

The fallacy of the ‘real Hillary Clinton’ // WaPo // Philip Bump – July 15, 2015

Hillary Clinton has been campaigning either for herself or her husband since 1991, with the exception of the four years she served as secretary of state (and including time in office, which one should). That's 20 of 24 years, which is why Mark Leibovich's New York Times coverage of the latest effort necessitates several extra "re-"s before "reintroducing Hillary Clinton."

Leibovich argues that the drip-drip release of e-mails from Clinton's time as secretary of state has inadvertently helped the campaign achieve that dream goal of every candidate: Presenting the real Hillary Clinton. None of this what-I-read-in-the-papers stuff about who Clinton is and what she's like, but the real, unfiltered, only slightly sanded-down Hillary Clinton that her friends and family know. And heck, they'd all vote for her in a heartbeat!

Those old enough to remember back to 2012 will remember another candidate who bemoaned that his realness was sheltered (and, of course, he features in Leibovich's very next sentence). If only people had known the real Mitt Romney, the thinking goes, they'd have voted for him in a heartbeat. This was son Josh's stated goal in 2012, to "help voters to get a different side of him ... to really see the real Mitt Romney."

Between January 2012 and January 2014, there were at least 1,400 news articles talking about the "real Mitt Romney," according to Nexis — a wave cresting with the release early that year of the documentary "Mitt." Here, at last, was the real Mitt. (But somehow, when he talked about running for president a third time earlier this year, people were still only lukewarm.)

Here's the thing, though. This "get to know the real so-and-so" thing is not new.

The day after the 2004 debate, Newsweek's Evan Thomas figured the debate helped John Kerry's chances because George W. Bush's allies "made him just a flip-flopping, effete, sherry-sipping, windsurfing joke, and when the American public finally saw the real John Kerry" he was "pretty good." The Lowell (Mass.) Sun spoke to Kerry's neighbors, folks that "had a chance to watch the real John Kerry, up close and unguarded." A syndicated column that went around before the election asked the real Kerry to "please stand up," perhaps marking Eminem's recent influence on the culture. Scores of articles between 2004 and 2006 demanded or revealed the "real" John Kerry.

Just as, four years earlier, scores had looked for the "real Al Gore."

"Whatever he does, he has to be real," pollster John Zogby advised shortly before the 2000 election. "Who is the real Al Gore?" After the first debate, CBS' Russ Mitchell figured that viewers had seen him. Maybe. "If there is such a thing, though, as a real Al Gore, then voters probably saw him last night," he said. And on and on.

The same concern didn't seem to surround George W. Bush that year. Far fewer people worried about uncovering the real Dubya than the real Gore or Kerry. In 2008, there was a lot of handwringing about the real Barack Obama, but some of that was of the birther variety.

In 1984, it was Walter Mondale's turn. The Washington Post spoke with his team as the election approached. "Mondale's advisers also are trying to bring out a 'real Mondale,' " we reported, "who they say is, among other things, really a 'pragmatic, progressive Midwest politician' — not the ultra-liberal Reagan decries." Mondale offered the same — unsuccessful — advice to Michael Dukakis for his — unsuccessful — 1988 bid. "He's just got to go out and show us the real Dukakis and tell us where he wants to take the country," Mondale told the Times. "Don't worry about advisers. I didn't at this point. I said things my way." And how'd that work out?

What's really being said, of course, is usually that the candidates are too candidate-y — that they seem as though they're trying to leverage their communications sophistication to hide who they really are. Kerry wasn't hiding a bubbly, easygoing persona when he ran in 2004; he doesn't really have one. Voters saw the real Al Gore and the real John Kerry. Voters in 2008 saw the real Hillary Clinton. Sure, they're all nice and easy-going sometimes, but who isn't? Sometimes, like when they're campaigning, they aren't.

Or, look at it another way: Is the you that you offer on Facebook "the real you"? Of course not. The "real" us is never really knowable by another person. What candidates who want you to know the "real" them are really saying is, "I know you don't like me, but trust me that you would."

Often, as we've seen, that sales pitch doesn't work.

Democrats release now-abandoned hearing schedule for Benghazi committee // WaPo // Colby Itkowitz – July 15, 2015

Former defense secretaries Leon Panetta and Robert Gates, then-U.N. Ambassador Susan Rice and, of course, former secretary of state Hillary Rodham Clinton were among the high-level witnesses who Republicans intended to call to testify this year about the 2012 attacks in Benghazi, Libya.

Democrats on the special House committee investigating those attacks made public Wednesday a list of witnesses and hearings they claim Republicans outlined as part of a 2015 schedule for the committee.

In a letter to Chairman Trey Gowdy (R-S.C.), and distributed widely, the Democrats accuse him of abandoning the investigation in favor of skewering Clinton during her presidential run.

According to the Democrats, Panetta and Gates were supposed to testify in April for a hearing entitled, “Why were we in Libya?” Rice, who famously was the White House mouthpiece in the days after the attacks, was to be summoned in July to discuss the “motivation of the attackers, as well as what was said after the attacks.”

And Clinton was going to come before the committee in May to discuss “How did we respond?”

Gowdy has previously blamed the committee’s slow walking the investigation on the State Department not turning over documents fast enough. He has said they can’t hold hearing until they have all the relevant facts.

But the Democrats wrote in their letter that it doesn’t explain why no hearings, except for one in January, have been held. Particularly ones focused on other agencies like Defense, which shouldn’t be dependent on State documents.

An Associated Press story Tuesday said the committee has “devolved from an investigation into the deaths of four Americans in Libya into a political fight over Hillary Rodham Clinton’s emails and private computer server.”

The conclusion was that the purpose of the committee’s work is to uncover Clinton’s wrongdoings, not how and why the Benghazi attacks occurred.

2016 Campaign Cash Flowing to Clinton and Bush // AP // July 16, 2015

WASHINGTON — The major parties' top presidential candidates in the fundraising race — Democrat Hillary Rodham Clinton and Republican Jeb Bush — are collecting cash in the huge amounts needed to fuel the extensive political organizations they are building for the 2016 campaign.

Their financial backers have poured more than $176 million into their campaigns and the super PACs specially designed to boost them.

Clinton's campaign is spending money at a rapid clip, according to initial fundraising reports filed Wednesday with federal regulators. The former first lady and front-runner in the Democratic race has paid out 40 percent of the $47 million in donations that she amassed by the end of June, employing some 364 people and building infrastructure across the country in preparation for next year's general election.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bush, the former Florida governor and son and brother of ex-presidents, spent more than one-quarter of the $11.4 million in fundraising that he collected in the final 16 days of June, according to the reports. The campaign invested heavily in payroll and policy consulting.

The Federal Election Commission reports cover financial activity between April 1 and June 30, a period when almost all of the 22 presidential hopefuls jumped into the race, and list the names of everyone who gave at least $200. The maximum contribution for the primary is $2,700.

The FEC documents also showed how candidates are spending — or saving: In the crowded Republican field, Florida Sen. Marco Rubio started July with almost $10 million, just ahead of Bush and Texas Sen. Ted Cruz, and in front of the rest of the GOP pack.

Yet a candidate's own campaign is just one page in the money story. Super PACs, which are required to file similar documents at the end of the month, can accept contributions of any size. They're limited on how closely they can work with the campaigns but are often staffed with close confidants of the candidates. In many cases, the candidates themselves have "blessed" the super PACs and pitched in with their fundraising.

These and other powerful outside groups account for about two-thirds of the roughly $400 million raised so far for the presidential election, according to an Associated Press tally of FEC documents and financial totals provided by the groups that haven't yet reported.

No current candidate has made as much use of super PACs and their unlimited-donation potential as Bush. Before he officially declared his candidacy, he spent the first six months of the year raising huge sums of money for Right to Rise. That group says it has raised a record $103 million.

Outside groups are furthering the ambitions of at least four other Republican presidential aspirants: Rubio, Cruz, Texas Gov. Rick Perry and Ohio Gov. John Kasich. In each case, the fundraising for those entities is outpacing the fundraising for their campaigns.

Rubio's overall take from donors — $44.7 million to his campaign and two outside groups — includes $15.8 million for a nonprofit that won't file any public budget information until at least next year and keeps its donors secret.

Some donors are secret for another reason: They're too small. The FEC only requires names and identifying information for people who give more than $200.

These kinds of contributors are underwriting Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders' Democratic presidential campaign, FEC reports show, accounting for more than three-quarters of the $13.7 million in contributions he collected. Sanders also transferred $1.5 million from his dormant Senate campaign account.

Also doing well on the small-donor front is Republican retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson. About 68 percent of his $10.6 million raised this year was in contributions of $200 or less. Carly Fiorina, a California technology executive also seeking the GOP nomination, raised 43 percent of her $1.7 million this way.

Because the money is coming directly to those candidates, they have tighter control over how it is used.

By comparison, 3 percent of Bush's campaign cash and 17 percent of Clinton's came from small donors.

A few major Republican candidates are missing from the initial campaign finance reports. Kasich hasn't officially launched his campaign yet. Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker and New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie made their campaigns official too recently to file second-quarter FEC reports, although a Christie-allied super PAC said on Tuesday that it has raised $11 million. The first look at their campaign numbers will come in mid-October.

Hillary Clinton Spends $18 Million, Hires Hundreds // AP // Lisa Lerer and Julie Bykowicz – July 15, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton spent more than $18 million and hired hundreds of employees in the first three months of her presidential campaign, creating a national operation that vastly outpaces her rivals in both parties.

She has the money for it, having raised more than $46 million for the Democratic primary contest.

But building a campaign Goliath hasn't come cheap. Clinton spent more than $5.9 million on 343 employees, $700,000 on computers and other equipment, and nearly half a million renting offices, including her 80,000-square-foot Brooklyn headquarters.

Beyond paying for salaries and space, her campaign purchased lists of voters in four early primary states, paid six figures to a super PAC devoted to defending her record and spent heavily on building a digital team, according to campaign finance documents filed Wednesday with federal regulators.

It's a strategy aimed at a contest that's nearly a year away. The overwhelming favorite for her party's nomination, Clinton's team has set its sights on building the massive infrastructure they'll need for the general election.

The outlay is nearly four times what Clinton spent in the first three months of her last presidential campaign, when she faced a far more competitive primary race against then-Sen. Barack Obama.

During that 2008 campaign, Clinton and her team faced charges from donors that they were wasting money on ineffective strategic choices — like spending nearly $100,000 for party platters and groceries before the Iowa caucus, a contest she lost.

This time, her staff has emphasized its "cheapskate" mentality — particularly to contributors. At her first national finance meeting in May, top donors were instructed to purchase their own lunches and fund their own transportation to various gatherings in Brooklyn.

Campaign aides like to brag about taking the bus from New York to Washington, rather than the more expensive Acela train. Even so, her campaign spent at least $8,700 on train tickets and just a few hundred dollars on bus fare, the Federal Election Commission report shows.

All told, Clinton has spent a far greater portion of her early funds during this campaign than she did eight years ago.

During the first three months of her 2008 bid, Clinton spent 14 percent of the $36 million she raised, according to FEC documents. In the launch of this campaign, she's burned though nearly 40 percent of what she has taken in.

Her campaign also reported that Clinton received more than 250,000 contributions, with an average donation of $144.89. About 17 percent of her contributions were $200 or less.

By comparison, Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders has fueled an insurgent challenge to Clinton with small donations. He pulled in more than $15.2 million through the end of June, and three-quarters of his donations were $200 or less.

Though they've highlighted their lower-dollar contributions, Clinton's team also released a list of campaign bundlers who each raised more than $100,000 for her primary bid.

Some of the donors included Clinton's most ardent financial backers, including Hollywood media mogul Haim Saban; Susie Tompkins Buell, a wealthy California investor who was a major donor to the Ready for Hillary super PAC; Las Vegas publisher Brian Greenspun, a longtime friend and college classmate of Bill Clinton; billionaire J.B. Pritzker of Chicago; and Alan Patricof, a New York-based financier who served as Clinton's finance chair when she first ran for Senate in New York.

Clinton's team also successfully courted some of Obama's biggest backers, including New York financiers Marc Lasry, Charles Myers and Blair Effron.

Others included former Clinton aides like Minyon Moore, Tom Nides and Lisa Caputo, former Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh, and current members of Congress like Reps. Jim Himes of Connecticut and Grace Meng of New York.

Hillary Clinton’s not-so-cheapskate campaign // Politico // Gabriel Debenedetti and Annie Karni – July 15, 2015

Hillary Clinton’s cheapskate campaign is sure spending a lot of cash.

The Democratic front-runner, who has pledged to run a thrifty operation, started off with a historically lucrative fundraising quarter, but it’s also gone through campaign funds at a rate surpassing any of her rivals in either party.

Racing against a Republican field full of highly funded campaigns and super PACs, the Clinton machine spent more than $18.7 million since launching in mid-April — that’s more than the rest of her Democratic rivals raised, combined, according to filings released on Wednesday.

It could afford to do so after raising roughly $47.5 million — including $46 million in primary money, the most of any campaign in its first quarter, ever.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The report, which came in late Wednesday as the federal filing deadline loomed, showed a campaign investing heavily in organizing, but also in a large staff around the country.
It also showed an operation heavily reliant on a handful of large donors: Just $8 million of its haul came from donations of $200 or less, though the campaign said 94 percent of its contributions were less than $250.

In a bid for transparency, the campaign voluntarily disclosed its bundlers of over $100,000 — a long list that included several stand-by Democratic megadonors and a handful of elected officials.

But, for a campaign that has publicly promoted its allegedly frugal ways, the report also showed a few particularly large or eyebrow-raising expenditures and liabilities.
Hillary for America reported a debt of $574,000 for the first three months of its campaign since its April 12 launch, including over $553,000 owed to pollster John Anzalone's firm.

When Clinton last ran for president, in 2008, her campaign finished in debt, and the candidate used nearly $13 million of her own dollars — circumstances the operation has been keen to avoid repeating. So far this time, Clinton herself donated about $279,000 to her own 2016 campaign.

And while the campaign has highlighted how it encourages even its top staffers to take the cheap Bolt Bus to travel along the Northeast corridor, the filing showed the campaign has also spent more than $8,700 on Amtrak.

Much of the campaign's money was spent on payroll and organizing expenses, but some expenditures — such as nearly $180,000 for a charter plane company — stood out.

Other noticeable expenditures included a $500 payment to former Rep. Anthony Weiner — husband of top aide Huma Abedin — for office furniture, and over $387,000 in legal fees.

The campaign did spend considerably in the early-voting states, including $370,000 for voter files in Iowa, New Hampshire, Nevada and South Carolina. And it has spent almost $815,000 on services from pollster Joel Benenson's firm.

Clinton has been raising money aggressively in a bid to raise $100 million in primary election money by the end of December. Much of her fundraising pitch to donors has been based around her likely Republican rivals' own campaign cash, including Jeb Bush's super PAC haul of over $100 million.

But Clinton's filing on Wednesday covered only her campaign, not its supportive groups. The main pro-Clinton super PAC, Priorities USA Action, raised over $15 million in the first half of the year despite raising money particularly actively in only recent weeks.
"With Republicans tapping their billionaire backers for unlimited sums of money, we are glad to be able to have such broad support to be able to show why Hillary Clinton is the only candidate who will fight for policies that allow everyday Amerians to get ahead and stay ahead," said campaign manager Robby Mook.

Clinton's total puts her miles ahead of her Democratic rivals, including Bernie Sanders — who raised north of $15 million — and Martin O'Malley — who brought in $2 million. In fact, Clinton spent more than the rest of the Democratic field raised, combined.
Her three-month haul was larger than that of any Republican's official campaign, but super PAC numbers will not fully be reported until the end of the month.

At this point in 2007, Clinton was already in her second quarter as a candidate, and she reported a $27 million haul that July, with $45 million cash on hand. In that bid, less than 10 percent of her contributions came from people donating $200 or less.
The campaign on Wednesday noted that over 250,000 individual donors contributed this time, and that over 60 percent of its donors were women.

It voluntarily disclosed a list of over 100 top bundlers — the National Finance Committee members known as "Hillblazers" — which includes a mix of major Obama backers in 2008 and Clinton standbys, as well as a handful of current and former lawmakers.

Included in the roster are former Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh; Rep. Joaquin Castro; Rep. Grace Meng; Rep. Jim Hime;, former Clinton press secretary Lisa Caputo; longtime supporter and Clinton Foundation donor Lynn Forester de Rothschild; Sean Eldridge and New Republic owner Chris Hughes; media mogul Fred Eychaner; billionaire venture capitalist J. B. Pritzker; Morgan Stanley executive Tom Nides, who served as part of Clinton's brain trust at the State Department; megadonor and Univision owner Haim Saban; Steve Rattner; and Democratic National Committee member Robert Zimmerman, among others.

Below is a breakout of the campaign's finances as of the end of June:

Republican field walloping Clinton in money race // Politico // Daniel Strauss – July 15, 2015

Hillary Clinton, the dominant front-runner in the Democratic field, is facing a massive pile of money on the Republican side, with early numbers showing that the GOPers have outraised Clinton more than four times over.

So far, the 15 candidates vying for the Republican nomination have raked in more than $280 million to Clinton's $69 million, through a mix of campaign fundraising, super PAC donations, and other money groups.

Yes, the field is lopsided, but that doesn't diminish this fact: Hillary's squaring off against a lot of Republican cash.

Federal Election Commission numbers are trickling in on Wednesday, the deadline for candidates to provide their official campaign figures. The numbers provide an initial snapshot of the cash dash, with 16 months still to go before Election Day.

But there was already a pretty good money picture before the deadline. Over the past couple weeks, the 2016ers have leaked, announced and — in some cases — boasted about their fundraising hauls.

Among the sea of numbers, one has stood out: Jeb's.

Bush's Right to Rise super PAC, which will take on an unprecedented role in tandem with his presidential campaign, announced last week that it had banked $103 million in the past six months, exceeding its own ambitious goal of $100 million.

On top of that, Bush's official campaign announced it raised $11.4 million over 16 days since he announced his bid for the White House (Bush's camp confirmed that in its filing on Wednesday). A third money group raised $5 million, bringing his total amount to a formidable $119 million.

The figures showed Bush's prowess on the fundraising front. In two weeks, his campaign raised more than some of his rivals have over several months, and the super PAC's take is unprecedented in American politics.

The numbers confirmed some of the worries among Clinton supporters, who believe now is the time for the pro-Clinton super PAC Priorities USA Action to get its act together and start becoming a fundraising machine that can counter the Jeb juggernaut.

But Bush is not the only Republican who has successfully flexed his fundraising muscle.

Sen. Ted Cruz was not far behind with a $51 million pull, while Sen. Marco Rubio's combined haul was $43.8 million.

The rest of the field drops off from there, at least from initial reports. Former Texas Gov. Rick Perry's war chest stands at roughly $18 million (he reported $1.1 million in official campaign fundraising on Wednesday), groups backing Ohio Gov. John Kasich (who will announce his candidacy next week) raised $11.5 million, New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie's super PAC has reported bringing in $11 million, and retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson's campaign said it raised $10.5 million.

Others have so far raised in the single-digit millions. Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal was the first to have his paperwork appear on deadline day, reporting on Wednesday that his campaign had raised just under $579,000 during the seven days before the June 30 deadline. An adviser for the governor's super PAC said later on Wednesday that pro-Jindal groups have raised nearly $9 million.

On the Democratic side, Sen. Bernie Sanders, who is shunning super PAC money, comes in a not-close second with $15.2 million, while former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley brought in roughly $2 million during his first month as a candidate.

Clinton, meanwhile, has set off on a solid clip of fundraising, with $45 million in campaign money during her first three months as a candidate (a primary record, her campaign notes), and an additional $24 million through pro-Clinton super PACs.
Stuart Roy, who formerly advised a pro-Rick Santorum super PAC in 2012, said the GOP's numbers looks huge against Clinton, but cautioned against reading too closely into the numbers.

“The Republican spin doctor inside of me wants to tell you that Hillary Clinton is going to get crushed but I really don’t think that July of this year that it’s terribly indicative of the general election. Most of the donors that are giving now are early donors and are giving because they believe in the candidate and you’re not getting too much of the momentum money which is what you get when people believe you can win.”

Poll: Hillary Clinton’s lead shrinks among Democrats // Politico // Nick Gass – July 15, 2015

Hillary Clinton is still leading the Democratic field for 2016, but her lead has shrunk in recent months, according to a Monmouth University poll out Wednesday, as independent Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders continues to make steady gains, despite trailing by a wide margin.

Among Democrats and those leaning toward the Democratic Party, Clinton picked up the support of 51 percent, down from 57 percent in June and 60 percent in April.

Sanders came in second with 17 percent, followed by former Maryland Gov. Martin O’Malley and former Virginia Sen. Jim Webb with 1 percent each. Lincoln Chafee, the former governor and senator from Rhode Island, registered no support.

If Vice President Joe Biden were to run, however, the results suggest that he would take some votes from Clinton. He has not announced his intentions, but poll respondents backed him with 13 percent, just behind Sanders.

Among voters who said they were likely to vote for Biden in the event of his candidacy, 68 percent said they currently support Clinton, while 18 percent said they are backing another candidate, with 14 percent undecided.

Clinton continues to have the best favorability ratings among her Democratic rivals in the Monmouth poll (74 percent favorable to 17 percent unfavorable), though Biden is close behind (67 percent to 17 percent).

The poll was conducted via landlines and cellphones from a larger July 9-12 survey, which sought the opinions of 1,001 adults nationwide. This particular sample included 357 registered voters who identified themselves as Democrats or leaning toward the Democratic Party, carrying a margin of error of plus or minus 5.2 percentage points.

3 Charts That Show Why Hillary Clinton Wants to Increase Profit-Sharing // Bloomberg // Andrew Feather – July 15, 2015

In a speech at the New School in New York City on Monday, presidential candidate Hillary Clinton called for building a “growth and fairness economy.”

“Hard-working Americans deserve to benefit from the record corporate earnings they helped produce,” she said, adding that "studies show profit-sharing that gives everyone a stake in a company’s success can boost productivity and put money directly into employees’ pockets.”

The philosophy behind Clinton’s proposals is sometimes called inclusive capitalism. Rather than focusing on higher tax rates for the rich, Clinton is proposing reforms that would change the incentives of the current economic system in hopes of making it more equitable. Unlike Vermont Senator Bernie Sanders, her presidential rival, and a self-described socialist, Clinton is looking to amend the rules of the game, not toss the board up into the air. The following charts help explain why she is promoting profit-sharing:

The one-percent

The percent of wealth controlled by the top one percent now hovers near 20 percent, double where it was in the 50s, 60s and 70s.

Skin in the game

Clinton says she would incentivize businesses to share profits through the tax code. By increasing profit sharing, the plan would give more employees a stake in the business’s growth and put that growth directly into employees' pockets.

An increase in the share of income lower level employees take home could decrease inequality, but it may not make up for the structural inequality created by improvements in technology, according to the National Bureau of Economic Research.

Defining issue of our time

Few deny that inequality has risen dramatically over the last thirty years, though its causes are disputed. Even low tax republicans like Jeb Bush and Marco Rubio are making it a central issue of their campaigns.

Hillary Clinton Takes in $46.7 Million from 250,000 Donors // Bloomberg // Jennifer Epstein – July 15, 2015

Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign raised close to $47 million in primary money during its first quarter and has $28.85 million in cash on hand, according to a report filed Wednesday with the Federal Elections Commission.

The Democratic front-runner is focused on raising money for the primary, and brought in more than $46.7 million—including in-kind contributions of nearly $280,000 from Clinton, who financed the testing-the-waters pre-campaign phase with her own money—once all the checks for the second quarter of 2015 were totaled. The campaign is not actively soliciting general-election money but still took in close to $825,000 that can only be spent if she becomes the Democratic nominee.

More than 250,000 people from all 50 states, Puerto Rico, the District of Columbia and all U.S. territories gave to support Clinton's candidacy, the campaign said in a statement, and 94 percent of donations were of $250 or less. The average donation was $144.89 and, showing Clinton's appeal to female voters, 61 percent of donors were women.

“Thanks to the more than 250,000 Americans who have stepped up to support Hillary Clinton’s campaign, we have had the ability to make critical investments in our organization that will put us in position to win the primary and the White House,” Clinton campaign manager Robby Mook said in a written statement.

While Clinton's team touted broad-based support, the breakdown by dollars is slightly less kind, with about $8 million—just under 17 percent—of Clinton's haul coming in contributions of $200 or less.

The campaign was the first to voluntarily disclose a list of major fundraisers, and posted on its website the names of 122 individuals or groups that bundled at least $100,000 for Clinton. Many of those people hosted fundraisers for Clinton, including Facebook cofounder and New Republic owner Chris Hughes and his husband Sean Eldridge; Chicago media mogul Fred Eychaner; and Avenue Capital Group CEO Marc Lasry and his wife Cathy.

Texas Reprepsentative Joaquin Castro—the twin brother of Housing and Urban Development Secretary Julian Castro, a possible Clinton vice presidential pick—is listed as a bundler, as are Connecticut Representative Jim Himes and New York Representative Grace Meng. A few former Hillary Clinton staffers, including Minyon Moore and Lisa Caputo, are also listed as bundlers.

The campaign reported $2.1 million in donations bundled by registered lobbyists, including FTI Consulting's Jackson Dunn, who raised the most at $231,554, and former New Jersey Sen. Robert Torricelli, who raised $28,000. Campaign chairman John Podesta's brother Tony Podesta raised $74,575, while Tony Podesta's ex-wife Heather raised $31,150.

More than a dozen Hollywood stars and moguls gave the maximum $2700 to the campaign, including Leonardo DiCaprio, Bryan Cranston, Ben Affleck, Jennifer Garner, Richard Gere, Kate Hudson and Stephen Spielberg, who has also written a big check to the pro-Clinton Priorities USA Action super PAC.

Clinton's second-quarter primary haul, which her campaign had initially estimated at $45 million, beats the record-setting $41.9 million that President Barack Obama's reelection campaign brought in during its first quarter in 2011.

While the campaign's expenses were sizable—disbursements totaled just under $18.7 million, more than any other campaign has even raised—aides insist that they were focused on making smart investments for the rest of the campaign, including starting off with a substantial number of staffers working in a large Brooklyn office, hiring dozens of staffers in early primary and caucus states, and buying voter files and e-mail lists outright rather than in installments.

The campaign spent its funds at a rate of about $230,000 per day and its overall burn rate is about 40 percent, much faster than the 20 percent rate of Vermont Senator Bernie Sanders or the 27 percent rate of former Florida Governor Jeb Bush.

Even so, the $28.85 million in cash on hand exceeds any of her opponents from either party by more than double. Still, there's plenty of financial pressure on Clinton and the outside groups backing her, which in total raised about $70 million during the second quarter.

The campaign spent more than $900,000 on polling, with just over $800,000 going to Benenson Strategy Group, run by top Clinton adviser Joel Benenson. David Binder's polling firm was paid $90,000 by the campaign. The campaign ended the quarter owing $553,113.66 to another polling firm, Anzalone Liszt Grove Research.

While the campaign has sought out media attention for its thrift – especially on travel expenses – the numbers are less generous. The campaign's filing details $661.50 spent on Bolt Bus and Best Bus, and $8,700 spent on much pricier Amtrak trips. (There are also plenty of reimbursements to staffers for travel expenses which could of course include ground transportation.) Clinton initially relied on commercial flights to get to campaign stops but has increasingly been using private planes as her travel schedule has picked up, and disclosures show nearly $180,000 paid to just one aircraft company, Executive Fliteways.

The campaign spent $463,656.63 on rent, including $105,875.34 a month for its Brooklyn headquarters at 1 Pierrepont Plaza.

“With Republicans tapping their billionaire backers for unlimited sums of money, we are glad to be able to have such broad support to be able to show why Hillary Clinton is the only candidate who will fight for policies that allow everyday Americans to get ahead and stay ahead," Mook said in his statement.

Groups supporting Jeb Bush brought in $114.4 million during the first half of 2015—including $11.4 million raised by his official campaign between its launch in mid-June and the end of the second quarter. The Clinton team is "without a doubt" worried about being outraised by the efforts backing Bush and more broadly by the flow of massive amounts of money to super PACs backing Republican candidates, Clinton communications director Jennifer Palmieri said Wednesday on Bloomberg's With All Due Respect.

"I am concerned that Democrats aren't taking it seriously enough and they should be really worried about this," she said. "We are really worried about this. We are still going to be outspent—we still think [Clinton] can win—but this is a big threat."

Democratic House Members Accuse Benghazi Panel of Abandoning Duty // Bloomberg // Billy House – July 15, 2015

The five U.S. House Democrats on the special committee investigating the 2012 attacks in Benghazi on Wednesday criticized Republicans for not planned hearings this year, accusing their colleagues of instead focusing on partisan attacks against Hillary Clinton, the former secretary of state now running for the Democratic nomination for president.

"It appears that much of the Select Committee's work has been shelved while Republicans pursue every possible avenue of political attack against Secretary Clinton," states a letter sent by the Democrats to committee chairman Trey Gowdy of South Carolina. It's the latest salvo in a partisan battle over the work of the committee, formed to look into the State Department's handling of the 2012 terror attacks in Libya that killed four Americans, including U.S. Ambassador J. Christopher Stevens.

In the Wednesday letter, the panel's Democrats, led by Elijah Cummings of Maryland, said their Republican colleagues had initially provided them with information about plans to hold 11 hearings between January and October on a wide range of topics relating to the Benghazi attacks.

Since then, however, the letter states Republicans "have completely abandoned this plan — holding no hearings at all since January and instead focusing on former Secretary Hillary Clinton.

"Amazingly, the last eight press releases on the Select Committee's webpage deal entirely with Secretary Clinton," the letter adds.

There was no immediate response from Gowdy and Republicans on the committee.

The letter goes on to specify topics of hearings that were promised, but never held. Those include:

- A January hearing with State Department eyewitnesses to the attacks to address the question of what happened in Benghazi;
- A February hearing with non-State Department eyewitnesses to the attacks to address the question of what happened in Benghazi;
- A March hearing with State Department witnesses to address the question of "Why were we in Libya?"
- An April hearing with former Defense Secretary Robert Gates and Secretary Leon Panetta as witnesses to address the question of "Why were we in Libya?"
- A May hearing hearing with Clinton as the planned witness to address the question of "How did we respond? ";
- A June hearing with former Deputy Director of the CIA Michael Morrell as the witness to address intelligence matters related to Libya, specifically about what was said after the attacks;
- And a July hearing with former U.N. Ambassador Susan Rice as the witness to address the motivation of the attackers, as well as what was said after the attacks.

The letter states that the committee has not only postponed its hearings with Clinton and other State Department witnesses, "but it has abandoned all of its other hearings as well, including those examining other agencies like the Department of Defense and the CIA.

"In the entire 14 months since the Select Committee has been in existence, the Select Committee has not conducted a transcribed interview or deposition of even a single Defense Department employee," the Democrats contend, adding: "In the past, Republicans have attempted to blame the Select Committee's glacial pace on Secretary Clinton and the State Department. But it seems difficult to understand how they could be responsible for the Select Committee abandoning every single hearing it had planned to hold since January."

Republicans have acknowledged that the the findings of the Republican-led committee investigating Clinton's response to the deadly 2012 attack in Benghazi, Libya, likely will not be released until next year, just months before the 2016 presidential election.

Democrats have previously noted there there already have been as many as seven congressional inquiries into the fatal Sept. 11, 2012 attack on the U.S. compound in Libya. Clinton was secretary of state at the time, and her Republican critics contend that she failed to bolster security before the assault and should share blame for what they say is the Obama administration's initial, erroneous account that the attacks were spontaneous and not the result of a terror attack.

Hillary Clinton Far Outpaces Democratic Rivals in Spending // TIME // Sam Frizell - July 15, 2015

Hillary Clinton's campaign spent $18.7 million since its launch on expenses ranging from payroll to voter files and office furniture, as the Democratic frontrunner sought to build a huge national operation that includes staff in all 50 states.

Her campaign has spent more money than both her Democratic rivals have raised.

"Thanks to the more than 250,000 Americans who have stepped up to support Hillary Clinton's campaign, we have had the ability to make critical investments in our organization that will put us in position to win the primary and the White House," said campaign manager Robby Mook.

Some of the campaign's more significant expenditures included $370,000 for the New Hampshire, Iowa, Nevada and South Carolina Democratic party voter files, nearly $2 million outsourcing its direct marketing to a Washington, D.C.-based firm, and millions of dollars in payroll for the campaign staff of nearly 350.

The campaign also spent around $440,000 on legal fees, according to filings, including $163,000 to the law firm of the campaign's lawyer, Marc Elias.

The campaign can afford to spend, having raised $46.7 million since mid-April, according to filings with the Federal Election Commission. Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, another contender for the Democratic presidential nomination, raised about $15 million in the first quarter. Former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley brought in around $2 million.

The spending represents some 40% of the money Clinton has raised since her official launch.

The campaign has taken a famously cheap approach, with staff forced to take buses, fly commercial and buy minimal office furniture and supplies. Some of that was reflected in the expenditures: in the month of June, for example, payroll expenditures to campaign manager Robby Mook totaled just $4,910, according to the filings, though Mook holds one of the most senior positions on the campaign.

The average donation to the Clinton campaign was $145, and the campaign said that 61% of its donors were women.

Celebrity donors to the campaign included Steven Spielberg, YouTube CEO Susan Wojcicki, Disney Chairman Alan Horn, and Dreamworks CEO Jeffrey Katzenberg. Notably, neither Chelsea Clinton nor Bill Clinton donated to the campaign, while the Bush family has already maxed out its contributions to Jeb's campaign.

Nearly 33,000 people have purchased items from Clinton's online store, which includes tongue-in-cheek items like a "Chillary" koozie and a "pantsuit tee."

Warren pushes for return of Glass-Steagall after Clinton adviser said she won't back measure // CNN // Dan Merica – July 15, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren pushed for the reinstatement of a major Depression-era banking law on Wednesday, emailing her large list of supporters to push for the measure.

The plea from the progressive icon comes two days after an economic adviser to Hillary Clinton's campaign said the presidential candidate wouldn't reinstate the Glass-Steagall Act if elected.

"Wall Street spent decades -- and millions of dollars -- to repeal the original Glass-Steagall Act, and you can bet they'll do whatever it takes to keep it from being reinstated," Warren wrote in an email titled "Let's get real." "We need grassroots support from all across the country if we're going to fight back to make our financial institutions smaller and safer."

The email asked supporters to sign a petition supporting Warren's "21st Century Glass-Steagall Act," which was introduced by the senator -- along with Republican Sen. John McCain -- last week.

The Glass-Steagall Act was a Depression-era law passed in 1933 that separated commercial and investment banking. The law was in place for more than 60 years until President Bill Clinton, with the backing of Congressional Republicans, repealed the law in 1999.

On Monday, Clinton outlined her economic vision for the country in a speech at the New School in New York. The former secretary of state promised to get tough on Wall Street and called lifting middle-class wages the "defining economic challenge of our life."

After the speech, Alan Blinder, an economist who the Clinton campaign says is advising the former first lady, told Reuters that Glass-Steagall was not going to be part of the candidate's economic platform.

"You're not going to see Glass-Steagall," Blinder said.

A Clinton aide, however, refuted Blinder on Wednesday.

"She will be announcing her ideas for dealing with the continuing problem of 'Too Big To Fail' in the coming weeks, and nothing has been taken off the table," the aide said.

In a 2013 interview with CNN, Bill Clinton blamed deregulation -- and the repeal of Glass-Steagall -- on Congressional Republicans.

"The American people gave the Congress to a group of very conservative Republicans," he said. "When they passed bills with the veto-proof majority with a lot of Democrats voting for it, that I couldn't stop, all of a sudden we turn out to be maniacal deregulators. I mean, come on."

The reinstatement of Glass-Steagall has become something liberal -- and some conservative -- leaders have championed since its repeal and the market crash of 2008.

Clinton's top progressive challengers in the 2016 Democratic field, Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders and former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, have pushed for the law to be reinstated. And Sens. Warren, McCain, Maria Cantwell, D-Washington, and Angus King, I-Maine, proposed reinstating the law in 2013.

The next year, the group wrote that "reinstating and strengthening the wall between federally insured commercial banks and investment banks would discourage the largest financial institutions from exploiting regulatory loopholes in order to take excessive risks at taxpayer expense."

Clinton has spent 40% of campaign funds // CNN // Dan Merica – July 15, 2015

Hillary Clinton's campaign filed it's first report with the Federal Election Commission on Wednesday, stating that they raised a substantial $47 million, but spent roughly 40% of that.

Clinton, whose campaign has been focused on raising money for the primary, brought in $46,725,329.13, according to the report. Some donors, however, sent the campaign money twice the $2,700 primary donation minimum, leading the campaign to raise $824,620.51 in general election contributions.

The campaign has spent heavily, though. While they have about $29 million in cash-on-hand, they spent about $19 million in their first quarter as a campaign, giving the campaign a burn rate of 40%.

Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, by comparison, spent 22% of the money his campaign raised.

Clinton's 40% burn rate is far higher than her first quarter as a candidate in 2007. During that quarter -- from January to March in 2007 -- Clinton raised $36 million and only spent about $5 million, giving that campaign a 14% burn rate.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In the second quarter of 2007, Clinton's campaign brought in $27 million and spent about $13 million, giving it a 47% burn rate.

Clinton campaign manager Robby Mook said thanks to their 250,000 donors, the campaign has "had the ability to make critical investments in our organization that will put us in position to win the primary and the White House."

"With Republicans tapping their billionaire backers for unlimited sums of money, we are glad to be able to have such broad support to be able to show why Hillary Clinton is the only candidate who will fight for policies that allow everyday Americans to get ahead and stay ahead," Mook said.

A release from Clinton's campaign said 94% of their donations were $250 or less, with an average donation of $144.89. Sixty-one percent of the donors, the campaign said, came from women.

Clinton and her team have focused intently on raising money during their first quarter, criss-crossing the country at a frenetic pace. Clinton personally headlined 58 fundraisers in 18 states in the three-month quarter, a sizable number for a frontrunner. Her campaign aides headlined a number of other fundraisers.

Hillary for America's high burn rate smacks against campaign aides's claims of being thrifty. For much of the quarter, aides joked and bragged about spending little money, providing journalists with anecdotes about taking the bus, not the train, and not being given business cards.

"It is a big dollar number," an aide said Wednesday as the FEC report was filed. "But we have more cash on hand than any other campaign by far. We feel good about where we are. Robby and the whole team made a plan and executed on that plan and it was about spending smartly and spending in ways that make sense. We are very comfortable with where things are and how we are moving."

Despite the burn rate, Clinton still far outpaces her Democratic opponents.

Sanders raised about $14 million during the quarter, $1.5 million of which came from his Senate committee, according to his campaign's FEC report. Former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, who was a candidate for 30 days this quarter, raised $2 million, according to his campaign.

Hillary Clinton video pushes pathway to citizenship // CNN // Tanzina Vega – July 15, 2015

Hillary Clinton continued to amplify her support for a pathway to citizenship, particularly for young Latino immigrants commonly known as DREAMers, in a new campaign video released Wednesday morning.

In the video, called "Sueños" or "Dreams," Clinton is seen meeting with a small group of young Latino immigrants at a roundtable discussion she held at Rancho High School in Las Vegas who are telling her about their goals for the future. One young woman, Betsaida Frausto, who arrived in the United States when she was two, tells Clinton she wants to go to Yale and become a doctor but won't be able to fully realize her dream because she is not a citizen. Another young man, Rafael Lopez, who arrived when he was one, tells the story of how his parents were deported after being in the United States for 15 years.

"I'm not about to let anybody who can make a contribution to our economy and our society get thrown away," Clinton tells the group.

In addition to scenes from Clinton's meeting with the DREAMers, the video contains scenes from a Clinton campaign rally where a young woman addresses the crowd in Spanish.

The Clinton campaign released the bilingual video one day after Clinton addressed a crowd of thousands of Latinos at the National Council of La Raza in Kansas City. In her speech there, she called for a clear path to citizenship for young immigrants and highlighted economic inequities Latinos face in the United States including the millions of Latino youth that cannot find work and the fact that Latinas make just 56 cents on the dollar compared to white men.

Clinton also called out Republican presidential hopeful Jeb Bush for comments he made about Americans having to work harder.

"He should tell that to the farmworkers breaking their backs picking fruit in Southern California," Clinton said to a rousing applause from the crowd.

Bush aides have argued that his comments were taken out of context and said he meant that more part-time workers need full-time jobs.

In addition to her speech at La Raza, the largest Latino civil rights group in the country, Clinton has also met with officials in the Congressional Hispanic Caucus. Last month Clinton addressed the National Association of Latino Elected and Appointed Officials in Las Vegas where she accused the entire GOP field of seeking to relegate immigrants to "second-class status."

Hillary Clinton campaign's 'highest priority': Getting email addresses // CNN // Dan Merica – July 15, 2015

A lot changes in seven years. Just ask Hillary Clinton's campaign.

When Clinton launched her campaign in April, her staff -- armed with the list of 2.5 million email addresses from the former secretary of state's failed 2008 campaign -- hit send on their first 2016 message.

The realization they received shortly after that stunned them: Less than 100,000 of Clinton's 2008 emails addresses were still active and usable.

Teddy Goff, Clinton's top digital strategist, had thought going into the campaign that around 1 million of the 2008 emails would still be active. But the realization that only a fraction of those emails still worked was a slightly sour point on an otherwise "successful" day for the campaign, he said.

"It wasn't as if we all kind of retreated into a bunker to drown our sorrows or anything like that," Goff said Wednesday. "In the midst of that day, discovering that we were really rebuilding a list virtually from scratch, it was a realization that there was going to be a tough road ahead."

To respond to this problem, Goff and the campaign launched what they dubbed The "Hillbuilder Project," an internal campaign push that urged all staff members to think about and act on how they could build the campaign's email list. Goff called building the email list the "the single highest priority, for now" on the tech and digital side of the campaign.

Signs were put up around the Brooklyn headquarters that read, "What are you doing to grow the list today?" Organizers in New Hampshire, Iowa and other states were urged to get emails from everyone they spoke with and add them to the database. And at an all staff meeting on June 12, the day before Clinton's first big rally in New York, campaign manager Robby Mook included list building as one of the campaign's top three priorities for the summer.

"This is not just a digital thing," Goff said, "this is a campaign priority."

The campaign's goal, Goff added, was to provide "relevant content" and allow people to connect with the campaign so that they can "provide an experience that people are going to like."

Part of that is content that taps into the news of the day. Most campaigns do this: A big news event happens, so the team blasts out an email and post social media content that looks to build their list.

When the Supreme Court decided to make same sex marriage legal in all 50 state, Clinton's campaign sent an email -- subject line: "Full Hearts" -- that asked people to "celebrate history" by adding their name to a list. The campaign made similar pitches on Twitter and Facebook, including a video titled "Equal" about gay marriage that received more than 3 million views on Facebook.

The goal of these emails and lists is to make people who support Clinton feel like they are missing out by not being on the list, campaign aides have said about their digital strategy.

Another way Clinton's campaign grew the list was by swapping with other groups, including Ready for Hillary, the super PAC that spent 2013 and 2014 urging Clinton to run. While the super PAC had a number of priorities, including engaging grassroots organizers who wanted to support Clinton, Ready for Hillary's top aides long said that their main focus was building a sizable list of current and engaged Clinton devotees.

The campaign gained access to the Ready for Hillary email list in May and started to use it for fundraising and other pitches shortly thereafter. But Goff said Wednesday that while the list was helpful, it couldn't make up for name generated by the actual campaign.

"I think all of us are very appreciative of Ready for Hillary and what they did," Goff said. "It has been valuable, but at the same time, it is incumbent on us to build our own community."

He added, "The fact of the matter is an email address that an entity acquired on its own either by a petition or by an online ad is always going to be a little bit more active and engaged than an email address that is acquired by the way of a swap."

The biggest reason email lists matter is fundraising. Previous presidential campaigns, including President Barack

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Obama's 2008 and 2012 campaigns, have raised huge sums of money through email and online fundraising. Goff was the digital director of President Obama's 2012 reelection bid.

Like other campaigns, Clinton's operation will release their first FEC report on Wednesday. Campaign aides have already previewed that they raised over $45 million in primary money during their first quarter, part of that through digital fundraising. The FEC report, however, will not itemize what money came on line, however, and what came through other venues.

Campaign aides also would not disclose the current size of their list or goals they have for the list building project. Goff did say, however, that the campaign is "more concerned with the output of the list than with the size of the list."

"We would rather have a couple million really good email addresses by election day," he said, "than 15 million really bad ones."

Clinton campaign rebuilds from a digital meltdown // LA Times // Michael A. Memoli – July 16, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton wound down her political operation in 2008 with 2.5 million email addresses in her campaign database. Seven years later, when campaign officials turned on the lights in April, they were stunned to find fewer than 100,000 still worked.

Campaign aides learned the bad news in much the same way a reunion organizer trying to reconnect with old friends might, albeit on a much larger scale: an in-box clogged with bounce-back messages on the day Clinton announced her campaign and sent messages to supporters.

The huge attrition of valuable data is not unique to Clinton -- a typical email list will lose 1 in 5 subscribers each year, said Jordan Cohen, chief marketing officer for Fluent, which specializes in email list acquisition. But it created one of the first big challenges for the campaign's growing digital team and sparked a response that illustrates the high priority campaigns now place on acquiring digital data.

"It wasn't like we all had time to retreat to a local bar and drown our sorrows," said Teddy Goff, the Clinton campaign's digital director – a role he also filled for President Obama's reelection campaign. "It was an instantaneous recognition on the part of a lot of us that we had a bigger challenge ahead of us than we realized."

Rebuilding that digital infrastructure became one of the most critical goals that campaign officials set this year, prompting what became known as the "Hillbuilder" program.

During the campaign's first all-staff meeting, on the day before Clinton's public campaign launch on Roosevelt Island in June, campaign manager Robby Mook identified building the email list as one of the top three goals in the year's third quarter. On the cubicle walls of the offices used by the digital staff, a sign asks: "What are you doing to grow the list today?"

In 2012, Obama's reelection campaign, which boasted 30 million addresses at its peak, raised $485 million – more than 40% of its total haul – through its endless, and often parodied, email appeals, according to a former campaign official who provided the internal fundraising data on condition of anonymity. The rest of the fundraising total was split equally between major donors and direct marketing through traditional mail and phone contacts.

Increasingly sophisticated methods for analyzing large amounts of data have made emails more and more valuable to campaigns, and not just as a vehicle for direct communication. The ability to track a user's online experience helps the campaign develop a profile that is then used to send more-targeted communications.

"The campaigns are looking at not just 'are they going to contribute $1, $10 when I send them an email,' but 'are they opening, are they clicking, are they forwarding this email to their friends. Are they taking the email and posting it onto social,'" Cohen said. "There is just inherent value in having engagement that will lead, hopefully, into votes."

The Clinton campaign's digital handicap wasn't limited to its email lists. The former secretary of State had no Facebook page, no Instagram account and only 3.3 million Twitter followers at her launch date (President Obama's campaign-run account has more than 60 million today, by comparison).

The campaign would not disclose how much its list has grown since April. But it has reached 5 million followers across its accounts on Facebook, Twitter, Instagram, LinkedIn, Spotify and Pinterest, officials said.

The campaign launched each of those platforms over the last few months, with a goal of reaching would-be supporters where they normally spend time online and creating a ripple effect that would expand their contact lists.

One early, successful tactic was to create a daily, rapid-response-style newsletter that supporters could subscribe to called “The Briefing,” launched to coincide with a new book critical of the Clinton Foundation.

The campaign also sought to build suspense around the Roosevelt Island rally by promising exclusive details about the event to those who signed up on Clinton’s website. And last week, Clinton emailed supporters inviting them to tell her when their birthdays are, so she – or her digital avatar, at least -- can send a note when the day arrives.

“We're part of a team together,” the email read. “We're going to work hard and have a lot of fun through it all. Part of that is taking some time to celebrate and appreciate each other, and that’s what I’d like to do on your birthday.”

The idea, Goff said, grew out of the fact – attested to by her own, now public, emails – that Clinton has always gone out of her way to offer birthday wishes to those around her. A successful digital effort, he noted, depends on the authenticity of each communication.

“That’s a true thing about her that reflects something that we think people are going to enjoy that can also be turned into an online program that’s going to help us build our community,” he said.

Expanding the digital infrastructure isn’t just happening organically, of course. The campaign also engaged in more transactional efforts, including exchanging active contacts with the Ready for Hillary organization. They have also already spent $2 million on an online advertising campaign that has helped add names to the list.

“The core of what we’re trying to do is serve people with an experience that they’re going to enjoy, that’s going to enlighten them and hopefully inspire them to get more deeply involved in the campaign,” Goff said.

Hillary Clinton's campaign raised nearly $47 million in first quarter // CBS // Julianna Goldman and Steve Chaggaris – July 15, 2015

Democratic frontrunner Hillary Clinton has filed her first fundraising report to the Federal Election Commission (FEC), and her campaign says that she raised $46.7 million in primary dollars, a record for an opening quarter in a campaign.

She has also spent a sizable amount - among the expenditures is $18.6 million on gearing up for the campaign ahead - voter files for the first four early-voting states - a one-time cost - plus organizers, technology and list-building. Still, Clinton had plenty of cash on hand at the end of the fundraising period, about $28.8 million.

The Clinton campaign says that more than 250,000 contributors representing every state and Washington, D.C. donated and 94 percent of the donations were $250 or less, with the average donation coming in at just under $145. Sixty-one percent of the donors were women.

Clinton herself made $278,000 in in-kind contributions, mostly to pay staff working with her during the testing-the-waters, including Huma Abedin, Robby Mook, and Nick Merrill)

The previous record for primary money raised in a candidate's first quarter was set by President Obama's 2012 reelection campaign, which pulled in $41.9 million during three months in 2011.

The fundraising total does not include the money raked in by a number of Clinton-friendly outside groups, like super PACs, non-profit organizations, and others.

Clinton's campaign fundraising may be record-breaking, but its super PAC numbers - which have not been released yet - are not expected to be as robust for the second quarter, a Clinton campaign official told CBS News.

Clinton, the Democratic frontrunner in 2016, formally launched her campaign in mid-April.

Hillary Clinton comes out in favor of Obama’s Iran deal // CBS // Stephanie Condon – July 15, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton on Tuesday night clarified that she supports the agreement that President Obama's administration and its world partners have reached with Iran to freeze its nuclear program.

"I support this agreement because I believe it is the most effective path of all the alternatives available to the U.S. and our partners to prevent Iran from acquiring a nuclear weapon," she said.

Her statement Tuesday night went a step further than her remarks earlier in the day, when Clinton she stressed

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

she needed to learn more about the deal's details. She said Tuesday morning that based on what she knew at the time, the deal was "an important step in putting the lid on Iran's nuclear program."

GOP 2016 candidates put onus on Congress, Hillary Clinton to reject Iran deal
In her latest statement, Clinton added that she is still "studying the details."

"But based on the briefings I received and a review of the documents, I support the agreement because it can help us prevent Iran from getting a nuclear weapon," she continued. "With vigorous enforcement, unyielding verification, and swift consequences for any violations, this agreement can make the United States, Israel, and our Arab partners safer."

Given Iran's past behavior, she said, "the highest priority must be given to effective enforcement of the agreement. Signing is just the beginning."

She argued that her experience shaping the deal as secretary of state will help her enforce it if she wins in 2016.

"As Secretary of State, I logged tens of thousands of miles and twisted a lot of arms to build a global coalition to impose the most crippling sanctions in history," she said. "That unprecedented pressure delivered a blow to Iran's economy and gave us leverage at the negotiating table, starting in Oman in 2012. I know from experience what it took to build a global effort to get this done; I know what it will take to rally our partners to enforce it."

While Clinton signaled her endorsement of the deal earlier in the day, the Republican National Committee (RNC) suggested the Democratic frontrunner was trying to keep an ambiguous position. The RNC spotlighted one report in which a reporter asked Clinton's staff whether she fell "somewhere on a spectrum between support and opposition."

Clinton's spokesman responded, "Everybody lives somewhere between support and opposition."

Meanwhile, as Republicans work to thwart the deal, the RNC continues to refer to it as the "Clinton-Obama nuclear agreement."

Is Hillary Clinton all talk, no substance on climate policy? // MSNBC // Tony Dokoupil – July 15, 2015

“She spoke on climate. She is into it,” enthused one lawmaker.

“She was incredible,” swooned another, a climate-minded senator.

“Hillary Clinton wants to run on climate. And she thinks Democrats should too,” blared a headline in National Journal.

By Wednesday afternoon, word of Hillary Clinton’s closed-door luncheon this week with House and Senate Democrats was everywhere. But while the Democratic presidential candidate covered a long list of hot-button issues, her climate change policy — quite literally the hottest issue of all — seemed to dominate the political reactions.

The only problem is, well, Hillary Clinton doesn’t actually have a climate change policy.

There are precisely five mentions of the word on her entire campaign website, none particularly illuminating. There’s talk of “adapting for tomorrow” with “domestic action” and “intensive global engagement” on “the global threat of climate change.”

How exactly will all this happen? Clinton doesn’t say.

There are precisely five mentions of the word on her entire campaign website, none particularly illuminating.

Her competitor Bernie Sanders brought up that lack of detail in his own impromptu press conference in the Capitol on Tuesday. For the socialist junior senator from Vermont, it’s unacceptable for Clinton to smile-and-wave her way through issues of “planetary” importance. All the major environmental groups are likely to feel the same way.

“Our movement is looking for a candidate who has the political courage to move us off fossil fuels in time to avert catastrophic global warming,” Karthik Ganapathy, a spokesperson for 350 Action, said in an email. “Given her murky history on this issue, Hillary Clinton needs to do a lot to show us that’s her.”

“We aren’t going to give her a demerit for failing to give a big climate speech by this date,” added Michael Brune, the executive director of the Sierra Club. “But we are looking for an agenda that’s bold, ambitious, and – hopefully – coming soon."

There's no doubting that Clinton appreciates the problem. She's called climate change "one of the defining threats of our time," and suggested she'd like to take more money from carbon polluters and funnel it toward clean energy. In a statement to Politico, a spokesperson for Clinton promised there would be more details to come.

For now, however, the best we can do is return to the rare details that she's already put down on the record. There is good news and bad news for environmentalists, and it all starts with a simple fact: Hillary Clinton is very likely to be a third term of President Barack Obama when it comes to climate policies.

Her campaign chair is John Podesta, one of Obama's closest advisers on climate policy. She also defends Obama's controversial policies on coal-fired power plants, which he has pursued without congressional support. That's the good news for the greens.

Hillary Clinton is very likely to be a third term of President Barack Obama when it comes to climate policies.

Obama has been aggressive when it comes to cutting carbon emissions, and Clinton has said she'll not only protect his legacy but extend it. Here's a passage environmentalists can love from her speech last December at the League of Conservation voters:

"You pushed for and rallied behind President Obama's use of the Clean Air Act to set the first ever federal limits on carbon pollution from existing power plants, which are driving the most dangerous effects of climate change. As you know so well, power plants account for about 40% of the carbon pollution in the United States, and therefore must be addressed. And the unprecedented action that President Obama has taken must be protected at all cost."

That's a big deal. Obama's proposed regulations have already been attacked by Republicans, and a Republican president would almost certainly weaken or repeal them. The battle to preserve Obama's policy is important because it will help determine how many coal plants close in the near future.

The more coal plants that close, the better chance we have of lowering U.S. greenhouse gas emissions by 17% by 2020, and as much as 28% by 2025. The more that we lower those emissions, the more likely it is that other nations will follow. In turn, the more likely it will be that world will really — seriously, no joke — slow the rise of the oceans and help the planet correct its course before it's too late.

If Clinton is a third-term of Obama, however, there's also a lot still to be desired. She supports clean energy, for instance, but like Obama she seems to favor an "all of the above" approach to energy production. That means expanded offshore drilling, which Clinton supported as a senator in 2006.

It also means more use of hydraulic fracturing, also known as fracking, to slurp up previously trapped oil and natural gas. She promoted the practice abroad when she was secretary of state, according to reporting by Grist and Mother Jones. That's a deal-breaker for some voters, no matter how well she eventually defines her "smart regulations."

The biggest deal-breakers of all, however, are all still pending. What is Clinton's position on continued drilling in the Arctic? What does she think about the proposed construction of the Keystone XL pipeline? She hasn't taken a stance on either project yet. But activists have come out in force to fight both, and unless Clinton falls in line — and soon — they might end up fighting her as well.

Hillary Clinton Releases Campaign Fundraising Report // MSNBC // Alex Seitz-Wald - July 16 2015

Clinton Stops Short of Fully Supporting Iran Deal, Calls It An 'Important Step' 0:39
Women made it rain for Hillary Clinton in the first three months of her presidential campaign — representing more than 60 percent of the donors who supported the former secretary of state.

The campaign had already announced that it raised $45 million for the Democratic primary as of June 30, but a new campaign finance report made public Wednesday evening sheds new light on the campaign's haul.

More than 250,000 people contributed to Clinton, according to the campaign, and 61 percent were women. That's especially notable since men typically make up the vast majority of campaign donors — just over 70 percent, according to the Center for Responsive Politics.

The campaign also raised almost $825,000 in money that can only be used for the general election. That brought the total haul to more than $46 million.

But the campaign also spent heavily, burning through $18.7 million in the second quarter of the year, leaving the campaign with $28.85 million in the bank. A campaign aide defended the spending, telling msnbc that it included large upfront investments that won't need to be repeated in coming months on items that most campaigns wait to invest in until later in the cycle.

While Clinton held dozens of high-dollar fundraisers across the country, her small-dollar fundraising operation also proved successful. According to the campaign, 94 percent of donations were for $250 or less, and the average donation was $144.89.

Clinton herself contributed in-kind more than $275,000 to her campaign, mostly from staffers she paid before the campaign officially kicked off, the aide said.

Hillary Clinton enjoys a warm welcome in Washington // MSNBC // Alex Seitz-Wald – July 14, 2015

So far on the trail of her second presidential campaign, Hillary Clinton has spent days meeting with bowling alley owners in Iowa and passing out ice cream cones in New Hampshire.

But on Tuesday, she took her campaign to Washington, where Clinton returned to the playing field where she may be at her strongest – marble floors, behind closed-doors. Hoping to lock down support from Democratic lawmakers and labor unions, Clinton showed her strength at playing the inside game.

Her whirlwind day in Washington began early with breaking news on Iran's nuclear program, did not relent as she met with Democratic members of Congress – including her top rival for the Democratic nomination – and continued into the evening with an audition before leaders of the nation's largest organized labor group.

As the nation's capitol was processing the national security breakthrough, Clinton returned to Capitol Hill with a cadre of heavyweight political aides in tow for six separate meetings with various groups of Democratic lawmakers.

In between, she spoke to reporters about her position on the Iran deal, calling it an "important step." After that, between more meetings with House Democrats, she dialed into a conference call with three current cabinet officials and several former secretaries of state to learn more about the deal, a briefing made available to her by her status as a former secretary of state.

And after she left the Capitol, Clinton headed to the offices of the AFL-CIO to pitch herself to the executive council of the massive labor federation, hoping to earn their endorsement.

It's unclear when – or if – Clinton even had time to eat. By the time she made it across the Capitol to meet with Senate Democrats during their weekly luncheon, she had missed the meal. "She got there late, she didn't get lunch," said Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid.

One Senate Democrat left the room early. It was Sen. Bernie Sanders, who is challenging Clinton for the Democratic nomination, but has found more enthusiastic support at large rallies in places like Madison, Wisconsin than among his colleagues in the halls of Congress.

“I have known Secretary Clinton for 25 years, since she was first lady. I served with her in the Senate. I like and respect Hillary Clinton,” he told reporters at a press conference. “But there are differences of opinion that we have which should be the basis for a serious discussion.”

“I helped lead the effort to stop the deregulation of Wall Street. I believe the biggest banks should be broken up and that Glass-Steagall financial regulations should be reinstated. To the best of my knowledge, she isn’t for either one,” he said.

Sanders was respectful inside the luncheon and stood and applauded for Clinton other senators said. Meanwhile, Clinton has already secured the support of almost two-thirds of Sanders’ Democratic colleagues, according to one tally.

That’s a stark contrast to last time Clinton ran for the presidency, when the caucus split and many of her fellow senators were supporting her then-colleague, Barack Obama.

The defectors included leaders like Reid – who declined to endorse Clinton today out of loyalty to Vice President Joe Biden – and some of the lawmakers who hailed Clinton’s visit today. House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi quietly supported Obama then, but exchanged kisses with Clinton today in front of the cameras, and said she couldn’t wait for the candidate to enter the White House.

Among others, Clinton received almost uniformly positive reviews, even from lawmakers who have been skeptical of her in the past.

“She expressed values that are very consistent with the Progressive Caucus,” said Rep. Keith Ellison, the chairman of the Congressional Progressive Caucus, who had hoped Sen. Elizabeth Warren would throw her hat in the ring.

“No matter where people end up gong, they’re two awesome progressives, in our view,” said Ellison of Clinton and Sanders.

Clinton had initially not scheduled a meeting with the Progressive Caucus, but added it later. Thirty-eight of its liberal members turned out to meet the candidate, according to a congressional aide.

After a different meeting, Rep. Louise Slaughter, a Clinton ally who represents New York was asked if she thought Democratic lawmakers might side with Sanders. “Bernie Sanders is running as an independent, I think, isn’t he?” she told reporters. “I remember quite well hearing he was not a Democrat, so I’m not exactly clear why he’s running on our ticket to be honest with you.”

Clinton twice led a stampede of reporters through the entire length of the Capitol building, as she moved from the House to the Senate and back again.

The train behind grew as more staffers and reporters attached themselves, meandering through a throng of iPhone-wielding tourists in rotunda who screamed for selfies with the candidate. But Clinton kept a brisk pace as her entourage pressed itself through narrow stairwells.

The former secretary of state was not the only fair-haired celebrity allegedly spotted in Congress today. Rumors swirled that singer Taylor Swift, in Washington for a two-night stand, had come to the Hill.

A persistent lack of sighting of the pop star did not stop some – including members of Congress – from hoping for a selfie of the two. “Staff tell me @taylorswift13 is roaming Capitol Hill. @HillaryClinton can you confirm? We could do a selfie,” tweeted Rep. Debbie Dingell.

Hillary Clinton’s Resurrection // New Yorker // Nicholas Lemann – July 15, 2015

The twenty-first-century boom in new translations of the great nineteenth-century Russian novels has not encompassed one significant work: the last of Leo Tolstoy’s three full-length novels, “Resurrection,” originally published in 1899. The English translation of “Resurrection” that is easiest to find is the first, from 1900, by the Tolstoy acolyte Louise Maude, and there hasn’t been a new one in decades.

It’s easy to see why this is so. Both “War and Peace” and “Anna Karenina” have Tolstoy-like characters—Pierre Bezukhov and Konstantin Levin—who chafe at the self-satisfaction, relentless social striving, and oppressive economic underpinnings of the Russian aristocracy into which they were born. Both are drawn to reformist spiritual and political ideas. But in “Resurrection” the main character, Dmitri Nekhlyudov, another landowning aristocrat, goes a step further, into what appears to be full-bore rejection of his world and its values. He institutes land reform on his estates, and leaves the Russia of cities and country homes to undertake a long eastward journey to Siberia, where a household servant he seduced and abandoned years earlier has been unjustly imprisoned.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Where “War and Peace” and “Anna Karenina” presented the life of a corrupt society with astonishing richness and subtlety, “Resurrection” is relentlessly preachy, prudish, and joyless.

There is a strain of American liberalism that offers government as a sensible, useful way to make society function better than it does now—as a problem-solving instrument that conservatives are too stubbornly prejudiced to employ. That is Bill Clinton’s liberalism. And then there’s the Tolstoyan strain, in which it’s evident that society works well only for a fortunate minority, whose elaborately enjoyed well-being may even have come at the expense of the majority. Tolstoyan liberalism is, like its namesake, élite liberalism—more Franklin Roosevelt (who grew up on an American inherited dacha farmed by peasants) than Eugene Debs, or for that matter Elizabeth Warren. Tolstoy offers a harsh critique, but from an insider’s perspective; it treats the system as deeply flawed, but not as utterly alien. In her 2016 Presidential campaign, Hillary Clinton has been publicly flirting with Tolstoyan liberalism.

Long before she announced her candidacy, Clinton surrounded herself with advisers from the liberal wing of the Democratic Party, and banished the centrists who controlled her last campaign. Her April announcement video and first campaign speech last month hinted at a left-populist direction that continued, with more bite, in her first big economic-policy address this week. This wasn’t where her husband had ever gone, or where she had been in 2008.

Has she decided never again to be in the thankless position of running as a moderate in a Democratic primary campaign, no matter how prohibitive her lead? Is Bernie Sanders’s surge in the first two primary states pushing her leftward? Is she seeing research that indicates, or just concluding instinctively, that the financial crisis changed the way Americans think about the economy? Does she finally feel free to express what have always been her opinions?

This week’s speech left the answers to such questions where they usually are with Clinton—tantalizingly uncertain. She left all but a few specifics of her economic policies to be unveiled in speeches to come, and she made sure to praise small business, entrepreneurship, and investment. But she criticized Wall Street by name and by specific practices (her Web site has a section called “Rein in Wall Street”), and criticized Uber and AirbnB, sacred causes in Silicon Valley, without naming them, by saying that their advent is “raising hard questions about workplace protections and what a good job will look like in the future.” This demonstrates a willingness to risk alienating the subcultures where some of the Democratic Party’s biggest donors dwell. (On Friday, President Obama will appear at a fund-raiser at the San Francisco home of Shervin Pishevar, one of Uber’s founding investors.) And there was no commensurate implicit challenge to organized labor, which both Clintons and Obama have tangled with in the past.

It felt as if Clinton were crossing a line, policy specifics or no, in the way she was choosing to frame economic questions. First, she made it clear that the traditionally safe zone for American political discourse about the economy—calling for equality of opportunity, not equality of result—was no longer sufficient for her. Her target is “strong and steady income growth” for ordinary working people, which can presumably be measured only by how much money people wind up with, not how fair a chance they had to make it. And second, she at least toyed with the theme of resentment of the rich—another area Democratic politicians of the past generation, including Clinton herself, have generally avoided—as when she responded to Jeb Bush’s exhortation to Americans to work longer hours by saying, “Let him tell that to the nurse who stands on her feet all day or the trucker who drives all night. Let him tell that to the fast-food workers marching in the streets for better pay. They don’t need a lecture—they need a raise.”

Tolstoy, even though he was deep into his final holy-moralist phrase, didn’t quite know what to do with Nekhlyudov at the end of “Resurrection.” Having set out on his Siberian journey resolved to give everything away and to marry his wronged former mistress, the hero is perhaps relieved to learn that she refuses to marry him. He’s free, and it seems possible that he might return to some version of the former life he had been determined to reject. He still seems more comfortable at a dinner party than in the company of the political prisoners he encounters in the proto-gulag.

Hillary Clinton wasn’t born an aristocrat, but she functions as one now, and, assuming she becomes a major-party nominee, she can only take her new and rather profound critique of how well American society functions so far. She won’t, and can’t, run, or live, as a radical. So it’s a question of finding the right equipoise. The practice of American politics almost always requires rhetorical optimism; the practice of liberal American politics now seems also to require just the right measure of opprobrium directed at the way our country is run. What’s interesting about Clinton’s struggle to find the balance is that she is struggling to find it, as she hasn’t in the past. And it will be even more interesting to see what she does with it, if she gets the chance to govern.

Hillary Clinton Becomes First 2016 Candidate To Release Bundler Names // HuffPo // Paul Blumenthal – July 15, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton released the names of 159 campaign bundlers on Wednesday, the first 2016 contender to disclose big-money fundraisers.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The bundlers include many of the names appearing on fundraising invitations sent out over the past three months by the Clinton campaign. Many of these people were bundlers for Clinton's last presidential bid in 2008.

Clinton is the first candidate in the crowded 2016 race to disclose bundlers. Two Republican candidates, Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, and Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, said they will disclose their bundlers in October. Republican Sens. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) and Ted Cruz (R-Texas), won't voluntarily disclose their bundlers.

Clinton's list of bundlers was limited to those who had helped raise $100,000 or more. The campaign also reported on Wednesday that it had raised $47.5 million and spent $18.7 million since its launch on April 4. The minimum total amount raised by her bundlers was $15.9 million.

Among the names are Esprit founder Susie Tompkins Buell; Comcast lobbyist David Cohen; hedge funders Blair Effron, Orin Kramer and Marc Lasry; Chicago billionaires J.B.Pritzker and M.K. Pritzker; Hollywood honcho and Israel booster Haim Saban; trial lawyer and medical marijuana proponent John Morgan; and The New Republic owner Chris Hughes and his husband Sean Eldridge.

Lynn Forrest de Rothschild is back as a Clinton bundler in 2016. After Clinton's loss to Barack Obama in the 2008 primary, de Rothschild flipped her support to Republican presidential candidate John McCain. She backed former Utah Gov. Jon Huntsman in the 2012 Republican primary, and Mitt Romney in the 2012 general election.

A number of members of Congress, current and former, are among Clinton's bundlers. They include Reps. Joaquin Castro (D-Texas), Grace Meng (D-N.Y.), Jim Himes (D-Conn.) and former Sen. Evan Bayh (D-Ind.).

One notable bundler is Gordon Giffin, a former lobbyist for the Canadian company working to build the Keystone XL pipeline. Giffin is also on the board of the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, which paid Clinton $990,000 for speeches she gave immediately before announcing her presidential campaign.

Clinton also disclosed, in a filing with the Federal Election Commission, a list of 40 registered lobbyists who had raised a combined $2 million for her campaign. The lobbyists included some, like Steve Elmendorf, who appeared on her list of $100,000-plus Hillblazers, and others, like former senator-turned-lobbyist Robert Torricelli (D-N.J.), who did not.

The top lobbyist bundlers were FTI Consulting's Jackson Dunn, with $231,554; Elmendorf, with $141,815; Capitol Counsel's David Jones, with $120,675; and McGuireWoods's Andrew Smith and Jim Hodges, with $133,350 and $106,750, respectively.

Clinton In 2011: Iran Only Has Right To Enrich After Nuclear Weapons Program "Irreversibly Shut Down" // BuzzFeed // Christopher Massie – July 15, 2015

Hillary Clinton said in 2011 that it was her and the Obama administration's position that Iran would not have a right to enrich uranium until it had "irreversibly shut down its nuclear weapons program."

On Tuesday, as a Democratic presidential candidate, Clinton endorsed a deal that would restrict Iran's nuclear fuel for 15 years, while allowing it to continue to enrich uranium at levels well below bomb-grade, in exchange for the removal of economic sanctions.
At a hearing of the House Committee of Foreign Affairs on March 1, 2011, Ohio Congressman Steve Chabot asked then-Secretary of State Clinton whether the administration believed that "the current regime should be allowed to enrich or reprocess domestically."

Clinton did not specifically answer the question with regard to the regime of the time, which, below Supreme Leader Ayatollah Khamenei, was led by President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who was widely seen as less open to compromise than current President Hassan Rouhani. Clinton did, however, say that Iran would have such a right "sometime in the future," if it met certain conditions, such as the irreversible shutdown of its nuclear weapons program.

"Well, Congressman, it has been our position that, under very strict conditions, Iran would sometime in the future, having responded to the international community's concerns and irreversibly shut down its nuclear weapons program, have such a right under IAEA inspection," she said. "I think that is the position of the international community, along with the United States."

Months before, in December 2010, Clinton said to the BBC that the administration had told Iran "that they are entitled to the peaceful use of civil nuclear energy," once they had "restored the confidence of the international community," but did not mention an irreversible shutdown of their weapons program as a prerequisite for that.

On the other hand, in a story published in August 2014, Clinton told Jeffrey Goldberg of The Atlantic that "I've always been in the camp that held that they did not have a right to enrichment" and that the assertion of such a

Of the deal reached on Tuesday, which is now awaiting Congressional action, Clinton said, “I support this agreement because I believe it is the most effective path of all the alternatives available to the U.S. and our partners to prevent Iran from acquiring a nuclear weapon.”

Bill Clinton apologized for his 1994 crime bill, but he still doesn’t get why it was bad // Vox // Dara Lind – July 15, 2015

Hillary Clinton is campaigning on, among other things, an end to the era of mass incarceration. Awkwardly, Bill Clinton, former president of the United States, signed a law in 1994 that did a lot to accelerate mass incarceration.

Bill Clinton has been doing a lot to demonstrate that he has seen the error of his ways, and supports his wife's reform efforts. He's made several statements acknowledging the errors of the 1994 crime bill he passed. And speaking to the NAACP on Wednesday, July 15, Clinton put it as bluntly as he ever has: "I signed a bill that made the problem worse. And I want to admit that."

He's right. But does he understand how it made the problem worse? He didn't in May, when he told The Hill:

"We have too many people in prison. And we wound up spending — putting so many people in prison that there wasn’t enough money left to educate them, train them for new jobs and increase the chances when they came out that they could live productive lives."

That was a problem! But that is not the problem that Clinton's bill made worse.

There were two big reasons the prison population rose so drastically from the 1980s to the late 2000s. One of them was, yes, that more people went to prison. But the other was that the people who went to prison were going for longer.

This chart is a little hard to read, because the red line for murder sentences is so bright and distracting. But there were very few murder sentences compared to other crimes. Instead, check out the more gradual, but definite, sentence increases for other crimes:

The 1994 crime bill Clinton signed was a big reason for the second trend: longer prison terms. The law used funding for new prisons as a way to pressure states to get rid of parole and adopt "truth-in-sentencing" laws that required prisoners to serve out their sentences. Since states are responsible for much more incarceration than the federal government, this was one of the more influential things the federal government could do.

And it worked. When Clinton signed the bill, five states had truth-in-sentencing laws. In 1995, 11 new states passed them. Another 13 states passed truth-in-sentencing laws in the next five years. (Many of these states didn't explicitly say they were doing it to go after federal funding, and some of them didn't ask for it.)

That didn't just end up taking up money that could have been used for prison programming, to help people "live productive lives" when they got out. It deliberately forced them to spend more of their lives in prison. They had less of a chance to live productive lives after release, because they had less of their lives to live.

A lot of the progress that's been made at the state level over the past several years has been aimed at reducing the length of prison sentences — in other words, undoing what states had done during the Clinton era. The Clinton crime bill doesn't deserve all the blame for the push for longer sentences. But that is its lasting legacy.

The Clintons are politicians, and it makes sense that they've shifted their positions in response to the demands of the public and their party. In the 1980s and 1990s, Democrats were afraid of being seen as "soft on crime," and felt that cracking down on crime might help African-American communities; today, Democrats are responding to growing awareness that mass incarceration perpetuates a lot of the problems it's supposed to solve, and a grassroots movement protesting police killings of young, often unarmed black men. Their party is now more worried about policing and prison than swing voters are about crime.

But when it comes to actually proposing solutions, a politician has to do more than understand that something is a problem. That leads to exactly the same kind of "do something" politics that got us into this mess to begin with. Understanding what the solutions will be — and why they might have to include politically difficult measures, like reducing sentences for violent crime — requires understanding why it's a problem.

Lobbyists, lawmakers rake in cash for Hillary // The Hill // Megan R. Wilson – July 15, 2015

More than 100 individuals each helped bundle together $100,000 or more for Hillary Clinton’s presidential run since April, according to an announcement from the campaign Wednesday evening.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Reps. Jim Himes (D-Conn.) and Joaquin Castro (D-Texas) made the list, in addition to lobbyists David Jones of Capitol Counsel and Steve Elmendorf of Elmendorf|Ryan.
The website does not include the exact amount that individuals raised.

Former Sen. Evan Bayh (D-Ind.), who now works as a partner at McGuireWoods, also appears. Bayh, his wife and the firm's political action committee hosted a fundraiser for Clinton last month.
"We had a fantastic turnout and the event was a huge success raising more money than we had expected," L.F. Payne, president of McGuireWoods Consulting, said in a statement.

The Clinton campaign says it raised about $47.5 million in the second quarter — which spans from April to June. It spent about $18.7 million and still has $28.9 million cash on hand.
Bundlers play a key role, especially in presidential races, proving to a candidate that they can bring in much-needed cash needed to keep the expensive operation running.

Campaigns are not required to disclose their bundlers unless they are registered lobbyists, although Clinton and GOP contender Jeb Bush vowed to do so.
Also on Clinton's big bundler list: abortion rights group EMILY'S List, billionaires M.K. and J.B. Pritzker; her campaign's treasurer Jose Villareal, who also works at top law and lobby firm Akin Gump; Morgan Stanley executive and former Deputy Secretary of State Tom Nides – and many others.

More than 250,000 individuals donated to the Clinton campaign, it said in a release Wednesday evening, and 94 percent of those people gave $250 or less.
In the release, campaign manager Robby Mook blasted Republican candidates, saying they had relied on "billionaire backers for unlimited sums of money."
"We are glad to be able to have such broad support to be able to show why Hillary Clinton is the only candidate who will fight for policies that allow everyday Americans to get ahead and stay ahead," he said.
Clinton has two super PACs raising money to support her — Ready PAC and Priorities USA — but they have not yet released the amount they have raised.
The super PAC supporting former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush's bid for the White House recently announced $103 million in donations.

Bush raised $11.4 million in the second quarter, according to newly released reports.

Dems: Benghazi panel has 'abandoned' its work to focus on Hillary // The Hill // Martin Matishak – July 14, 2015

Democrats serving on the House Select Committee on Benghazi say the panel's GOP chairman has "abandoned" plans for hearings to shift the focus of the investigation to Hillary Clinton.

"At the beginning of this year, Select Committee Republicans provided Democrats with detailed information about their plans to hold 11 hearings between January and October on a wide range of topics relating to the Benghazi attacks," the panel's five Democrats wrote Wednesday in a letter to chairman Trey Gowdy (R-S.C.).

"Since then, however, Republicans have completely abandoned this plan — holding no hearings at all since January and instead focusing on former Secretary Hillary Clinton," they added.

The missive gives an outline of the hearings the panel was supposed to convene, including: one in April with former Defense secretaries Robert Gates and Leon Panetta to examine why the U.S. had an outpost in Benghazi, Libya; another in May with Clinton to discuss the same topic; another in July with former U.N. ambassador Susan Rice; and finally one in October to hammer out specific oversight recommendations to help prevent a similar attack from happening in the future.

Gowdy and panel Republicans have maintained that the probe into the 2012 attacks that killed four Americans cannot move forward until the State Department hands over all emails Clinton's top aides.

They have also argued that Clinton should give the private email server she used while in office — which the presidential contender's attorney says has been wiped clean of data — to a third-party to determine if any information can be recovered.

Democrats are upset that no work on the panel has been completed recently.

"The Select Committee has not only postponed its hearings with Secretary Clinton and other State Department witnesses, but it has abandoned all of its other hearings as well, including those examining other agencies like the Department of Defense and the CIA," according to Democrats.

They say the Republican-controlled panel "has not conducted a transcribed interview or deposition of even a single Defense Department employee" and waited until April before sending a document request to the CIA.

"In the past, Republicans have attempted to blame the Select Committee's glacial pace on Secretary Clinton and the State Department. But it seems difficult to understand how they could be responsible for the Select Committee abandoning every single hearing it had planned to hold since January," Democrats said.

"It appears that much of the Select Committee's work has been shelved while Republicans pursue every possible avenue of political attack against Secretary Clinton," they added.

Democrats said the actions by the select committee "which lack any legitimate basis — serve only to delay its work further into the election season and subject it to increasingly widespread criticism for its highly partisan actions."

Clinton's fundraising surpasses $47 million // USA Today // Fredreka Schouten – July 15, 2015

Democrat Hillary Clinton drew more than $47.5 million in donations since announcing her presidential campaign in April and swiftly spent nearly 40% of the money to build her staff and infrastructure in early primary states, figures released Wednesday show.

The vast majority of Clinton's haul — $46 million — is reserved for the primary election, a record amount of primary dollars for a candidate at this point in the election cycle. She started July with nearly $29 million in cash reserves.

Clinton and other presidential candidates filed reports Wednesday detailing their fundraising and spending with the Federal Election Commission. Clinton also voluntarily released a list of 122 individuals and couples who raised money for her campaign, becoming the first 2016 candidate to disclose her bundlers.

The lists includes long-time allies, such as Esprit clothing co-founder Susie Tompkins Buell, and prominent political figures, such as Washington lobbyist Steve Elmendorf and former Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh.

The former secretary of State spent nearly $279,000 of her own money during the "testing the waters" phase of the campaign to help underwrite travel and staff expenses, the filings show.

Clinton, who has not run for office since her 2008 unsuccessful presidential bid, sought to quickly ramp up her political operation this year, buying voter files in the early states and hiring staff to rally voters in states such as Iowa and her Brooklyn, N.Y., headquarters.

In a news release, her aides touted the size of her contribution base, noting that 250,000 donors had given to Clinton. The campaign said six in 10 were women.

The filings show that 17% of her money came in amounts of $200 or less. More than 80% came from donors who gave $2,700 or more, the maximum amount an individual can donate for the primary.

"Thanks to the more than 250,000 Americans who have stepped up to support Hillary Clinton's campaign, we have had the ability to make critical investments in our organization that will put us in position to win the primary and the White House," campaign manager Robby Mook said in a statement.

Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders posted the second-largest haul among Democratic presidential candidates. He raised $15.2 million, more than two-thirds of which came from donors who gave in small amounts.

Republican field is outraising Democrats, boosted by independent groups that can collect unlimited sums. A super PAC supporting Republican Jeb Bush, for instance, has raised more than $103 million. Outside groups backing Clinton have trailed behind, drawing about $24 million.

Hillary Clinton says she called for Wall Street regulations early in the financial crisis // PolitiFact // Lauren Carroll – July 15, 2015

Hillary Clinton has a reputation for being cozy with Wall Street -- but in her 2016 campaign, she's been striking populist tones.

Clinton introduced her plan for a variety of economic issues in a speech at the New School in Manhattan on July 14, 2015. As president, she said, she would go "beyond Dodd-Frank" -- the regulations on financial institutions that took hold in 2010, following the economic crisis of 2007-08.

She said she had been calling for financial regulations since the very early stages of the crisis.

"As we all know, in the years before the crash, financial firms piled risk upon risk, and regulators in Washington either couldn't or wouldn't keep up," she said. "I was alarmed by this gathering storm and called for addressing risks of derivatives, cracking down on subprime mortgages and improving financial oversight."

Clinton used to be the senator from New York, the home of Wall Street. She has a history of campaign backing from the finance industry and of delivering high-priced speeches to finance firms, such as Goldman Sachs. And her husband, former President Bill Clinton, signed the repeal of a bank break-up bill, the Glass-Steagall Act -- a deregulation that some critics believe contributed to the financial crisis.

So we questioned Hillary Clinton's record of addressing financial regulations. Did she address derivatives, subprime mortgages and financial oversight so early in the crisis?

The 2008 primary campaign

While the financial crisis came to a head in summer 2008, problems with housing started to bubble up in 2007 during Clinton's ill-fated presidential primary campaign. On the trail, Clinton addressed these nascent issues -- particularly the mortgage crisis -- as early as March of that year.

Clinton, still a senator at the time, delivered a speech on the volatility of the subprime mortgage market on March 15, 2007. She said too many people were ignoring warning signs.

"The subprime problems are now creating massive issues on Wall Street," Clinton said. "It's a serious problem affecting our housing market and millions of hard-working families."

She gave specific proposals for addressing subprime mortgages, including expanding the role of the Federal Housing Administration, more borrowing options for underprivileged and first-time homebuyers, more safeguards against predatory lending practices and policies intended to prevent foreclosures.

In August that year, she delivered a similar speech about dealing with problems from subprime mortgages. There, she reiterated earlier proposals, and also suggested laws establishing national standards and registration for loan brokers, as well as regulations on lenders.

"I think the subprime market was sort of like the canary in the mine," she said. "You know, it was telling us loudly and clearly, 'There are problems here.' "

It didn't become law, but Clinton sponsored a bill to implement these policies in September 2007.

The first time she mentioned derivatives was in a November 2007 speech in Iowa. (A derivative is a financial product that allows investors to hedge against price fluctuations in an underlying asset.)

"We need to start addressing the risks posed by derivatives and other complex financial products," she said. "You can't let Wall Street send the bill to your street with the bright ideas that just don't work out. Derivatives and products like them are posing real risks to families, as Wall Street writes down tens of billions of dollars in investments. Companies are taking the loss of a billion here and a billion there simply because the securities they own are worth less than they thought."

In the same speech, she spoke again of the risky lending that led to the subprime mortgage crisis, adding that she called on then-President George W. Bush to convene a conference to find a solution.

And she also pushed for more oversight of financial markets: "So as president, I will move to establish the 21st-century oversight we need in a 21st-century global marketplace. I will call for an immediate review of these new investment products and for plans to make them more transparent."

This November speech angered some of Clinton's Wall Street donors, according to the New York Times.

At the tail-end of her campaign, in March 2008 -- still before the financial crisis hit a peak later that summer -- Clinton released a six-point plan to increase financial regulation. The plan included, in part, more oversight of derivatives and other new financial products, establishment of mortgage standards and strengthened some consumer protections.

After becoming secretary of state in 2009, Clinton made noticeably fewer comments on domestic policy and financial regulation. But the record shows that establishing policies to address the then-nascent financial crisis was a key point of her campaign platform in 2007 and 2008.

Our ruling

Clinton said she "called for addressing risks of derivatives, cracking down on subprime mortgages and improving financial oversight" early on in the financial crisis.

The crisis hit a peak in summer 2008, though it started to gain traction in 2007. Clinton began addressing the subprime mortgage issue in her appearances in March 2007. Later that year, she took on derivatives. She also proposed specific plans for solving these problems and increasing oversight of financial institutions.

Her statement is accurate, and we rate her claim True.

Clinton's Model Staffers // National Journal // Emily Schultheis – July 11, 2015

Half a dozen Hillary Clinton staffers lounged on a backyard patio in Brooklyn's Bushwick neighborhood one afternoon in June, sporting campaign T-shirts as they chatted and laughed. Communications staffer Ian Sams stood by the barbecue, wearing sunglasses, skinny black jeans, and an apron emblazoned with a play on his boss's name: "More Like Grillary Clinton." Sams watched hot dogs sizzle on the grill as he talked with Amanda Renteria, the campaign's political director, whose son, Diego, played nearby. Others sat around a table that had been set with place mats and plates.

A midsummer staff get-together? Not exactly. The occasion was a photo shoot for Clinton's online campaign store. Launched in May, the store has everything from bumper stickers and T-shirts featuring the campaign's "H" logo to branded grilling spatulas and beer koozies that say "Chillary Clinton." And every single model on the website works for the campaign or, in the case of the children, is related to someone who does.

The barbecue scene, which now tops the campaign's store page, was shot over the course of about an hour in the Bushwick backyard of a Clinton staffer's friend. (There was no food budget; an aide picked up the hot dogs at a nearby convenience store.) But most of the photos on the site were taken by staff photographers at the campaign's Brooklyn Heights headquarters, in a glass-walled conference room that gives other campaign workers a chance to peer in and cheer on their colleagues as they pose.

For some, the practice has added a new—and unexpected—dimension to working for Clinton. Communications staffer Jesse Lehrich says he was used to being behind the scenes and modeling had never crossed his mind—until the campaign solicited volunteers for a photo shoot, and someone from the merchandise team handed him a shirt from the campaign's "Pride" collection. "What can I say? I'm a team player," he tells me. "Our photog grabbed me and asked me, and between my willingness to do anything for the campaign and the room full of people egging me on, I capitulated." (A photo of the blue-eyed, bearded Lehrich rocking a tank top adorned with a rainbow version of the campaign logo went up on the site in June.) Others are more openly enthusiastic about their moment in the sun: "My family was very excited to see me modeling items in the store," says Alexandria Phillips, a press assistant with springy brown curls and a broad smile, who on the website wears a purple T-shirt that says, "Women's rights are human rights." "Even my grandmother, our family matriarch and last Republican holdout, had to admit that she thought I made the Hillary items look good!"

But the arrangement has earned the staffer-models a certain amount of good-natured ribbing as well. Political operatives and reporters have recognized the aides in question and teased them on Twitter about their moonlighting. The photos have even popped up in snarky articles. One post from New York magazine, titled, "Hillary Knows Exactly What Kind of Dumb Beach-Themed Merch You Want," featured a large photo of Ian Sams in the "Grillary Clinton" apron. (He didn't get to choose his apparel either, he tells me: The merchandise team gave him the apron and that's what he wore.) "I never thought I'd be compared to an Urban Outfitters model by New York magazine," he says. "But cross that off the bucket list."

No other 2016 campaign is using staffers to show off its apparel in quite this way; the closest is Rand Paul's, which has several photos of young people—some of whom are staffers—in "Rand 2016" gear at the top of its merchandise page. But individual items aren't displayed on models, professional or otherwise.

The Clinton campaign's official answer for why it went this route was that using in-house talent was a cost-cutting measure cribbed from Obama 2012. But they could have done without the human mannequins entirely, as most other campaigns have. Cost-consciousness aside—and with Clinton's record $45 million fundraising haul from her first quarter in the race, she's not exactly hurting for cash at the moment—the decision to use staffers as models is also, clearly, a marketing move. The question is: What does this marketing move actually communicate?

"Everyday items made by everyday Americans" is the tagline of the store, and the phrase "everyday Americans" is one that Clinton frequently invokes on the stump. As a group, however, these young, Brooklyn-based Democratic operatives give off more of a hipster vibe; they seem, in short, like the kind of people you're likely to see hanging out at a Bushwick barbecue.

Meaghan Burdick, who ran merchandising for the 2012 Obama campaign and herself modeled for the Obama store (as a redhead, she frequently showed up in the St. Patrick's Day—or O'Bama—apparel section), says the site "shows youthful energy" and is in keeping with the campaign's efforts to cultivate a looser, more laid-back image. "It's the whole, 'This is fun,' trying to take the edge off the serious aspect of it, I think," she says. Sean Duffy, a brand marketing expert, says it's about projecting diversity and youth: "There's the obvious demographic thing going on: a more or less youthful group of people, racially diverse, you've got kids, so it hints at the family thing. For me ... it just said she's trying to portray this kind of young normalcy." Jasmine Sandler, a digital marketing strategist, looked at the photo of Sams and said it brought to mind "a techie dad, who is as comfortable managing the grill as he is his tech team at work. He has a sense of domestic stability to him and good employment."

Will the strategy sell shirts? The campaign wouldn't talk about how many apparel items had been purchased thus far, or whether the images on the site were getting as much attention from potential buyers as they were on social media. But some have their doubts. "I keep saying, they may have saved money by using me as a model," says Lehrich, "but there ain't nobody that's going to buy that tank top now."

Hillary Clinton Has Already Spent $18.7 Million // National Journal // Shane Goldmacher – July 15, 2015

Hillary Clinton spent a massive $18.7 million in her first quarter as a presidential candidate, an enormous sum that is more money than any of her rivals, Democratic or Republican, have even raised.

The spending amounts to roughly $230,000 for every day since she declared her candidacy on April 12, an incredible pace at a time when Clinton was not purchasing expensive television ads. Instead, the funds have gone toward building a national political apparatus helmed by campaign manager Robby Mook.

"We have had the ability to make critical investments in our organization that will put us in position to win the primary and the White House," Mook said in a statement.

Despite the spending, Clinton still ended the quarter with roughly $28 million in primary cash, according to the campaign and reports filed with the Federal Election Commission. She raised a total of $46.7 million, including $824,000 in general election contributions.

Clinton also released a list of 122 of her bundlers Wednesday that have raised at least $100,000 for her campaign. One name that stands out is Rep. Joaquin Castro, the twin brother of Julian Castro, the secretary of Housing and Urban Development who is often listed as a potential Clinton running mate.

The Clinton campaign said that it had received money from more than 250,000 people, with an average-sized contribution of $144.89. Her campaign said 61 percent of her donors were women and that 94 percent of donors had given $250 or less. Earlier on Wednesday, her chief Democratic rival in the polls, Sen. Bernie Sanders, revealed he had 284,000 contributors who had given an average of $35.

All told, Clinton's fundraising dwarfs that of Sanders, who reported raising $15.2 million, including $1.5 million he transferred from his Senate committee, and spent roughly $3 million in the second quarter. Former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley has not yet filed his disclosure.

Clinton's new FEC filing suggests that her campaign's spending choices this time are informed by her previous run, when she also began as the prohibitive favorite to win the nomination.

In that first run eight years ago, Clinton found herself nearly out of cash by the time of the Iowa caucuses, despite having raised $100 million and having started her ground operation relatively late, compared to rivals Barack Obama and John Edwards.

In the second quarter of 2007, Clinton spent a total of $2.5 million on salaries and $1.1 million on travel and $237,000 on polling.

In 2015, she has spent $3.8 million on salaries, plus another $391,000 on "organizing services," while keeping travel costs to $465,000. The amount spent on polling, meanwhile, nearly quadrupled, to $905,000.

Hillary Clinton campaign raises $46m, with women 60% of donors // The Guardian – July 15, 2015

FEC filing shows hundreds of staff hired and big online operation built up, but does not include money being accumulated by super PACS

Hillary Clinton’s campaign has detailed $46m worth of fundraising activities to the FEC.

Hillary Clinton has spent nearly $19m and hired hundreds of staff during the first three months of her presidential campaign. In total, Clinton’s official campaign raised more than $46m from more than 250,000 contributors, according to records filed with the FEC, the US election finance watchdog.

About 60% of donors were women, the Clinton campaign said, and 94% of the donations came in amounts of $250 or less. The average donation was $144.89.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton's spending underscores her early effort to build a national campaign, even as aides say she is focused on the primary contest. Beyond paying salaries for 343 new employees, her campaign purchased lists of voters in four early voting states and spent heavily on building up a digital team.

Her campaign also released a list of campaign bundlers, donors who each raised more than $100,000. Some of the donors included Clinton's most ardent financial backers, including Hollywood media mogul Haim Saban; Susie Tompkins Buell, a wealthy California investor who was a major donor to the Ready for Hillary super PAC; Las Vegas publisher Brian Greenspun, a longtime friend and college classmate of Bill Clinton; billionaire JB Pritzker of Chicago; and Alan Patricof, a New York-based financier who served as Clinton's finance chair when she first ran for Senate in New York.

Clinton and Republican Jeb Bush account for almost half the roughly $390m that official presidential groups for all the expected 22 candidates say they have raised. Most campaigns, including Clinton's and Bush's, were required to file their initial reports with the Federal Election Commission by midnight on Wednesday.

The FEC reports cover financial activity between 1 April and 30 June and list the names of everyone who gave at least $200. The maximum contribution for the primary is $2,700. The FEC reports also show how candidates are spending their money on consultants, office space, advertising, polling and more.

Wednesday's reports provide only a glimpse of all the money that donors are handing over. The candidates also benefit from "super PACs" – political action committees – usually created specifically to help them. Those groups, which accept contributions of any size and are subject to legal limits on how closely they can work with the campaigns, file their FEC reports at the end of the month.

The pro-Clinton Priorities USA Action, a super PAC that counts on seven-figure donors and previously backed Barack Obama, raised an additional $15m, according to an Associated Press assessment.

The AP found that donors have handed over nearly $400m, more than two-thirds of it to outside groups rather than to official campaigns. That total is more than the presidential candidates raised for the entire primary election of 2000, according to the Center for Responsive Politics, a group that tracks election spending.

Since announcing her White House bid in April, Clinton has positioned staff in all fifty states with the majority working out of a large and pricey Brooklyn headquarters.

The overwhelming favorite for her party's nomination, Clinton and her team have set their sights on building the massive infrastructure they will need for the general election.

The outlay is nearly four times what Clinton spent in the first three months of her last presidential campaign, when she faced a far more competitive primary race against Barack Obama.

During that 2008 campaign, Clinton and her team faced charges from donors that they were wasting money on ineffective strategic choices like spending nearly $100,000 for party platters and groceries before the Iowa caucus, a contest she lost.

This time, her staff has emphasized its "cheapskate" mentality particularly to contributors. At her first national finance meeting in May, top donors were instructed to purchase their own lunches and fund their own transportation to various gatherings in Brooklyn. Campaign aides like to brag about taking the bus from New York to Washington, rather than the more expensive Acela train. Even so, her campaign spent at least $8,700 on train tickets and just a few hundred dollars on bus fare, the Federal Election Commission report shows.

All told, Clinton has spent a far greater portion of her early funds during this campaign than she did eight years ago. During the first three months of her 2008 bid Clinton spent 14% of the $36m she raised, according to FEC documents. In the launch of this campaign she has used up nearly 40% of what she has taken in.

By comparison Vermont Senator Bernie Sanders has fueled an insurgent challenge to Clinton with small donations. He pulled in more than $15.2m through the end of June and three-quarters of his donations were $200 or less.

Hillary Clinton Wants to Run on Climate. And She Thinks Democrats Should Too. // National Journal // Clare Foran and Jason Plautz – July 15, 2015

Hillary Clinton isn't afraid to talk about global warming—and she wants her fellow Democrats to join her.

In closed-door meetings with House and Senate Democrats Tuesday, Clinton jumped at the chance to discuss the hot-button topic in political terms, numerous lawmakers said. Clinton delivered a clear message: Democrats must convince the American public that action to combat Earth's rising temperatures is urgent, and her party can make that case by tailoring their message to different kinds of voters.

"She was incredible," said Sen. Ben Cardin. "She really relates [climate change] to the current political communities and how we have to do a better job. We know the policy, but we have to do a better job on the politics."

Clinton wants Democrats to grasp the importance of Paris climate negotiations later this year and speak about global warming in a way that resonates with millennials, according to several Senate Democrats. That would be an easy way for Democrats to draw a clear contrast with a GOP presidential field dominated by climate skeptics.

She wants to keep her left flank clear as well, delivering a message guaranteed to appeal to the party's progressive wing. Clinton framed global warming as a pressing and serious threat and touted the climate credentials of John Podesta, the chairman of her 2016 campaign and a former climate adviser to President Obama.

But Clinton doesn't want Democrats to run too far to the left. According to several senators, she cautioned members of her party that Democrats can't forget that coal country is an important part of America and can't be left behind in the fight to tackle global warming.

"She pointed out to those of us who are passionate about climate change that it's a big country, and a lot of our previous economic growth was dependent on coal country, and that as we pursue a transition to a clean-energy economy, that it's not like Americans to leave folks behind. So we have to really think deeply about how we help folks who are experiencing challenges during this transition," said Sen. Brian Schatz in an interview.

That message offers up an olive branch to moderate Democrats who have felt spurned by the Obama administration's climate agenda, and it could help the party win over centrists in purple states.

"She was very much concerned," said Sen. Joe Manchin, a moderate Democrat from West Virginia. "She said people need to realize what coal has done for this country. ... People don't realize that; they just want to condemn it now, and she was very compassionate about that." Manchin added that he invited Clinton to visit West Virginia so that she can see coal country up-close.

Environmentalists have been frustrated by what they view as a lack of specifics from the Clinton campaign when it comes to climate change and energy, even though Clinton has spoken of the need to act on climate change in campaign speeches. Many progressive green groups worry that Clinton's ties to Wall Street will discourage her from taking a strong stand in the fight against global warming, and they are concerned about the fact that she has not come out firmly against the Keystone XL pipeline—an issue that congressional Democrats did not press her on when she met with them on Tuesday.

But rather than interpreting Clinton's silence on Keystone and sympathy for coal country as suspect, progressive Democrats were encouraged and energized by her remarks.

"I thought it was pretty solid," Rep. Raul Grijalva, one of the cochairs of the Congressional Progressive Caucus, said after hearing Clinton speak. "Some of the progressive issues and members have kind of been crying in the wilderness for a while, and now these issues like climate change, income inequality, and the jobs agenda are resonating with the public. And I think that Hillary understands that. ... The fact that the progressive causes and organizations feel more in touch with and included with Hillary now is a mark that she understands that."

"I think she recognizes that the politics of the legislative branch are stuck, and you have got to have an understanding of what people are going through if you're going to get to a 60-vote threshold to have legislative success," Schatz said. "I think she is trying to cobble together a coalition that can actually do something."

Of course, even if Clinton's climate agenda wins over Democrats, it will be difficult for her to match the progressive record of her biggest challenger on the Left: Sen. Bernie Sanders. Sanders was quick to remind reporters of that, holding an impromptu press conference on Tuesday in the Capitol, where he touted his record on energy and the environment as one of many areas where he could break away from Clinton.

"I have helped lead the opposition against the Keystone pipeline. I don't believe we should be excavating or transporting some of the dirtiest fuel on this planet," Sanders said. "I think Secretary Clinton has not been clear on her views on that issue."

Benghazi Republicans slam 'one-way letter war' of committee Dems // Washington Examiner // Sarah Westwood – July 15, 2015

Republicans on the House Select Committee on Benghazi slammed Democrats on Wednesday for refusing to assist the majority in the investigation of the 2012 terror attack.

"Unlike committee Democrats, who believe all has been asked and answered, and who have never made a single document request of the administration during the entirety of the existence of this committee, committee Republicans continue to doggedly pursue getting all the facts regarding Libya and Benghazi," said Jamal Ware, the majority's spokesman, in response to a Democratic letter accusing Chairman Trey Gowdy of diverting the committee's focus to Hillary Clinton.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"To the extent the Committee has had to focus on Secretary Clinton to try to recover relevant portions of what should have been her public record, we would not be here today had Clinton decided the right thing instead of the 'convenient' thing to do was to use the official State Department system," Ware said.

The select committee discovered earlier this year that Clinton had shielded all of her government communications on a private email server, undermining claims that the formation of the committee would merely retrace the steps of several previous congressional investigations.

"We would not be here had Clinton answered a letter from Congress two years ago that explicitly asked about her use of personal email to conduct official public business," Ware added. "We would not be here had she not found it convenient to keep her emails on her server for more than 20 months and only then to wipe it clean after the Committee came asking for records."

Relations between the select committee's Democrats and Republicans have soured in the days since Clinton announced her campaign for president.

Rep. Elijah Cummings, the committee's top Democrat, and its four other Democratic members sent a letter to Gowdy on Wednesday morning blasting what they saw as a dereliction of the committee's duties in favor of partisan attacks on Clinton.

Democrats published a tentative schedule that indicated the committee had planned to hold 11 hearings between January and October, none of which had occurred.

But Ware countered the notion that Republicans had allowed their investigative efforts to lapse.

"The Select Committee has conducted more than 30 transcribed interviews to keep the focus on uncovering facts," he said. "These initial witness interviews centered on State Department and CIA witnesses because they were the eyewitnesses to the attacks and many have never before been interviewed by any committee of Congress."

Witnesses from the Pentagon, the National Security Council and even the White House are slated to be interviewed before the committee, Ware added.

Several of these interviews have been hampered by the government's reluctance to hand over documents related to the Benghazi attack.

The committee said Monday it had not been given a pair of emails in which Clinton and her top aides discussed controversial talking points in late September 2012.

State Department officials have withheld documents on three separate occasions without providing justification, although committee members have twice written to ask why the records were not disclosed.

Gowdy and the Republicans on the committee have long criticized the minority for what they see as a failure to exert pressure on agencies that stonewall their congressional requests.

Democrats have frequently accused the majority of using its platform to weaken Clinton's presidential prospects.

Earlier this month, Cummings blasted Republicans for leaking "doctored" documents to the press in an attempt to smear the Democratic frontrunner.

Gowdy later released a statement in which he instructed his staff not to spend time responding to the minority's public missives.

"If Democrats insist on continuing to write, hopefully next time it will include what they are doing to bring an end to State Department stonewalling and to help the majority enforce subpoenas that have been outstanding for months," Ware said.

Why Hillary Clinton should take a tougher stance on banks // CS Monitor // Robert Reich – July 15, 2015

Hillary Clinton won't propose reinstating a bank break-up law known as the Glass-Steagall Act – at least according to Alan Blinder, an economist who has been advising Clinton's campaign. "You're not going to see Glass-Steagall,"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Blinder said after her economic speech Monday in which she failed to mention it. Blinder said he had spoken to Clinton directly about Glass-Steagall.

This is a big mistake.

It's a mistake politically because people who believe Hillary Clinton is still too close to Wall Street will not be reassured by her position on Glass-Steagall. Many will recall that her husband led the way to repealing Glass Steagall in 1999 at the request of the big Wall Street banks.

Recommended: How is money reshaping American politics? Take our quiz.
It's a big mistake economically because the repeal of Glass-Steagall led directly to the 2008 Wall Street crash, and without it we're in danger of another one.

Some background: During the Roaring Twenties, so much money could be made by speculating on shares of stock that several big Wall Street banks began selling stock along side their traditional banking services – taking in deposits and making loans.

Some banks went further, lending to pools of speculators that used the money to pump up share prices. The banks sold the shares to their customers, only to have the share prices collapse when the speculators dumped them.

For the banks, it was an egregious but hugely profitable conflict of interest.

After the entire stock market crashed in 1929, ushering in the Great Depression, Washington needed to restore the public's faith in the banking system. One step was for Congress to enact legislation insuring commercial deposits against bank losses.

Another was to prevent the kinds of conflicts of interest that resulted in such losses, and which had fueled the boom and subsequent bust. Under the Glass-Steagall Act of 1933, banks couldn't both gamble in the market and also take in deposits and make loans. They'd have to choose between the two.

"The idea is pretty simple behind this one," Senator Elizabeth Warren said a few days ago, explaining her bill to resurrect Glass-Steagall. "If banks want to engage in high-risk trading — they can go for it, but they can't get access to ensured deposits and put the taxpayers on the hook for that reason."

For more than six decades after 1933, Glass-Steagall worked exactly as it was intended to. During that long interval few banks failed and no financial panic endangered the banking system.

But the big Wall Street banks weren't content. They wanted bigger profits. They thought they could make far more money by gambling with commercial deposits. So they set out to whittle down Glass-Steagall.

Finally, in 1999, President Bill Clinton struck a deal with Republican Senator Phil Gramm to do exactly what Wall Street wanted, and repeal Glass-Steagall altogether.

What happened next? An almost exact replay of the Roaring Twenties. Once again, banks originated fraudulent loans and sold them to their customers in the form of securities. Once again, there was a huge conflict of interest that finally resulted in a banking crisis.

This time the banks were bailed out, but millions of Americans lost their savings, their jobs, even their homes.

A personal note. I worked for Bill Clinton as Secretary of Labor and I believe most of his economic policies were sound. But during those years I was in fairly continuous battle with some other of his advisers who seemed determined to do Wall Street's bidding.

On Glass-Steagall, they clearly won.

To this day some Wall Street apologists argue Glass-Steagall wouldn't have prevented the 2008 crisis because the real culprits were nonbanks like Lehman Brothers and Bear Stearns.

Baloney. These nonbanks got their funding from the big banks in the form of lines of credit, mortgages, and repurchase agreements. If the big banks hadn't provided them the money, the nonbanks wouldn't have got into trouble.

And why were the banks able to give them easy credit on bad collateral? Because Glass-Steagall was gone.

Other apologists for the Street blame the crisis on unscrupulous mortgage brokers.

Surely mortgage brokers do share some of the responsibility. But here again, the big banks were accessories and enablers.

The mortgage brokers couldn't have funded the mortgage loans if the banks hadn't bought them. And the big banks couldn't have bought them if Glass-Steagall were still in place.

I've also heard bank executives claim there's no reason to resurrect Glass-Steagall because none of the big banks actually failed.

This is like arguing lifeguards are no longer necessary at beaches where no one has drowned. It ignores the fact that the big banks were bailed out. If the government hadn't thrown them lifelines, many would have gone under.

Remember? Their balance sheets were full of junky paper, non-performing loans, and worthless derivatives. They were bailed out because they were too big to fail. And the reason for resurrecting Glass-Steagall is we don't want to go through that ever again.

As George Santayana famously quipped, those who cannot remember the past are condemned to repeat it. In the roaring 2000's, just as in the Roaring Twenties, America's big banks used insured deposits to underwrite their gambling in private securities, and then dump the securities on their customers.

It ended badly.

This is precisely what the Glass-Steagall Act was designed to prevent – and did prevent for more than six decades.

Hillary Clinton, of all people, should remember.

Wealthy Donors and Lobbyist Bundlers Are Largely Bankrolling Hillary Clinton's Campaign // Mother Jones // Russ Choma – July 15, 2015

Hillary Clinton hauled in $47.5 million in the first three months of her campaign, besting both Republican Jeb Bush, who raised $11.4 million, and her surprising Democratic challenger, Bernie Sanders, who racked up $15.2 million. According to her campaign, she had more than 250,000 donors, of whom 61 percent were female, an unprecedented number of female donors. But what Clinton did not highlight was that she had relied on wealthy donors and lobbyists to pull together most of her money.

Clinton reported raising $8 million—or 16.8 percent of her total—from small donors who gave $200 or less. Many politicians raise far less from small donors. Jeb Bush, for example, raised just 3 percent of his campaign cash from small donors. But Sanders blew Clinton out of the water when it came to grassroots fundraising, taking in $10.4 million (or 68 percent) of his warchest from $200-or-less donors.

The bulk of Clinton's campaign funds came from an elite, wealthy class of donors—those who can afford to give the maximum donation. In 2014, roughly 0.04 percent of Americans made the maximum donation for a primary campaign of $2,600 (adjusted to $2,700 in this election cycle). Bush's campaign raised more than 80 percent of its cash from this upper-crust of donors, and Clinton raised 64 percent. Clinton may well have had 250,000 donors—but just 11,400 of them accounted for almost two-thirds of her total fundraising.

Clinton also got a big boost from her bundlers—supporters who tap their personal and professional networks to amass donations for the campaign. Candidates are only required to list the names of registered lobbyists who have bundled for them, and Clinton did go above and beyond that by releasing on her website the names of 122 people who had raised $100,000 or more for her campaign. With much less fanfare, she also disclosed to the Federal Election Commission the names of 40 registered lobbyists who bundled just over $2 million for her campaign.

By comparison, Bush's campaign listed the names of eight registered lobbyists who bundled $228,000 for his campaign. Sanders had no registered lobbyists fundraising on his behalf.

The top lobbyist bundling for Clinton was Jackson Dunn, who represents Mastercard, Dow Chemical, Pepsico, and Noble Energy, a Houston-based oil and gas company. Dunn bundled more than $231,000 for the campaign. He wasn't the only lobbyist with ties to the oil and gas sector who went to work fundraising for Clinton. Lobbyist Ankit Desai, who works for natural gas company Cheniere, raised $82,000. Theresa Fariello, of ExxonMobil, raised $21,200 for the campaign.

Hillary Clinton spends nearly $19M during first three months of presidential campaign // NY Daily News // Cameron Joseph – July 15, 2015

Hillary Clinton spent almost a whopping $19 million in her first three months as a candidate, a sign she's investing heavily in building out a huge campaign organization.

That leaves Clinton with just under $29 million cash on hand, more than any other candidate's direct campaign, after raising almost $48 million in total with all the checks counted. All but $1 million of that money is earmarked for the primary.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Thanks to the more than 250,000 Americans who have stepped up to support Hillary Clinton's campaign, we have had the ability to make critical investments in our organization that will put us in position to win the primary and the White House," said campaign manager Robby Mook in a statement.

Clinton's high burn rate was a problem for her in 2008, when she spent heavily early on in the campaign on high salaries and unnecessary expenses. Her team insists that this time around the money is being put to better use in ways that will help her down the line: heavy investments in building a big digital presence and strong ground game. The Clinton campaign made big investments in analytical teams, technology and field, according to a campaign spokesman.

Her main primary rival, Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, has $12 million in the bank after raising $15 million in the same time period, from approximately the same number of donors. Clinton's team says 94 percent of her donors gave $250 or less, even higher than the 76 percent of donors to Sanders who gave less than $200.

Clinton loaned her campaign $280,000 while she was in the unofficial "testing the waters" phase of her campaign.

While Clinton raised the most direct money for her campaign than any of her rivals in either party, that figure is lower than Jeb Bush's total haul. His super-PAC alone raised more than $100 million in donations, and $11 million more in direct contributions.

Clinton staff are sounding the alarm about those hauls as they look to spur up more donations from scared Democrats. Clinton Communications Director Jennifer Palmieri predicted Wednesday afternoon that Clinton will be outspent in the general election.

"People need to be more worried about the Republican super-PACs," Palmieri said on Bloomberg TV. "This is a big threat."

Clinton's high burn rate was a problem for her in 2008, when she spent heavily early on in the campaign on high salaries and unnecessary expenses.
Clinton also released a list of the more "Hillblazers," campaign bundlers who helped her raise $100 million apiece.

That list includes Rep. Joaquin Castro (D-Texas), the twin brother of secretary of Housing and Urban Development Julian Castro, who is rumored to be a top possibility to be Clinton's eventual running mate.

Roughly one third of Clinton's bundlers are from the New York City area, including Facebook founder Chris Hughes and his husband Sean Eldridge, Citigroup Vice President Lisa Caputo, Morgan Stanley vice chairman and former deputy secretary of State Tom Nides, Lynn Forester de Rothschild, and Reps. Jim Himes (D-Conn.) and Grace Meng (D-N.Y.).

Hillary Clinton campaign raises $46m, with women 60% of donors // Guardian // July 15, 2015

Hillary Clinton has spent nearly $19m and hired hundreds of staff during the first three months of her presidential campaign. In total, Clinton's official campaign raised more than $46m from more than 250,000 contributors, according to records filed with the FEC, the US election finance watchdog.

About 60% of donors were women, the Clinton campaign said, and 94% of the donations came in amounts of $250 or less. The average donation was $144.89.

Clinton's spending underscores her early effort to build a national campaign, even as aides say she is focused on the primary contest. Beyond paying salaries for 343 new employees, her campaign purchased lists of voters in four early voting states and spent heavily on building up a digital team.

Her campaign also released a list of campaign bundlers, donors who each raised more than $100,000. Some of the donors included Clinton's most ardent financial backers, including Hollywood media mogul Haim Saban; Susie Tompkins Buell, a wealthy California investor who was a major donor to the Ready for Hillary super PAC; Las Vegas publisher Brian Greenspun, a longtime friend and college classmate of Bill Clinton; billionaire JB Pritzker of Chicago; and Alan Patricof, a New York-based financier who served as Clinton's finance chair when she first ran for Senate in New York.

Clinton and Republican Jeb Bush account for almost half the roughly $390m that official presidential groups for all the expected 22 candidates say they have raised. Most campaigns, including Clinton's and Bush's, were required to file their initial reports with the Federal Election Commission by midnight on Wednesday.

The FEC reports cover financial activity between 1 April and 30 June and list the names of everyone who gave at least $200. The maximum contribution for the primary is $2,700. The FEC reports also show how candidates are spending their money on consultants, office space, advertising, polling and more.

Wednesday's reports provide only a glimpse of all the money that donors are handing over. The candidates also benefit from "super PACs" – political action committees – usually created specifically to help them. Those groups, which accept contributions of any size and are subject to legal limits on how closely they can work with the campaigns, file their FEC reports at the end of the month.

The pro-Clinton Priorities USA Action, a super PAC that counts on seven-figure donors and previously backed Barack Obama, raised an additional $15m, according to an Associated Press assessment.

The AP found that donors have handed over nearly $400m, more than two-thirds of it to outside groups rather than to official campaigns. That total is more than the presidential candidates raised for the entire primary election of 2000, according to the Center for Responsive Politics, a group that tracks election spending.

Since announcing her White House bid in April, Clinton has positioned staff in all fifty states with the majority working out of a large and pricey Brooklyn headquarters.

The overwhelming favorite for her party's nomination, Clinton and her team have set their sights on building the massive infrastructure they will need for the general election.

The outlay is nearly four times what Clinton spent in the first three months of her last presidential campaign, when she faced a far more competitive primary race against Barack Obama.

During that 2008 campaign, Clinton and her team faced charges from donors that they were wasting money on ineffective strategic choices like spending nearly $100,000 for party platters and groceries before the Iowa caucus, a contest she lost.

This time, her staff has emphasized its "cheapskate" mentality particularly to contributors. At her first national finance meeting in May, top donors were instructed to purchase their own lunches and fund their own transportation to various gatherings in Brooklyn. Campaign aides like to brag about taking the bus from New York to Washington, rather than the more expensive Acela train. Even so, her campaign spent at least $8,700 on train tickets and just a few hundred dollars on bus fare, the Federal Election Commission report shows.

All told, Clinton has spent a far greater portion of her early funds during this campaign than she did eight years ago. During the first three months of her 2008 bid Clinton spent 14% of the $36m she raised, according to FEC documents. In the launch of this campaign she has used up nearly 40% of what she has taken in.

By comparison Vermont Senator Bernie Sanders has fueled an insurgent challenge to Clinton with small donations. He pulled in more than $15.2m through the end of June and three-quarters of his donations were $200 or less.

Hillary Clinton Has Spent $18M Of Over $46M In First 3 Months Of Her Presidential Campaign // IB Times // Sneha Shankar - July 16 2015

Democratic presidential candidate and former Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton hired hundreds of employees and spent more than $18 million in the first three months of her presidential campaign in an effort to outpace her rivals. Clinton had raised over $46 million for the Democratic primary contest, the Associated Press (AP) reported on Wednesday.

Clinton reportedly spent over $5.9 million on 343 employees, $700,000 on computers and other equipment, and half a million on renting offices, including her 80,000 square feet headquarters in Brooklyn. According to campaign finance documents filed on Wednesday, Clinton also purchased lists of voters in four early primary states, paid a political action committee six figures to defend her record, and spent massively on building a digital team, the AP reported.

The report also analyzed that the outlay for this year's campaign is nearly four times what Clinton spent in the first three months of her last presidential campaign against then-Sen. Barack Obama in 2008. During that campaign, Clinton and her team faced accusations that they wasted a lot of money on strategies that did not work, including nearly $100,000 on party platters and groceries before the Iowa caucus. Clinton lost that contest.

At the first national finance meeting in May, Clinton's team reportedly asked top donors to buy their own lunches and fund their own transportation to gatherings in Brooklyn. While campaign aides bragged about traveling from New York to Washington in a bus, and not the more expensive Acela train, Clinton's team still spent at least $8,700 on train tickets and just a few hundred dollars on bus tickets, the AP reported, citing the Federal Election Commission report.

During the 2008 campaign, Clinton spent 14 percent of the raised $36 million in the first three months, but this time she has reportedly spent nearly 40 percent of the raised amount in the same period. Clinton also reportedly received over 250,000 contributions and only about 17 percent of the donations were less than $200 dollars. A list of campaign bundlers, each of whom helped raise over $100,000 for her primary bid, was also released by Clinton's team.

Some of the donors included Hollywood media mogul Haim Saban; Susie Tompkins Buell, a wealthy California investor; Las Vegas publisher Brian Greenspun; billionaire J.B. Pritzker of Chicago; and New York-based financier Alan Patricof, the AP reported. Her team also managed to attract some of Obama's biggest backers, including New York-based financiers Marc Lasry, Charles Myers and Blair Effron.

DC Rep Says Hillary Wants To Make DC The 51st State // Daily Caller // Josh Fatzick – July 15, 2015

After speaking with former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, D.C.'s Delegate to Congress Eleanor Holmes Norton said she got Clinton's personal support for the D.C. statehood movement.

Norton had been following Clinton to various Capitol Hill Meetings and after the pair left a Congressional Black Caucus meeting, Norton popped the D.C. statehood question. A spokesman for Hillary Clinton did not immediately return a request for confirmation of Clinton's support for D.C. statehood.

In June, Norton, along with Democratic colleagues in the Senate, introduced legislation that would turn the district into the 51st state and give residents a real voice in Congress.

Currently, the district has a similar position in Congress to Puerto Rico, with Norton serving as a non-voting delegate. Norton is not allowed to vote on the House floor, but she can introduce legislation and serve on committees.

The issue, according to Norton, is that D.C. residents pay taxes just like everybody else in America, but they do not have a real say in how that money is spent by Congress. In a statement, Norton said she has known Clinton since her husband was in the White House, so she was not surprised by Clinton's support for D.C. statehood.

"President Bill Clinton was the first president to support statehood for the District of Columbia, and President Obama has followed in endorsing D.C. statehood," Norton said. "President Clinton made phone calls that helped get Democrats to support my statehood bill when I first came to Congress."

President Barack Obama joined the fight for D.C. statehood last year during a town hall meeting when an audience member asked him about the movement.

"I'm in D.C., so I'm for it," he said. "It's not as if Washington, D.C. is not big enough compared to other states."

With roughly 650,000 residents in the city, D.C. is on par with states like Wyoming, Vermont, North Dakota and Alaska, which have populations between 570,000 and 730,000, and each posses one vote in the House.

It's no surprise Obama and other Democrats want to see D.C. become a new state. 75 percent of registered voters in the city are Democrats, with Republicans at just 6 percent, right behind "No Party," which has slightly more than 17 percent.

If D.C. were to become a state, Democrats would most certainly pick up two new Senate seats and another House seat, and hold them indefinitely.

As Described By NYT's Mark Leibovich, Reporters Covering Hillary Are A Bunch Of Monsters // Daily Caller // Betsy Rothstein – July 15, 2015

New York Times Magazine writer Mark Leibovich paints a bleak picture of the press covering Hillary Clinton's every move in her quest to win the White House in 2016.

They're vultures, bullies and shouters. They're self-aggrandizing.

They care about stupid things — like what she ate for lunch at a Chipotle in Ohio — and seem to cause Clinton, in turn, to ask absurd questions while touring a microbrewery in New Hampshire. She wanted to hold grain in her hands. She asked, "Where does the Barley come from?"

But it's a vicious circle isn't it?

In his story, Leibovich describes a press team surrounding Hillary that says things that force a reporter to reveal the ridiculous depths her staff will plunge to in order to control her image.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

When Leibovich visited her Brooklyn campaign headquarters to meet with Robby Mook, her campaign manager, a press aide, Jesse Ferguson informed him that the office space would be off-the-record. Leibovich refused to honor it. Hilariously, Ferguson said he didn't want guests devolving into a tweeting contest (you know, with the throngs of people who want to visit the building and brag on social media that they were there).

Ferguson ultimately wanted anything Leibovich saw "embargoed" until his piece published. Embarrassingly, he even buttered the reporter up by telling him that this "still means you're the first reporter who can report anything from the office." (Oh boy, really?)

Leibovich abided by a no-tweeting rule, but refused to keep a 40,000-foot space off record. That said, he didn't really see anything juicy there unless you count spotting President Obama's former body man Reggie Love. (A little Zzzzzzz.)

Even the way the NYT writer landed the interview became part of his lengthy profile.

"Her campaign at first declined to make her available for an interview. It did offer me an 'off the record' meeting, which is highly irregular: an off-the-record sit-down with a profile subject who happens to be running for president, and who is not exactly new to these rodeos. (I demurred on the off-the-record sit-down, at least at first.)"
Leibovich ultimately agreed to an off-the-record meeting and ultimately landed his partial on-the-record interview.

On one hand he shows FNC's Ed Henry bragging about getting Hillary to finally answer questions from reporters to shouts of "DO YOU HAVE A PERCEPTION PROBLEM?" But on the other, he depicts Hillary's handlers as people who regularly treat members of press like "cattle" that they literally corral with rope.

The writer makes fun of the notion that this was somehow appalling. He also notes that the national media made sure it became the day's big news.

"That image became the day's takeaway, at least in the national media: proof, supposedly, of Clinton's running scared from the 'tough questions,' thwarting press freedom on this day of our independence."
But maybe it isn't reporters who occasionally deserve to be treated like animals.

The most startling scene comes at a fourth of July parade when a smiling Hillary walks a parade route and telling a reporter what a "great time" she's having. Meawhile, there's Leibovich watching her face down Benghazi signs and shouts from complete strangers calling her a "LIAR" and a "CARPETBAGGER."

Clinton, Dem Hopefuls Silent on Planned Parenthood Organ Sales Video // Free Beacon // Bill McMorris – July 15, 2015

The Democrats vying for the 2016 presidential nomination were silent about a new video showing a top Planned Parenthood doctor outlining plans to sell body parts from aborted babies.

The undercover sting video shot by the non-profit Center for Medical Progress appears to show Dr. Deborah Nucatola, the senior director of medical services at Planned Parenthood Federation of America, talking about reselling body parts of babies subjected to abortions. Nucatola brags about the techniques Planned Parenthood doctors use to preserve valuable body parts as she eats lunch with two actors posing as prospective buyers.

"We've been very good at getting heart, lung, liver, because we know that, so I'm not going to crush that part, I'm going to basically crush below, I'm going to crush above, and I'm going to see if I can get it all intact," she says in an eight-minute video pulled from a nearly three-hour conversation that the group also posted online.

Nucatola said that Planned Parenthood doctors enlist the help of ultrasound to make sure they don't damage organs as they remove pieces of the baby from the womb.

Planned Parenthood has called state ultrasound bills "cruel" in the past.

"A lot of people want liver," she says pausing to bite her salad. "And for that reason, most providers will do this case under ultrasound guidance, so they'll know where they're putting their forceps."

The Washington Free Beacon reached out to the campaigns of all five Democrats running for president: former Secretary of State and frontrunner Hillary Clinton, insurgent socialist Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, former Virginia Sen. Jim Webb, and former Rhode Island Gov. Lincoln Chafee. None responded to questions about whether they condemned the practice of organ harvesting, whether Democrats should distance themselves from Planned Parenthood, or return campaign donations from the group.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Planned Parenthood is the nation's largest abortion provider, performing around 300,000 abortions per year. It has received nearly $200 million taxpayer dollars since 2012 including $27 million in grants alone in 2015, according to a Washington Free Beacon analysis.

Planned Parenthood has in turn spent major money supporting the Democratic Party, including nearly $18 million in outside spending in 2014 and 2012, according to the Center for Responsive Politics. Nearly all of its nearly $6 million in direct contributions since 1990 have gone to Democrats.

Each Democratic candidate enjoys a close relationship with Planned Parenthood and the abortion lobby. Lincoln Chafee, the former governor of Rhode Island, is the only one without a perfect rating from the pro-abortion group NARAL. He has a 90 percent approval score.

Clinton won Planned Parenthood's Margaret Sanger Award in 2009. She received more than $10,000 from the organization during two Senate runs and failed 2008 primary against President Barack Obama. She opposes limits on late-term abortion. As president, Bill Clinton vetoed a ban on partial birth abortion methods that Nucatola appeared to discuss in the video.

"The overarching mission of the Planned Parenthood Federation of America, the cause of reproductive freedom that you continue to advance today is as relevant in our world now as it was 100 years ago. So, I thank you," Clinton said in a release upon winning the award. A campaign spokesman did not return a request for comment.

O'Malley has also been honored by the organization, winning Planned Parenthood Maryland's Betty Tyler award in 2014. "We are building a stronger future for all of our children and grandchildren. I am honored to receive this recognition from Planned Parenthood Maryland for Maryland's hard-won progress," he said in a release.

Martin O'Malley receives awardMartin O'Malley receives award
Sanders received $5,500 from Planned Parenthood between 2012, a steep increase from the $1,500 he received between 2004 and 2006, according to the Center for Responsive Politics.

Chafee received more than $18,000 in 2000 and 2006 when he served in the U.S. Senate, according to the Center for Responsive Politics. Webb received no money from Planned Parenthood in his 2006 Senate run, though he still enjoys a perfect pro-abortion rating from NARAL.

Neither O'Malley, Sanders, nor Webb returned a request for comment.

Carly Fiorina, the former CEO of Hewlett-Packard, was the first presidential hopeful to respond to the video, posting a link to her Facebook page.

"I am proudly pro-life. I believe that every human life has potential and that every human life is precious. This latest news is tragic and outrageous. This isn't about 'choice.' It's about profiting on the death of the unborn while telling women it's about empowerment," Fiorina said.

Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal, who announced his presidential run in June, launched an investigation into Planned Parenthood operations in his state following the video's release.

"The systematic harvesting and trafficking of human body parts is shocking and gruesome," Jindal said in a statement. "This same organization is seeking to open an abortion clinic in New Orleans. I have instructed Louisiana's Department of Health and Hospitals to conduct an immediate investigation into this alleged evil and illegal activity and to not issue any licenses until this investigation is complete."

Jindal called on the Democratic field to return campaign donations and to condemn Planned Parenthood.

"Even the most hardened liberal must feel some pang of conscience watching the callousness with which [Nucatola] discusses the dismemberment of defenseless babies. How could anybody, regardless of political party, refuse to condemn such barbarism?" Jindal told the Washington Free Beacon. "I hope those who oppose efforts to encourage a culture of life watch this video."

Rick Perry, the former governor of Texas, said in a statement that these types of concerns led him to defund Planned Parenthood in his state.

"The video showing a Planned Parenthood employee selling the body parts of aborted children is a disturbing reminder of the organization's penchant for profiting off the tragedy of a destroyed human life," he said in a statement. "It is because of stories like this that I signed legislation defunding Planned Parenthood in the state of Texas—to protect human life and the health and safety of Texans."

The call to defund Planned Parenthood stretched beyond pro-life politicians. A campaign spokesman for George Pataki, the former governor of New York and the only pro-choice candidate in the GOP field, endorsed cutting off taxpayer dollars to the organization.

“The video is abhorrent and Governor Pataki would support ending federal funding for Planned Parenthood,” said David Catalfamo, a spokesman for Pataki, in a statement.

Planned Parenthood defended the practice as “ethical,” referring to the harvested body parts as “tissue.” It claimed to receive “no financial benefit.”

“We help patients who want to donate tissue for scientific research, and we do this just like every other high-quality health care provider does—with full, appropriate consent from patients and under the highest ethical and legal standards,” it said in a release. “In some instances, actual costs, such as the cost to transport tissue to leading research centers, are reimbursed.”

Nucatola alluded to the fact that local clinics stand to gain in the harvesting of organs and other body parts.

“For affiliates at the end of the day, they’re non-profits. They want to break even, and if they do a little bit better than break even and do so in a way that seems reasonable, they’re happy to do that,” she says in the full video.

Marjorie Dannenfelser, president of the Susan B. Anthony List, a 501(c)(4) non-profit that supports pro-life candidates, said that Nucatola’s statements mirrored the actions of the abortion doctor Kermit Gosnell, who kept jars of body parts in his Philadelphia clinic. Gosnell was convicted of multiple counts of first-degree murder in 2013 for stabbing babies born alive.

“This barbarity is only a natural outcome for an organization that, according to their own annual reports, destroys more than 300,000 children a year and wounds that many women. Trafficking is the grotesque collateral damage following a gross violation of human life,” she said of the video.

Dannenfelser said enacting safety regulations and signing 20-week abortion bans could cut back on such practices. She said such legislation would put pro-life politicians on offense as the measures have received more than 55 percent support in several polls.

“The best way to end [harvesting] is to protect these distinct and unique human lives from destruction. This is why 15 states have enacted laws to put an end to abortion after five months, when the baby can feel pain,” she said.

Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin, who kicked off his 2016 campaign on Monday, is expected to sign a 20-week abortion ban in the coming weeks, while Sens. Lindsey Graham (R., S.C.) and Rand Paul (R., Ky.) have sponsored similar prohibitions on late term abortion in the Senate.

Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton Give Middle Finger to Israel and Jewish People // The Blaze // Wayne Root – July 15, 2015

Don’t look now, but President Barack Obama, Secretary of State John Kerry and presidential candidate Hillary Clinton just gave a collective middle finger to Israel and the Jewish people.

Obama just agreed to an Iranian nuclear deal that is as dangerous and deadly to the Jewish people as any treaty in world history. It is the Neville Chamberlain agreement of our time. Neville appeased Adolf Hitler. That didn’t work out so well for the world. Neither will this deal.

Even Iran points out it won this negotiation. They will be placed under limited arms deal restrictions for only five years. Then it’s off to the races. In the meantime Iran gets to continue it’s nuclear research and development and keep two key enrichment plants.

“Its not a ceiling, but a solid foundation” said their foreign minister.

Great job of negotiating, John Kerry!

But this deal isn’t just bad news for America and deadly for Israel. It’s also deadly for the Democrat Party. This deal is the kiss of death in 2016 for any Democrat candidate that signs on. It’s a wrecking ball. It’s a, excuse the irony, nuclear bomb. Any Democrat that puts their name beside this terrible and tragic treaty will face devastating attacks by the GOP and pro-Israel groups, as well as the loss of Jewish donors.

But the real story here is Hillary Clinton endorsing the deal. The smart move was for Hillary to oppose this deal as “not good for America, American interests or Israel.” She should have said she would negotiate a much tougher deal as president. That would have made Hillary look smart, tough and independent.

Instead she looks like a political hack. And she has badly damaged her relationship with Jewish voters and donors. Why? Why would Hillary make such a serious miscalculation?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

One can only guess. But we know it's dangerous to embarrass Obama. Ask Donald Trump. Ask Dinesh D'Souza. Ask retired Gen. David Petraeus.

Or study the case of Democratic U.S. Sen. Robert Menendez of New Jersey – who dared to oppose and publicly criticize Obama on this very same Iranian deal months ago – and suddenly wound up indicted on federal charges.

What did Obama offer Hillary to convince her to support a deal that makes it likely that Israel will one day face a nuclear holocaust? We know Obama plays by the rules of "Chicago Thug Politics." So let me make an educated guess on the conversation. Clearly Obama must have intimidated Hillary. My educated guess is he told her:

"Embarrass me by opposing this Iranian deal and I will see to it that you never get the Democrat presidential nomination. All of my support will go to Joe Biden or Martin O'Malley or a late entry by Elizabeth Warren. I'll throw my weight behind ABH – Anyone But Hillary. I'll cut off your donors…

And for good measure, I'll ask my Justice Department to open a criminal investigation against you and the Clinton Foundation for accepting bribes from foreign governments while secretary of state. This investigation will last through the 2016 election. No matter the outcome, your political career is over.

But stand behind this Iran deal and my team will elect you president of the United States. I'll put the old Acorn team on your side. I'll teach you how to register millions of illegal aliens to vote in states with weak voter ID laws. I'll show you how to stuff the ballot box in friendly districts, so you get more votes than registered voters. I'll show you how to arrange hundreds of millions of dollars of donations from foreign donors – all under the $200 reporting threshold. I'll twist the arms of corrupt frauds like Jon Corzine to become Hillary bundlers.

Just make sure after the election you reward them with another another billion dollar stimulus bill and more corrupt green energy loans."

That's a typical Obama conversation. Intimidation is his calling card. It's his way, or the highway. And that highway is build with union slush funds.

Support Obama or the dogs of hell are unleashed upon you: Personal attacks; insinuations; slander; investigations and indictment by the IRS, DOJ, FBI, or Securities and Exchange Commission will suddenly appear out of nowhere.

Or…

You can take what's behind door number two: Support Obama and loads of money, media and manpower suddenly appear.

How bad is this Iranian deal?

First it all but guarantees that one day in the future Israel, or Paris, or New York will be hit by a nuclear bomb. Remember this date: July 14, 2015. It is a day that will live in infamy. It is the day a nuclear attack was set in motion by Barack Obama and the Democrat Party.

But even more frightening and tragic is the immediate terrorism nightmare this appeasement will enable. This deal ends sanctions and reopens Iran's oil spigots. It gives Iran hundreds of billions of new petro dollars that they will use to spread terrorism all over the world. They will use this expanded income stream to support Hamas, Hezzbollah, and Al Qaeda (to name just a few of America's worst enemies).

This blood money just injected by Obama into the Iranian economy will be used to kill Israelis, Jews, Christians and Americans across the globe.

This deal is a middle finger to the Jewish people. But there is a one silver lining. That makes it a nuclear bomb to the historic relationship between Jewish voters, donors and the Democrat Party. This will not end well for Hillary Clinton in 2016.

from Fudge. "Hillary has spent her life advocating for poor and working class families.

"Hillary will help build an economy for tomorrow and beyond; strengthen America's families; defend our country and its core values; and revitalize our democracy. In other words, she gets it. Hillary understands the issues that matter to people in my district and around the country, like income equality, women's rights and universal voter registration. Hillary is the best candidate for the job."

Ohio Democrats in Congress who previously endorsed Clinton include Rep. Tim Ryan of the Niles area and the Columbus area's Joyce Beatty. According to a tally by "The Hill," more than 100 Democratic lawmakers in Congress have announced they're backing Clinton. Former Ohio Gov. Ted Strickland also supports her.

Martin O'Malley Raises $2 Million for Presidential Bid // NYT // Maggie Haberman – July 15, 2015

Former Gov. Martin O'Malley of Maryland, who has explored a Democratic presidential campaign for the last two years, raised about $2 million in the month after he announced his candidacy.

The amount was reported in campaign finance filings on Wednesday that covered the second fund-raising quarter of the year, the first when Mr. O'Malley was formally a candidate.

Mr. O'Malley's aides portrayed the dollar figure as a sign of his ability to connect with the grass roots. Yet the former governor has been heavily outpaced by another Democratic hopeful, Senator Bernie Sanders of Vermont, who raised $15 million in the filing period.

But a bigger obstacle for Mr. O'Malley, a former Democratic Governors' Association chairman who had donor contacts around the country, is Hillary Rodham Clinton, who raised $45 million, much of it in increments of $2,700, the maximum amount allowed in the primary.

Mr. O'Malley is "the only candidate who has actually gotten results on the issues progressives care about," his senior adviser, Bill Hyers, said in a statement.

It was not immediately clear how much has been raised for a "super PAC" created by Mr. O'Malley's allies. The former governor is trying to sell himself as the true policy wonk of the race, and the one with the most appeal to progressives.

O'Malley raised $2 million during first month of presidential campaign, he tells donors // WaPo // John Wagner – July 15, 2015

Former Maryland governor Martin O'Malley raised $2 million in the month after launching his presidential campaign, he told donors during a conference call Wednesday morning.

His take is well short of two other Democrats: Hillary Rodham Clinton, whose campaign raised $45 million since mid-April; and Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.), whose campaign took in about $15 million since he joined the race in late April.

O'Malley, who formally entered the race May 30, is positioned ahead of another Democratic hopeful, former Vermont senator and governor Lincoln Chafee, who reported this week that he had raised just $30,000 from donors, in addition to lending his campaign $364,000.

Former Virginia senator Jim Webb, who is also competing for the nomination, did not have to file because he did not officially declare his candidacy until after the quarterly reporting period had closed June 30.

The conference call with O'Malley and aides was described by three donors who participated. They requested anonymity to more freely discuss the call, in which O'Malley also provided an update on other aspects of his long-shot campaign.

An e-mail advertising the call from O'Malley's national finance director, Michael Kurtz, described the past quarter as "successful."

O'Malley Raised $2 Million in June, Putting Him in Rear of Money Race // WSJ // Rebecca Ballhaus – July 15, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Martin O'Malley raised $2 million in the month since he launched his campaign, a haul that places him far behind his rivals for the party's nomination in the early money race.

Hillary Clinton, the frontrunner for the nomination, raised $45 million in the 11 weeks after she announced her campaign, making her the second-most prolific fundraiser in the 2016 race, after Republican Jeb Bush. Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders raised $15 million in the two months after launching his campaign, exceeding expectations.

These figures, including that of Mr. O'Malley, do not include funds raised by outside groups backing the candidates. The super PAC promoting his campaign, Generation Forward, will announce its fundraising numbers later this month.

"We're thankful for the support we've received from donors across all 50 states who are ready for the new leadership, progressive values, and track record of getting things done that Governor O'Malley brings to the race," Bill Hyers, the campaign's senior strategist, said in a statement Wednesday.

The campaign is required to file a disclosure revealing its donors and its expenses with the Federal Election Commission by midnight Wednesday. That filing will offer numbers the campaign left out of its statement, including how much money the campaign has in the bank and how much money it has spent.

A survey last month of 72 top fundraisers for President Barack Obama in 2012 found that Mr. O'Malley had been making an aggressive push to win their allegiance. Wednesday's filing will offer a window into how successful that effort has been.

O'Malley campaign raises $2 million for Democratic contest // AP // Julie Bykowicz – July 15, 2015

Martin O'Malley's campaign for the Democratic presidential nomination says the former Maryland governor has raised $2 million.

O'Malley is one of five candidates in a field dominated by Hillary Rodham Clinton, a former secretary of state.

Clinton, who began her campaign in mid-April, raised $45 million through the end of June. O'Malley's bid began May 30, and his supporters contributed $2 million in 30 days.

Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders raised $15 million, while former Rhode Island Gov. Lincoln Chafee is financing most of his campaign out of his own pocket. The fifth candidate, Jim Webb, a former Virginia senator, only recently became a candidate.

Most of the presidential contenders are due to file their initial fundraising reports to federal regulators by midnight Wednesday.

Martin O'Malley campaign raises $2 million in the first month // Politico // Gabriel Debenedetti – July 15, 2015

Martin O'Malley's presidential campaign raised roughly $2 million in its first month, a person familiar with its fundraising told POLITICO on Wednesday.

The former Maryland governor's haul lags far behind that of Hillary Clinton — whose campaign raised $45 million — and Bernie Sanders — whose campaign raised $15 million — the party's two leading candidates in early-state and national polling.

The campaign confirmed the numbers in a release on Wednesday afternoon, noting that donations came from contributors in all 50 states.

O'Malley informed donors of the numbers on a conference call on Wednesday morning, which was first reported by the Washington Post.

The candidate's campaign will also be supported by a super PAC, Generation Forward, which has yet to report how much it has raised. The campaign is required to file its fundraising disclosure paperwork with the Federal Election Commission by the end of the day Wednesday.

Martin O'Malley raises $2 million; lags behind Clinton, Sanders // MSNBC // Alex Seitz-Wald – July 15, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley raised $2 million dollars since announcing his presidential campaign a month ago, his campaign announced Wednesday ahead of the deadline for campaigns to file their financial disclosure reports with the Federal Elections Commission.

"We're thankful for the support we've received from donors across all 50 states who are ready for the new leadership, progressive values, and track record of getting things done that Governor O'Malley brings to the race," said O'Malley Senior Strategist Bill Hyers. "And he is the only candidate who has actually gotten results on the issues progressives care about."

The number puts O'Malley behind both Hillary Clinton (who raised $45 million) and Sen. Bernie Sanders (who raised $15 million), though both had significantly more time to fundraise before the report was due. O'Malley has so far languished in the single digits in polls, but is hoping for a late-game surge.

Fellow Democratic candidate Lincoln Chafee announced he raised about $390,000, though the vast majority if came from a loan the candidate loaned to his campaign. Former Sen. Jim Webb will not have to declare his fundraising numbers until October because he waited until after the end of the second quarter to announce his presidential run.

Martin O'Malley Trails Rivals in Fundraising with $2 Million Haul // TIME // Sam Frizell – July 15, 2015

Former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley has raised $2 million in the first month of his campaign, his campaign announced Wednesday, trailing far behind his rivals for the Democratic nomination in fundraising efforts.

The two-term governor's campaign said Wednesday that its total haul through the end of the first quarter on June 30 was $2 million, averaging about $65,000 per day since he announced a month earlier.

"In his first 30 days as a candidate, Governor Martin O'Malley held 15 public events in Iowa and New Hampshire and raised $2 million for our grassroots campaign," said Bill Hyers, the senior campaign strategist on the O'Malley campaign. "He is setting the standard on key issues like climate change, debt-free college, Wall Street reform, and immigration by proposing bold, progressive ideas on how to rebuild the American Dream."

O'Malley's total haul reveals just how far he'll have to go to win the nomination. A recent poll shows him with just 1% support in national polls, even as Sanders gains on Clinton.

O'Malley's competitors for the Democratic nomination have far outpaced him in fundraising. Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton has raised $45 million, or well over $500,000 per day since launching her campaign in mid-April, and Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders has brought in $15 million, or around $250,000 per day. Sanders raised $1.5 million in a single day of fundraising after announcing his campaign.

O'Malley on Wall Street: 'If you slap a bank robber on the arm, he's going to rob the bank again' // Business Insider // Hunter Walker – July 15, 2015

Former Gov. Martin O'Malley of Maryland has made Wall Street reform a central component of his Democratic presidential campaign.

Last week, O'Malley released a white paper detailing his plan to bring a mix of structural changes including the reinstatement of Glass-Steagall and strengthened regulations to the financial industry.

On Tuesday, O'Malley sat down with Business Insider for his first interview about his Wall Street-policy push.

In that conversation, he railed against what he described as "lawbreakers" in the industry, whom he likened to bank robbers.

O'Malley also discussed several aspects of his push for Wall Street reform including:

- His thoughts on Democratic front-runner Hillary Clinton's policies and how he believes she should "be forced to" weigh in on Glass-Steagall.
- The fact he believes Wall Street wants Clinton and former Gov. Jeb Bush of Florida (R) to win their presidential primaries.
- His desire to have a "sit-down" with Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Massachusetts).

O'Malley's fiery rhetoric about clamping down on what he describes as the "dangerous activities" of "megabanks" has caused some to brand him an "enemy" of Wall Street.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In his conversation with Business Insider, O'Malley said he didn't mind that label and would also be content if taking on Wall Street were seen as his major issue in the presidential campaign.

"I don't mind," he said. "Look, there's a lot of really good and decent people who work in the financial industry in our country, and the vast majority of them are just as saddened at the sort of reckless behavior and the inability — the utter lack of any sort of restraint and what it's done to our economy.

"So, I'm going to continue to speak truthfully about what I believe is in our country's best interest. And if that makes me the enemy of a small clique of CEOs of a small handful of big megabanks, so be it. I don't really care. I'm running to be president of the United States. I'm not running to be, you know, wined and dined."

Overall, O'Malley characterized his efforts as an extension of a vow made by the Democratic Party after the financial crisis.

"People are rightly angry that we as a party haven't followed through on what they thought was the commitment and the promise we made to institute Wall Street reform," O'Malley said. "We got part of the way there with Dodd-Frank. We didn't get all the way there. It makes no sense to think that an industry where this much money is at stake would police itself. You know, if you slap a bank robber on the arm, he's going to rob the bank again. The same holds true with people in suits."

Even if O'Malley, who is polling behind Clinton and Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vermont) in the Democratic primary, manages to make it to the White House, there are questions about just how much he would be able to change Wall Street without congressional support.

O'Malley told Business Insider he was confident he could make a difference. Specifically, he cited his desire to appoint federal prosecutors who would be willing to pursue cases against the industry.

"Some of it comes down to the personnel appointments and the people that we'd put in place at the SEC and the Justice Department," O'Malley said. "I think that is something that will have a huge impact regardless of what Congress does or doesn't do."

O'Malley also suggested he hoped to turn the 2016 elections into something of a referendum on Wall Street.

"I also think it should be stated pretty clearly that the biggest impediments to Wall Street reform have been Republicans in Congress," O'Malley said. "I'm not saying that there aren't a few Democrats that have become weak-kneed as well, but the biggest impediment is Republicans in Congress. This national campaign, with the higher turnout numbers that are generally in national elections, is an opportunity for people to make a change and to make a change in their Congress as well."

Additionally, O'Malley hinted that he would force other candidates to address this issue in the Democratic primary debates.

"I'm not going to assume people aren't interested. I know they're interested," O'Malley said. "Other candidates who think they can just gloss over this and go back to business as usual ... I think that that attitude will only last until the first debates."

O'Malley also issued a warning to anyone on Wall Street who wasn't worried about meaningful regulations coming about as a result of the 2016 election. He predicted there would be "a pretty abrupt awakening" for the industry's "lawbreakers" if his bid is successful.

"People that actually do business and do it honestly on Wall Street would have nothing to fear," O'Malley said, adding, "I think the habitual lawbreakers will be in for a pretty abrupt awakening here. We need to restore deterrents. We need to put prosecutors in place and people that are willing to take cases criminally when the facts justify a criminal prosecution."

Wall Street donors are generally an important source of campaign cash for presidential candidates. O'Malley, however, said he was not concerned about his Wall Street crusade hurting his war chest.

"I really don't care. I'm running my narrow path," O'Malley said. "It's the path of putting the national interest first and putting it ahead of powerful wealthy special interests. I know the path is narrow. I know that it's probably the steepest path, but I also know it has the greatest audience, and I know that that's what people are looking for. They want a president that's going to fight for them, that's not going to compromise the national good for the sake of well-connected elites."

Warren, the Massachusetts senator, is the most prominent advocate of Wall Street reform on the political scene. Her office has not responded to requests for comment on O'Malley's plan.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

O'Malley, however, said he was eager to "sit down" with Warren to discuss his platform.

"I've met her before," O'Malley said. "We were together at a fundraiser up in Baltimore when she came in to campaign for the DCCC, and I had occasion to meet her there and hear her speak.

"I'd like to have the opportunity to sit down with her, and I hope I'm able to do that in the not-too-distant future," he added. "I think she speaks very clearly, which is hugely helpful to building a consensus on this issue."

Right now the politician O'Malley should be most concerned with is Hillary Clinton, who remains the overwhelming front-runner in the Democratic primary.

Clinton unveiled her economic "agenda" on Monday. At that speech, she faced a heckler who challenged her to say whether she supported reinstating the Glass-Steagall Act.

Glass-Steagall, which was passed in 1933 and repealed in 1999, separated commercial banks and investment banks. Last week, Warren joined a bipartisan group of senators who are pushing to restore Glass-Steagall. Both O'Malley and Sanders support its reinstatement, but Clinton has not made her position clear.

In his conversation with Business Insider, O'Malley said Clinton and all 2016 presidential hopefuls should be "forced to answer" questions about where they stand on Glass-Steagall.

"I think it's a pretty important issue," O'Malley said. "I mean, for 70 years we protected our common good against reckless behavior by mega-speculation banks on Wall Street ... Wherever you stand, you should state where you stand.

"I have stated I am very much in favor of reinstituting Glass-Steagall. I believe in doing the things that work, and in the hindsight of history, I think most people recognize that repealing Glass-Steagall was a mistake and enabled this sort of reckless behavior ... and the crash that ruined so many families. So, I'm very much in favor of reinstating it, and I think that all candidates in both parties are going to be forced to answer that question."

O'Malley's first major broadside against Wall Street came in his announcement speech in May, where he suggested Goldman Sachs CEO Lloyd Blankfein wanted Clinton and Jeb Bush to win their respective primaries.

That claim has been called into question, but O'Malley doubled down on it in his conversation with Business Insider and predicted other major Wall Street executives feel the same way based on Clinton and Bush's "positions."

"I thought it was pretty widely reported that Lloyd Blankfein sent word to his people that they'd be just fine with either Bush or Clinton," O'Malley said. "I don't think I would be on their short list. That's what I believe.

"I mean, given what we know now about the candidates' positions. And then, as I said at announcement day, I bet Lloyd Blankfein would be just fine with either Bush or Clinton. My guess is that probably Jamie Dimon would feel the same way."

Creating a 21st Century immigration policy // The Gazette // Martin O'Malley – July 14, 2015

My great grandparents came to this country from Ireland. My great grandfather, his name was also Martin O'Malley, had no money, and his first language was not English. But the hopes and dreams he had for his children were purely American.

We are a nation of immigrants — whether our ancestors came from Ireland or from Mexico, or whether they immigrated generations before us or brought us to the United States. But today, the very essence of our country, the diversity that makes us great and rejuvenates us with each new arrival, is being eroded.

Iowa knows well the importance of immigration and the need for reform. As a state economy leading the way in agriculture, immigration reform means greater economic success for Iowans. And as the state that has been home to some of the largest immigration raids in the country, you've seen families torn apart and thrown in a detention center in Waterloo. It's not only heartbreaking, it's disruptive to the workforce as well.

Our outdated immigration laws aren't meeting our economic needs, our national security imperatives, or our values.

So here's my goal: use bold executive action to provide immediate relief to the millions of new Americans waiting for Congress to act, while forging a new consensus for comprehensive immigration reform. Comprehensive reform must create a pathway to citizenship to help rebuild the American dream for us all.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I offer not words, but action. As governor of Maryland, I signed the Maryland DREAM Act, allowed undocumented immigrants to get driver's licenses and broke with national leaders and offered young children who had come across the border a home in Maryland. I stood up to the Obama Administration on deportation of unaccompanied minors, and have stood with President Barack Obama on his executive actions on DACA and DAPA.

Now, to continue to attract the next generation of strivers, dreamers and risk-takers, and to be true to the values we hold dear, we must pursue a dynamic, modern approach to immigration policy as a nation.

As president I will take immediate action to extend administrative relief to millions of new American families, so that all of the people who would have become eligible for legalization can continue to work and support their families. I would also make common sense reforms to keep families together, make sure that DACA and DAPA-recipients have access to affordable health care, and limit detention to only those who pose a clear threat to public safety.

Most importantly, I will use my executive experience to finally secure comprehensive immigration reform legislation that creates a pathway to citizenship and builds a 21st century immigration system.

Our current immigration system hasn't changed much over the past 60 years. It's not responsive to the hiring needs of employers, whether they're looking for computer programmers or agricultural workers. And it tears families apart. My plan as president will be to overhaul the US immigration system by creating an independent agency to set immigration policy based on the real-time needs of our economy. That way, we won't be in the position of having to fight for immigration reform again.

Comprehensive immigration reform will help all families — by lifting wages, creating new jobs, growing our economy, expanding our tax base, and improving standards for all workers. With new leadership, we can and will come together to make immigration reform a reality so that the enduring symbol of our nation will forever be the Statue of liberty and never become the barbed wire fence.

SANDERS

The Bernie Sanders campaign, brought to you by small-dollar donors // WaPo // Jose A. DelReal – July 15, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Bernie Sanders (I-Vt) has raised more than $15 million for his presidential campaign, according to a Federal Election Commission document that reveals the vast majority of those contributions totaled $200 or less.

The Sanders campaign reported to the FEC Wednesday that it raised nearly $10.5 million in small contributions, and an additional $3 million in donations of more than $200 each. That $13.5 million fundraising haul -- which accounts for money he has raised since he announced his candidacy in late May -- was bolstered by an additional $1.5 million he transferred from his Senate campaign account.

The campaign is likely to use the larger-than-expected fundraising tallies, particularly his impressive haul among the grassroots, to reinforce the senator's claim to speak for Democratic Party base.

In addition to his strong support among small donors, the second quarter FEC filing reveals the campaign has spent around $3 million. The bulk of those expenditures have gone to digital consulting and media advertising, on which the campaign spent about $1.3 million. Besides spending $350,000 on printing and mailing services, the campaign's remaining costs have been primarily operational.

There's a new super PAC for Bernie Sanders. It wants billionaire donors. // WaPo // Colby Itkowitz – July 15, 2015

A cornerstone of Bernie Sanders's presidential campaign is extracting billionaire influence from politics.

So imagine our surprise when a Sanders supporter seemed to miss that point and filed with the Federal Election Commission on Wednesday a super PAC called "Billionaires for Bernie."

Putting aside the fact that Eric C. Jacobson, the Los Angeles lawyer behind the effort, will have to change the name because unaffiliated PACs can't bear the name of the candidate, the goal of "Billionaires for Bernie" is exactly as it sounds.

Jacobson is a self-described progressive, who likes Sanders because he's "unbossed and unbought." But to get Sanders to the White House means competing at the levels of a Hillary Clinton or Jeb Bush.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And in today's politics, that takes money.

Jacobson believes liberals' general position against unlimited contributions in politics is limiting their ability to compete.

"I'm hoping to facilitate a level playing field where a billionaire of conscious can write a check … and I'm going to encourage them to do it," Jacobson told the Loop. In his view, there are plenty of "well-heeled" liberals who should get in the big money game.

He's on the hunt now for those billionaires. He already has one in mind, Ronda Stryker, a Michigan philanthropist. He doesn't know where her allegiances are, but he knows she cares about progressive causes.

Too bad in 2013 Stryker was quoted in the Kalamazoo Gazette disparaging partisan politics.

"I don't have a passion for politics," Stryker said then. "I don't like what it does to people. I'm always disappointed."

But she did give $50,000 to President Obama's first inauguration, so maybe she can be persuaded?

Now, no one at Sanders campaign responded to our inquires about this new "Billionaires for Bernie" endeavor, but the Vermont socialist has made clear he does not want super PAC help.

The Citizens United "decision is undermining American democracy. I do not believe that billionaires should be able to buy politicians," he said on "Face the Nation" in May.

But Jacobson is not deterred. It will be a "very unaffiliated effort," he told us.

"There's going to be full-court press to outspend the Sanders camp — the Hillary billionaire drown out," he said. "This is about First Amendment freedoms. … I'm a pretty true believer in this and I think it can make a difference."

Bernie Sanders' official haul: $15.2 million // Politico // Jonathan Topaz – July 15, 2015

Bernie Sanders' campaign reported Wednesday that it had brought in more than $15 million during the second quarter of this year.

Part of that total was a $1.5 million transfer from his Senate campaign committee, meaning that the presidential campaign had raised $13.7 million in contributions during the quarter.

Just under $10.5 million — more than 76 percent of his donations — were $200 or less, while he received about $3.3 million in donations that were more than $200.
The campaign announced that it had received 390,730 donations from 284,062 individuals, with an average contribution of just over $35.

The total is still far behind the $45 million that front-runner Hillary Clinton's campaign is expected to announce later Wednesday. But it shows the significant grassroots backing of Sanders' liberal insurgency, which has garnered huge crowds and is surging in the polls as he challenges Clinton from the left.

Sanders also spent more than $3 million in the quarter — a large amount for an insurgent campaign and one that outpaces what many candidates on both sides raised in total.

The candidate's filing shows that the campaign spent $1,265,000 on "digital consulting and ad buy" from Revolution Messaging, the group helping to lead the senator's digital fundraising and social media effort and led by several digital strategists for Barack Obama's 2008 campaign. Sanders — an ardent campaign finance reform critic who has shown little interest in fundraising and refuses to have a super PAC — has placed a significant emphasis on small-dollar online contributions and social media.

It also spent more than $380,000 on printing — not to mention $822.46 for an in-kind contribution of ice cream to Ben Cohen and Jerry Greenfield of Ben and Jerry's used at his launch in Burlington.

Sanders finds himself well ahead of other challengers such as former Rhode Island Gov. Lincoln Chafee and former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, who told donors that he had raised roughly $2 million in his first month.

Sanders announced his campaign on April 30. Below is a breakout of the campaign's finances as of the end of June:

'Billionaires for Bernie' Group Is Formed, With Neither Billionaires Nor Bernie // Bloom berg // Zachary Mider – July 15, 2015

Bernie Sanders, the liberal Vermont senator seeking the Democratic nomination for president, has repeatedly discouraged the formation of super-PACs supporting his candidacy. That hasn't stopped some political activists from doing it anyway.

The latest is Eric C. Jacobson, a Los Angeles lawyer who filed papers today with the Federal Election Commission to form a super-PAC he calls Billionaires for Bernie. Jacobson, 60, describes himself as a public-interest lawyer and activist who once volunteered on Gary Hart's campaigns. He says he's never met Sanders and doesn't have any billionaires lined up yet, but he already has some ideas for whom to contact, such as Michigan heiress Ronda Stryker.

Unlike many liberals, Jacobson celebrated the Supreme Court's Citizens United decision to loosen restrictions on big money in political races, and he's not troubled that Sanders himself is discouraging such efforts.

"If it was good enough for the Founders to pledge their fortunes to found the country," he said, "how could it be wrong for the well-heeled people of our time to pledge their fortunes to affect the destiny of our country?"

Jacobson's first task may be to come up with a new name. It's illegal for super-PACs to use the name of the candidates they support.

"Thank you for the heads up," Jacobson said when asked about the legality of the name, adding that he would check with the FEC. "That is something I probably should have caught if it's true."

The Bernie Sanders Archive Is Bustling With Mysterious Young Men // TNR // Michael Tracey – July 15, 2015

July is a sleepy time on the University of Vermont campus in Burlington, and ordinarily the basement of the Bailey/Howe Library would be sleepier still. However, in recent weeks it has been bustling—not with students conducting academic research, but outsiders conducting political research. They have all come with one purpose: to dig through the Bernie Sanders archive.

Some are national journalists, but others are more mysterious figures. A reporter for local alt-weekly Seven Days recently speculated that "two casually dressed twentysomethings" at the archive were opposition researchers for Hillary Clinton—which her camp later denied, though not before Drudge Report picked up the story. Ever since then, a retinue of young men has streamed through the library basement. They refuse to identify themselves, and the librarians on duty do likewise, citing Vermont privacy statutes and their own code of ethics.

These men work for Sanders's presidential campaign, the headquarters of which is a stone's throw away, and they have been tasked with digitizing the entire archive—a gargantuan effort that left the librarians flummoxed when staffers announced their plans last week. It's a vast trove of some 30 boxes of documents chronicling Sanders's eight-year mayoralty of Burlington and other early political activities. As material is not allowed to leave the special collections room, Bernie's workers sit for hours on end, scanning every last leaf of paper onto thumb drives.

They say little, but in a rare moment of candor, one did ask me whether I was "with Hillary." Otherwise they refuse to engage, operating under strict orders not to speak with media under any circumstances. Asked if these men are paid Sanders staffers, campaign spokesman Michael Briggs said, "Interns are staff, and staff are paid." Otherwise he declined to comment on their task, what prompted their arrival, or how many there are. Campaign manager Jeff Weaver said of them, "Just collecting information for ads and to document his record of effective leadership as Mayor of Burlington."

Sanders's ad hoc 2016 operation in some sense is a reflection of the Vermont senator himself, who famously eschewed neckties until first entering elective office and reliably projects an image of rumpled earnestness. The campaign is powered thus far more by passion than structure, lacking the hyper-organized, corporatized polish of the Hillary Clinton juggernaut. Whatever the upsides of such an approach, the goings-on in Bailey/Howe Library suggest that the campaign might have been unprepared for the sudden surge of interest in Sanders' past.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The digitization of the Sanders archive began about a week ago, and that his campaign apparently only thought to do so now could indicate a refreshing lack of paranoia. But it's potentially a tactical misstep, too. As much as Sanders might have evolved since his leadership role in the Vermont's renegade Liberty Union Party during the 1970s, his records from that period are housed in the UVM archive for all to see—and might require a bit of contextualization from his campaign, lest an opportunistic opponent portray them unflatteringly.

Notwithstanding Politico Magazine's claim that "Bernie Sanders Has a Secret," no bona fide bombshells have emerged yet from the archive or elsewhere. Much of the material is fairly unremarkable to those schooled in Cold War-era socialist discourse, especially given that Sanders today is a self-identified democratic socialist. Nonetheless, his past statements could feasibly cause some disquiet among the culturally conservative working men and women whom Sanders hopes to court.

To wit: Sanders described himself as "clearly anti-capitalistic" in a 1976 interview with the Cynic, UVM's weekly student newspaper.

"Contrast what the young people in China and Cuba are doing for themselves and for their country as compared to the young people in America," he said. "It's quite obvious why kids are going to turn to drugs to get the hell out of a disgusting system or sit in front of a TV set for 60 hours a week."

Television's enervating influence was a recurrent theme for Sanders in those days; in 1972, he wrote a letter to FCC chairman Dean Burch denouncing as "banal" such classic Americana as "I Love Lucy" and "Gunsmoke."

"How many programs do we see which reflect what is really going on in this nation?" Sanders asked. "Where is the weekly T.V. network series which deals with the worker who is unable to find a job and who is drinking himself to death as a result?"

In the Cynic interview, Sanders was asked to expound on the nature of socialism, a question that continues to arise 40 years later. But in something of a departure from his typical response today, Sanders confessed ambivalence about the term's connotations. "I myself don't use the word socialism because people have been brainwashed into thinking socialism automatically means slave-labor camps, dictatorship, and lack of freedom of speech," he said. "The [Liberty Union Party] more strongly than any other party in the State of Vermont defends civil liberties."

That defense of civil liberties included a commitment to unfettered gun ownership: The party, while Sanders served on its executive committee, adopted a platform in 1972 that called for the "abolition of all laws which interfere with the Constitutional right of citizens to bear arms." This may suggest that Sanders's relatively permissive views on gun ownership, already the subject of much consternation among liberals, could be rooted in sincere principle—not simply in the practical realities of winning election in rural Vermont. While this position might irk the average Democrat, it could ultimately serve to broaden his appeal: Sanders has said he wants to forge a coalition that can "cross traditional liberal-conservative lines."

Other documents in the archive may help in that effort, such as those documenting his consolidation of municipal services as Burlington mayor, as well as his disdain for property taxes. During his Liberty Union years, Sanders endorsed the total elimination of "the very regressive property tax system," to be replaced by a much more steeply progressive income tax. By his 1986 bid for governor, he had adopted "Vote tax relief" as a campaign slogan. You might even say he ran the municipal government as a fiscal conservative.

All of which is to say, there's a lot to mine in the archive, for both the good and ill of the campaign. Sanders, who did not respond to an interview request, probably has as little patience for discussing the contents of those 30 boxes as his campaign leaders do. But his small army of digital archivists have no choice but to be patient as they toil their summer away in a library basement—scanning, scanning, forever scanning. As I overheard one of them lament, "My grandchildren will be working on this."

The savvy tech strategy fueling Bernie Sanders' upstart 2016 campaign // LA Times // Evan Halper – July 15, 2015

Bernie Sanders is more likely to sport a rumpled suit than a hoodie, has no affinity for geeking out on the gadgets of Silicon Valley and may prefer the company of protesters over programmers — yet no candidate running for president is more successfully leveraging technology.

The liberal Vermont senator's rapid rise from a token leftist to a rival with the potential to disrupt Democratic front-runner Hillary Rodham Clinton's path to the nomination confirms that technology, as political data wizards like to say, has become an equalizer in modern campaigns.

"It is extraordinary how this has revolutionized politics in America," Sanders said in an interview. He is the first to admit that he is no techie. "I consider myself smart enough to hire excellent people who know its importance."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Sanders ascent is built on deft use of the campaign tools first developed a decade ago by fellow Vermonter Howard Dean. During his 2004 campaign for president, Dean also was not particularly tech-savvy, but his message resonated with those who were.

Sanders is the same. Recently, he overtook Clinton in the number of people searching for his name on Google. His Senate Facebook page has 1.3 million followers, more than any other senator.

An online effort to get volunteers to throw house parties in support of Sanders on a day this month has so many people signing up that the campaign is trying to figure out how to coordinate it all.

“Can you imagine 20 years ago anyone thinking you could sit down in front of your computer and talk to tens of thousands of people in America at once and do it at such a reasonable cost?” Sanders said.

Nobody doubts Sanders’ ability to draw a crowd. But until recently, a fiery liberal like him would have had considerable difficulty creating a durable campaign operation out of the large groups of peaceniks, environmentalists and college professors turning out to see him in liberal towns like Madison, Wis., and Iowa City, Iowa.

Now, off-the-shelf technology is available to build detailed profiles of the thousands who come to rallies and use the data to find many thousands more just like them in early-voting states. Sanders’ staff can tap into a massive voter file the Democratic National Committee makes available to candidates to pinpoint with precision which people who show up at a rally are prospective precinct captains in Iowa.

And instead of a balky, in-house online fundraising tool, Sanders can lean on the transformative liberal fundraising website ActBlue. Thousands of Sanders enthusiasts are playing the role of “microbundler,” enticing their friends to the Web page where making donations is as intuitive and addicting as shopping on Amazon.

Most of these tools were not available until recently, at least not at a price affordable to a grass-roots candidate like Sanders, who disavows corporate money and refuses to launch a "super PAC."

“We were trying to do this with bubble gum and Scotch tape,” said Joe Trippi, who managed the Dean campaign. “There is a Ferrari out there now for Bernie Sanders to use. He is doing well with it and can do even more than he has been. It can go even faster and a lot further. We will see where he takes it.”

Trippi cautions, though, that technology will only get Sanders so far. Like other strategists, he says the appeal of the democratic socialist drops off considerably once he is no longer competing in parts of the country where primary voters share the demographic profile of those in his home state, Vermont — overwhelmingly white, very liberal and older.

Still, only weeks ago, there was little talk that Sanders could actually win in New Hampshire or Iowa or both. Now victory in those states is at least conceivable, particularly after about 250,000 mostly small-dollar donors sent the Sanders campaign $15 million during his first quarter as a candidate, an amount that far exceeded the expectations of operatives in Washington.

Sanders’ staff is cagey about particular technologies they are using. But unlike the days of Dean, when the software had to be created on the fly, progressives now have a deep pool of experienced political data-miners from which to draw.

The techies working for Sanders are veterans of President Obama’s wildly successful digital team. Among them is Scott Goodstein, who was external director for Obama ’08.

“We were looking for a candidate … who could inspire a movement,” he said in a statement.

Sanders may be no techie, but the gruff independent with the thick Brooklyn accent has a cult of personality that spawns clicks.

In a campaign where strategists are competing with one another to come up with the most clever “404 error” page — the page that comes up when you hit on a bad link within a website — Sanders bested his rivals with a video message that mocks his Internet aptitude.

Standing awkwardly before the camera in an unfashionable suit and tie, speaking too loudly and with the cadence of a grandparent trying to explain something extremely important and complicated, Sanders directs visitors on how to use the website. Swiping a meaty hand in front of the camera, he says, “Just scoot down to the bottom of the page and you will find your way back home to where you should be.”

The Vermonter’s success at harnessing social media defies convention.

"What we do not do," the senator said, "is say, 'Hi, I walked my dog this morning. What a beautiful day. And then tweet it out." Not even close. Sanders writes detailed ideas about such concepts as America's "grotesque level of income inequality" and the "moral responsibility we must accept to transform our energy system," and his people push it out to his growing mass of followers.

"In some cases, we will quote other people," Sanders said. "Like the pope.... I am a big fan of the pope."

Digital strategists have seen this before.

"Howard Dean was thought of as a conservative Democrat who did not know much about the Internet," said John Hagner, a partner at the tech firm Clarity Campaign Labs in Washington and a veteran of the Dean campaign. "People who had a lot of technical sense opposed the Iraq war, and they liked what he was saying. He fit the zeitgeist."

The Bernie Sanders Surge Is About Bernie, Not Hillary // Five Thirty Eight // Nate Silver – July 15, 2015

"The recent rise of Bernie Sanders," wrote Vox's Jonathan Allen last week, "points as much to [Hillary] Clinton's vulnerability as Sanders's strength." Allen went on to argue that Joe Biden should run for president. "The Sanders surge shows that Democratic activists want an alternative to Clinton," he explained.

We've seen this idea before. For at least a year, journalists have been urging, sometimes almost begging, Biden to enter the race. The more elaborate versions of the idea liken the 2016 campaign to 1968, a year in which the incumbent president, Lyndon B. Johnson, withdrew after the liberal, anti-war candidate Eugene McCarthy finished a close second in the New Hampshire primary. The nomination was eventually won by Johnson's vice president, Hubert Humphrey, after Robert F. Kennedy (who had entered the race after New Hampshire) was assassinated. In the 2016 narrative, Clinton is Johnson, Sanders is McCarthy and Biden is some composite of Kennedy and Humphrey.

But these comparisons suffer from a fatal flaw. Unlike LBJ, who (mostly because of the Vietnam War) had approval ratings only in the mid-50s or low 60s among Democrats during the 1968 campaign, Hillary Clinton is beloved by voters in her party. In national polls, her favorability ratings among Democrats usually exceed 80 percent.

Nor do Sanders's gains in Iowa and New Hampshire say much about Clinton's vulnerability. This is easy enough to test. When a candidate gains relative to another, it could be because he is growing more popular, or because his opponent is becoming less popular. Horse-race polls, in which voters reveal only their first preference, won't always be able to distinguish between these causes.

Favorability ratings allow us to say more. If Allen's assertion is right — that Sanders's gains represent an "anybody but Hillary" vote that could go to Biden — we should have seen a significant deterioration in Clinton's favorability ratings. That's not what we see, however. In the charts below, I've compiled all the favorability rating polls I could find among Iowa and New Hampshire Democrats since the start of the year. In Iowa, there's been no change at all in Clinton's ratings. Her favorability rating is about 85 percent, and her unfavorable rating is around 10 percent, right where it was in January.

silver-feature-berniehillary

Perhaps you can perceive a slight downturn in Clinton's favorability numbers among Democrats in New Hampshire — they're now in the high 70s instead of the mid-80s, while her unfavorable ratings have grown by a few percentage points. Her ratings are still very good, however, and (given the noise in the polling) the change isn't statistically significant.1

Instead, it's the Vermont senator's ratings that have shifted dramatically. In Iowa, Sanders's favorability rating has grown from about 35 percent at the start of the year to 60 percent now. And in New Hampshire, it has improved from around 45 percent to 65 percent. Some of that is from improved name recognition, but Sanders's unfavorable ratings haven't increased even as he's become better known, remaining at about 10 percent in each state.

The Bernie Sanders surge, in other words, has a lot more to do with Bernie Sanders than with Hillary Clinton. More specifically, it has to do with his left-populist politics. We're going to break some news here: It turns out that some Democrats are really liberal, and they like a really liberal candidate like Sanders. Right now, Sanders is winning about half the support of white liberal Democrats, but little support from other groups within the party. That works out to around 25 or 30 percent of the vote in Iowa and New Hampshire but more like 15 percent among Democrats nationally.

It's possible that Sanders's standing will continue to improve. If he goes from winning half of the white liberal vote to most of it, he could win Iowa and New Hampshire, though not very many other states.

But he could also encounter some headwinds. Sanders's name recognition is now 70 to 80 percent in Iowa and New Hampshire, so he doesn't have that much more room to grow on the basis of improved name recognition alone. And while he's an appealing choice to some very liberal Democrats, Democrats who describe themselves as "somewhat liberal" may instead prefer Clinton. The policy differences between the Democrats aren't all that profound; Clinton is pretty liberal herself, and she and Sanders voted together 93 percent of the time in the two years they spent in the Senate together.

Sanders may also be benefiting from media coverage of his campaign, which has been favorable to him recently. Polls that show him gaining in Iowa and New Hampshire receive lots of press coverage, whereas those that show him stalling out, like this one released late last week, are all but ignored. Meanwhile, it was described as a "game-changer" when Sanders announced he'd raised $15 million in the spring, even as Clinton raised $45 million during the same period.

Some of this has to do with the longstanding antipathy between the Clintons and the news media (a phenomenon that Allen has written about). But the media have another incentive to paint Sanders's candidacy in a favorable light, the same one that encourages them to call for a Biden candidacy: Coronations are boring. They'd rather see a competitive Democratic primary, which means more to talk about and analyze, and thus more viewership and traffic. This isn't an anti-Clinton thing, necessarily; in the past, the dynamic has sometimes worked toward Clinton's benefit. The 2008 Democratic nomination was portrayed as anyone's race until the bitter end, for instance, even though Barack Obama's substantial lead in delegates made it difficult for Clinton to win.

Ordinarily, Democrats might push back against what they perceived to be unfair or inaccurate coverage about Clinton. But Democratic activists and commentators are more liberal than Democrats as a whole. Many of them like Sanders's policy positions — and even though they may also like Clinton, they'd like to see her pulled further to the left before the general election gets underway.

What about the Clinton campaign itself? So long as Clinton retains 80 percent favorable ratings among Democrats, she has little reason to deflate the Bernie bubble. Sanders may satiate the media's desire for a "competitive" Democratic primary without really making her vulnerable. Clinton has plenty of ammunition, however, including her money and the endorsements she's received from her fellow Democrats (including many Democrats who are almost as liberal as Sanders). That's likely enough to secure her the nomination without her going negative. If needed, she could also press concerns about the electability of Sanders, a 73-year-old self-described socialist who hasn't run a national campaign before.

In the meantime, you're likely to see journalists misunderstand the reasons for Sanders's gains, attributing them incorrectly to criticisms of Clinton. Her email scandal, for example, has received plenty of press coverage, but it isn't likely to weigh her down in the primary. While only 42 percent of Americans overall say that Clinton is honest and trustworthy — a potential concern for her in the general election — 73 percent of Democrats think she is. And 80 percent of Democrats say Clinton cares about people like them.

There isn't much of a market among Democrats for an "anybody but Hillary" candidate, in other words. And it's particularly illogical to argue that Biden might serve as a better foil to Sanders. Biden has lower favorable ratings and higher unfavorable ratings than Clinton and by statistical measures is further to the right.

So if you're going to speculate about a new candidate entering the race, at least do it in a way that's consistent with the evidence. Since Sanders's surge is mostly about Democrats liking a really liberal candidate, you could argue that Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren should run for president. She's also extremely popular with liberals but carries less baggage than Sanders.2 But it's going to be hard for any Democrat to beat Clinton as long as she has an 80 or 85 percent favorability rating within her party.

Jim Webb Becomes Sole 2016 Democrat to Question Iran Deal // WSJ // Peter Nicholas – July 14, 2015

Former Sen. Jim Webb became the sole major Democratic presidential candidate to voice objections to the Iran deal struck by the Obama administration, telling an interviewer on Wednesday, "I have a lot of concerns about this deal."

Mr. Webb said the agreement means the U.S. is effectively "acceding" to Iran eventually developing a nuclear weapon.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He spoke about the Iran deal on the Diane Rehm radio show, a day after the landmark agreement was announced. His four main rivals for the Democratic nomination – former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, ex-Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders and former Rhode Island Gov. Lincoln Chafee – all spoke favorably about the agreement in the hours after it was announced.

A Wall Street Journal poll last month showed Mr. Webb in third place with 4% of registered voters who said they would vote in the Democratic primary. Mr. Sanders was in second place with 15%; Mrs. Clinton was in first with 75%. Both Mr. O'Malley and Mr. Chafee trailed Mr. Webb.

This was not the first time Mr. Webb has taken a position that put him at odds with his rivals.

As leaders of both parties called for the removal of the Confederate flag from the South Carolina state capitol grounds, Mr. Webb posted a statement on his Facebook FB +0.65% page last month that struck a contrarian note, calling on people to acknowledge "the complicated history of the Civil War." He wrote that "honorable Americans fought on both sides of the Civil War."

Last week, though, he said in a TV interview that he approved of the South Carolina legislature's decision to remove the flag.

In the radio interview, Mr. Webb said that in the long-running negotiations over its nuclear program, Iran did well for itself.

He said he has asked himself "What does Iran get out of this?"

"And they get a lot out of this," he said. "They get immediate lifting of sanctions and over a period of 10 years they are going to be able to say they can move forward with a nuclear weapons policy with the acceptance of the U.S. and the other countries" involved in the negotiations.

Asked what the U.S. achieved, Mr. Webb laughed and said: "That's what I've been trying to figure out." He said the U.S. had secured only "vague guarantees" that Iran will scrap efforts to develop a nuclear weapon.

For his part, President Barack Obama has said the deal was a diplomatic victory, compelling Iran to abandon its nuclear weapons program without the use of military force.

"Today, because America negotiated from a position of strength and principle, we have stopped the spread of nuclear weapons in this region," Mr. Obama said in a statement from the White House on Tuesday.

Congress is now set to review the nuclear deal.

Mr. Webb, who served one term as senator from Virginia, said if he were still in office he would be "very skeptical" of the deal.

"We cannot send a signal to this region that we will in any way accept the eventual acquisition of nuclear weapons by Iran," he said.

Jim Webb breaks from 2016 Dems in Dinging Iran deal // Politico // Nick Gass – July 14, 2015

Jim Webb on Wednesday broke with fellow Democrats running for the White House, calling the nuclear agreement with Iran a signal to the Middle East that the U.S. is accepting the eventuality that Iran will one day acquire a nuclear weapon.

"My concern really is that at the bottom line of the agreement, here is what we have. We have Iran having their sanctions lifted, having a number of these other issues with respect to their activities not addressed and having the rest of the region receiving a signal that we, the United States, are accepting the eventuality that they will acquire a nuclear weapon," Webb said Wednesday on "The Diane Rehm Show" on NPR.

The former Virginia senator and Navy secretary's remarks are in contrast with those of Democratic front-runner Hillary Clinton, independent Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley and Lincoln Chafee, the former Rhode Island senator and governor, all of whom praised the agreement to varying degrees on Tuesday.

"So, however you get through the checks and the measures as the agreement moves forward … that's where we end up after 10 years, even if everything works," Webb told Rehm. "The bottom line is: Even if it all works, is this where we want to be in that region as a country with Iran having been so empowered in recent years," he said, noting that he has been a proponent of improving relations with Iran and removing sanctions in a measured way that keeps regional balances in check.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"We should, with respect to the situation with Iran right now, we do not want to be signaling in the region right now that we have accepted that Iran would have a larger role in this balance than would be good for the region," Webb said.

Webb skeptical of Iran deal, worries Dem s bow to interest groups // MSNBC // Alex Seitz-Wald – July 15, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Jim Webb said Wednesday that he is "very skeptical" of the deal Western nations recently struck with Iran over its nuclear program, and said he worries the Democratic Party has become "less inclusive" and too focused on social issues.

In an interview with public radio host Diane Rehm, Webb says he thought Iran gets "a lot out of this" deal while he was still "trying to figure out" the American interest in the agreement to halt Iran's nuclear program struck Tuesday. "I have a lot of concern about this deal," he added, explaining that he thought the deal would result in Iran acquiring a nuclear weapon and that Congress should have had more oversight.

That puts Webb at odds not only with President Obama, but with all four other Democratic presidential candidates, who have said they support the deal.

That's a comfortable position for the former senator and Navy Secretary, who touted himself as an "independent voice" Wednesday and is used to charting his own course. Later in the interview, he criticized his party for prioritizing "social issues."

"I worry that the Democratic Party's message has has become less inclusive even that is as it has become more focused on different interest groups," he said. "If you look at the [20]10 elections and [20]14 election, you will see the Democratic Party, I believe, needs to open up and be more inclusive to the people who traditionally part of the basic message of the Democratic Party."

On Sunday, Webb told Fox News that he thought his party had moved too far to the left. "That's not my Democratic Party in and of itself," he told Fox News Sunday.

Lincoln Chafee Bankrolls His Campaign // WSJ // Rebecca Ballhaus – July 15, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Lincoln Chafee and his wife, Stephanie, had income of as much as $5.5 million in 2014 and are worth as much as $34.9 million, according to his financial disclosure report released Tuesday.

The bulk of the former Rhode Island governor's assets are held in a trust owned by his wife, a multimillionaire philanthropist whose family founded the Rhode Island School of Design in the 19th century. The trust holds between $19 million and $27.5 million, according to the disclosure. The couple also owns as much as $4 million of real estate in Rhode Island, Maine and New Hampshire.

Hillary Clinton Transcript: Building the 'Growth and Fairness Economy'
Mrs. Chafee's trust has stakes topping $1 million in companies including Amazon, Intel and AH Belo, a media company that owns the Dallas Morning News and formerly owned the Rhode Island-based Providence Journal.

The Chafees have no liabilities.

Mr. Chafee also reported this week that his longshot campaign for the Democratic nomination raised $392,743 in the first half of the year—$364,000 of which he loaned to his own campaign. The campaign has $329,000 in the bank.

In Mr. Chafee's successful gubernatorial bid in 2010, his wife donated about $1.8 million—about two-thirds of all the money raised.

Candidates are required to disclose details of their personal income after launching their campaigns. Mr. Chafee's wealth puts him at the upper end of the spectrum of 2016 candidates. Democratic frontrunner Hillary Clinton is worth as much as $52 million, and Republican Carly Fiorina has a net worth of $59 million.

Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush earlier this month released tax returns showing his total net worth to be between $19 million and $22 million. And Donald Trump told the crowd at his campaign launch that he is "really rich," citing $9.2 billion in assets.

Literally No One Supports Lincoln Chafee In Latest Poll // HuffPo // Sam Stein – July 15, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Running for president can be a humbling experience. And former Rhode Island Gov. Lincoln Chafee is testing the depths of a candidate's psychological endurance.

The one time Republican-turned-Independent-turned Democrat barely raised any money for his White House bid, reporting less than $30,000 on hand. And on Wednesday morning came a new poll from Monmouth University that shows him with zero percent. As in, there is no registered support for him.

Were this a one-time thing, perhaps Chafee could chalk it up to the variance of public polling. But, in fact, he's been hovering at 0.0 percent for some time now, according to the Huffpost Pollster averages. His campaign did not immediately return a request for comment.

Chafee is contending with some of the same variables that have kept others in the field way down at the low rungs of public support. Eclipsed by the star power of former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, and unable to tap into the same type of grassroots support as Sen. Bernie Sanders, there really hasn't been much space to operate on the trail. Both former Gov. Martin O'Malley and former Sen. Jim Webb registered at 1 percent in the Monmouth poll.

Chafee has the type of liberal record that would suit a Democrat well in a presidential year. But his odd campaigning style, his complete lack of money or infrastructure, and his virtually non-existent name recognition have left him, basically, alone

Lincoln Chafee's Presidential Bid has Zero Support, New Poll says // TIME // Nolan Feeney – July 15, 2015

Plenty of Democratic presidential hopefuls are trailing Hillary Clinton in polls, but no candidate seems to be trailing more than former Rhode Island Governor Lincoln Chafee, who has literally zero support according to new data from Monmouth University.

The numbers, released Wednesday, show that the percent of people who say they'd back the little-known Chafee for the Democratic nomination stood at zero in both June and July. Clinton, meanwhile, is currently pulling 51% of support in the poll, down from 57% last month, and Bernie Sanders has 17% of support, up from 12% last month.

The sample of 1,001 adults has a margin of error of 5.2 percentage points, so maybe Chafee's just getting unlucky with the polls two months in a row. But even fellow candidates Jim Webb and Martin O'Malley each garnered support from 1% of poll participants this month.

Bernie Sanders throws shade at Hillary Clinton during Senate visit // AP // July 15, 2015

Former Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton was escorted by fellow Democrats, her way smoothed by uniformed officers and her every pre-planned step tracked by a pack of chroniclers as she made the rounds of private meetings in the Capitol.

It was more than enough for Bernie Sanders, the independent senator from Vermont who is Clinton's closest Democratic presidential rival in the polls. Emerging from one such meeting on Tuesday, Sanders strode, fast-paced and trailed by a couple of aides, to a collection of nearby television cameras.

"Let me welcome Secretary Clinton back to the Senate," he said, although in fact, the greeting could more fairly be described as brisk and bracing, rather than warm.

His rival was behind closed doors with Democratic senators elsewhere in the Capitol when Sanders said that trade deals negotiated over the past two decades have been disastrous. "Secretary Clinton, I believe, has a different view on that issue," he said, although he omitted that as president, her husband had negotiated the North American Free Trade Agreement.

"I strongly opposed the war in Iraq," he added. He didn't mention that Clinton supported it, but said, "sadly, tragically, much of what I predicted in fact took place."

Moving on to energy, Sanders said he has "helped lead the opposition to the Keystone pipeline." He added dryly,

“I think Secretary Clinton has not been clear on her views on that issue,” referring to her unwillingness to state a position on the proposal despite repeated requests that she do so.

While not exactly unplanned, Sanders’ appearance at the microphones was a reminder of the type of opportunistic campaign he is running as an underdog. The cameras were there in anticipation of comments by other lawmakers, but he made use of them.

As a result, he got his say — and on a day that Clinton’s aides had designed to highlight her role as a front-runner conferring privately with Democrats who may well share the 2016 ballot with her.

The news that the United States and other world powers had reached a deal with Iran to limit its nuclear program only added to her standing.

“She’s one of two of the most important, most influential voices in this debate, the other being President Obama,” said New York Rep. Steve Israel, who attended one of the closed-door meetings with the former secretary of state.

Not surprisingly, given Clinton’s experience as secretary of state and their similar views on the deal, it wasn’t an issue Sanders dwelt on.

Proceeding down his checklist, the Vermont senator said he believes large financial institutions should be broken up, adding that to the best of his knowledge, Clinton does not agree with him.

Raising the minimum wage to $15 an hour and spending $1 trillion to rebuild roads and bridges is another case, he said, where Clinton has been “less than clear about her views.”

Finally, he said he favors a transition tax on “Wall Street speculators,” with the proceeds going into paying the cost of public college and university expenses for students. “The secretary’s position, I think, is unclear,” he said, avoiding mentioning that Clinton once represented New York and Wall Street in the Senate.

His “welcome” nearly done, Sanders added of Clinton, “I like her. I respect her. … It is not necessary for people to dislike each other or attack each other just because they’re running for office.”

A spokesman for Clinton’s campaign had no immediate response to Sanders’ comments.

Finally, he said he favors a transition tax on "Wall Street speculators," with the proceeds going into paying the cost of public college and university expenses for students. "The secretary's position, I think, is unclear," he said, avoiding mentioning that Clinton once represented New York and Wall Street in the Senate.

His "welcome" nearly done, Sanders added of Clinton, "I like her. I respect her. ... It is not necessary for people to dislike each other or attack each other just because they're running for office."

A spokesman for Clinton's campaign had no immediate response to Sanders' comments.

Bernie Sanders narrows the gap as Hillary Clinton's lead declines by double digits // Salon // Sophia Tesfaye – July 15, 2015

Hillary Clinton's lead among Democrats is shrinking, dropping nine points since April, according to a new Monmouth University Poll released today.

Clinton still holds an enormous lead over her nearest competitor, Independent Vermont Senator Bernie Sanders, with 51 percent of the vote to Sanders' 17 percent, but just last month, Clinton led 57 percent to 12 percent in the same poll.

Increasingly, Democrats are supportive of a Democratic challenger to Clinton — with 53 percent agreeing that it would "be better if there was an active primary challenge," up from 48 percent last December. But Clinton continues to have the best favorability ratings among her Democratic rivals — 74 percent favorable to 17 percent unfavorable.

15 percent of voters are undecided, besting the 13 percent of voters who indicated they are still holding out hope for a Joe Biden run. Biden holds the second highest favorability ratings in the Democratic field with 67 percent of Democratic voters viewing him favorably.

For his part, Sen. Sanders' favorability ratings have surged as more Democratic voters are introduced to his campaign. 36 precent of respondents held a favorable view of the self-described democratic socialist, up from 29 percent last month.

The results in this poll release are based on a subsample of 357 registered voters who identify themselves as Democrats or lean toward the Democratic Party from a larger, national random sample of 1,001 adults age 18 and older. The poll was conducted July 9 to 12, 2015 with a margin of error of plus or minus 5.2 percentage points.

Bernie Sanders gaining on Hillary Clinton, with Biden looming // Washington Times // David Sherfinski – July 15, 2015

Sen. Bernie Sanders, Vermont independent, has gained some ground against former Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton over the past few months in the race for the 2016 Democratic presidential nomination, though Mrs. Clinton still has a firm grasp on the top spot, according to a new poll.

Mrs. Clinton was the first choice of 51 percent of Democrats and Democratic-leaning voters in the new survey from Monmouth University — down from 57 percent in June and 60 percent in April.

Mr. Sanders was well back at 17 percent, but his numbers have increased since his 7 percent showing in April and his 12 percent support in June.

Former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley and former Sen. Jim Webb of Virginia were both at 1 percent, while former Rhode Island Gov. Lincoln Chafee registered no support and 15 percent said they were undecided.

Vice President Joseph R. Biden Jr., who unlike the other candidates has not yet officially indicated his 2016 plans, was at 13 percent, with an additional 12 percent of Democratic voters saying they would be very likely to consider supporting Mr. Biden if he enters the race and another 31 percent saying they would be somewhat likely to consider it.

Among those who say they'd be likely to support Mr. Biden if he runs, 68 percent are Clinton backers, 18 percent are supporting another candidate and 14 percent are undecided.

"Most people seem to be focusing on a Sanders surge among the liberal wing of the party. But the bigger threat to Clinton may come from a Biden candidacy, where the two would be fighting for the same voters," said Patrick Murray, director of the independent Monmouth University Polling Institute.

A slight majority, 53 percent, said it would be better if Mrs. Clinton faced an active primary challenge, compared to 36 percent who said it would be better if the party got behind Mrs. Clinton early on.

Seventy-four percent of Democratic voters held a favorable opinion of Mrs. Clinton, compared to 17 percent who held an unfavorable view.

Mr. Biden had a 67 percent/17 percent favorable/unfavorable split among Democrats, while Mr. Sanders had a 36 percent/12 percent split.

Fewer than 30 percent of Democrats had an opinion on the rest of the field.

The survey taken from July 9-12 of 1,001 adults had a subset of 357 registered voters who identified as Democrats or leaning Democratic, with a margin of error of plus or minus 5.2 percent for that subgroup.

Hillary Clinton's Lead is Shrinking, and a New Poll Shows Growing Support for a Dark Horse Candidate // IJ Review // Kyle Plantz – July 15, 2015

Hillary Clinton is leading in most national polls for the 2016 Democratic presidential nomination, but that lead has been slipping in recent months as Bernie Sanders continues to make a splash in the race.

The latest Monmouth University poll released Wednesday has Clinton leading with 51% among Democrats and those leaning toward the Democratic Party. However, this number has dropped from 57% in June and 60% in April, according to previous polling from the institute.

Sanders continues to trail Clinton at a sizable margin, but his support has steadily grown to 17%, an increase from 12% in June and 7% in April.

Martin O'Malley garners just 1% of support and Jim Webb, who threw his hat into the ring earlier this month, also earns 1%. Lincoln Chafee registers no support in the poll and another 15% of Democrats remain undecided.

Vice President Joe Biden has not announced his intentions for 2016 yet, but the poll suggests that he earns 13% of support from voters currently, just behind Sanders.

But the Monmouth poll shows that Biden's support would grow if he entered the race. About 12% of Democratic voters said they would be "very likely" to support Biden and an additional 31% said they would be "somewhat likely."

Patrick Murray, director of the Monmouth University Polling Institute, said in the press release of the poll that most of this support would come at the expense of Clinton:

"Most people seem to be focusing on a Sanders surge among the liberal wing of the party. But the bigger threat to Clinton may come from a Biden candidacy, where the two would be fighting for the same voters."
Among the voters who said they would support Biden if he decides to run, 68% are currently supporting Clinton, 18% are supporting another candidate and 14% are undecided.

The Democratic National Committee has not released its Democratic primary debate schedule yet but said the first one might come as early as August.

BUSH

Jeb Bush to Release Names of His Fund-Raisers // NYT // Nicholas Confessore – July 15, 2015

Jeb Bush will disclose the names of his "bundlers," or volunteer fund-raisers, his campaign said on Wednesday.

The announcement, which comes as Mr. Bush and other presidential candidates are preparing to submit detailed financial information to the Federal Election Commission, makes Mr. Bush the first — and so far only — Republican candidate to pledge to disclose his bundlers.

"Governor Bush is committed to transparency," said Kristy Campbell, a spokeswoman for Mr. Bush. "We plan to release a list of individuals bundling donations for the campaign for the first two quarters by the time we file our next F.E.C. report."

Bundlers are the financial heart of any presidential campaign, which requires hundreds of volunteer fund-raisers to tap into networks of friends, family and business associates, each of whom can only give $2,700 for any one election.

Federal law does not require candidates to disclose the names of bundlers unless they are registered lobbyists. But some major party candidates have done so voluntarily, including President Obama, Hillary Rodham Clinton, and former President George W. Bush, Mr. Bush's brother. Doing so makes it possible for voters to known who candidates rely on the most to raise money and what industries and interests those people represent.

A spokeswoman for Senator Ted Cruz of Texas said he would not voluntarily disclose the names of his bundlers. Officials at several other campaigns, including Senator Marco Rubio of Florida and Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin, did not respond to emails seeking comment.

Lobbyists bundle nearly a quarter million dollars for Jeb Bush // WaPo // Catherine Ho – July 15, 2015

A key group of fundraisers for the 2016 presidential election, lobbyist bundlers, raised $228,400 for Republican candidate Jeb Bush during the second quarter, according to FEC filings submitted by his campaign on Wednesday.

Bush also drew the financial support of top lobbyists at a number of Fortune 500 companies, including Microsoft, Verizon, Goldman Sachs and Hewlett-Packard.

People who raise more than $17,600 from friends, family and colleagues are known as bundlers and campaigns are required to disclose their names if they are federally registered lobbyists. Campaigns are not required to disclose the names of all bundlers, but both Bush and Democratic front-runner Hillary Clinton say they will do so.

While the amount of money raised this way may be dwarfed by the unlimited sums that can be contributed to super PACs — hundreds of thousands of dollars compared to millions — it nonetheless offers a glimpse into who on K Street may have access and influence on a potential future president.

Eight lobbyist bundlers raised a collective $228,400 for Bush during the second quarter of 2015. The top bundlers were William P. Killmer of the Mortgage Banking Association, who raised $36,200; Dirk Van Dongen of the National Association of Wholesalers, who raised $33,900; and Ignacio Sanchez, co-chair of the lobbying practice at DLA Piper, who raised $32,400.

Former congressman Tom Loeffler, now a lobbyist at Akin Gump, raised $31,500 for the campaign. Al Cardenas, former chairman of the Republican Party of Florida and now a lobbyist at Squire Patton Boggs, raised $18,900.

A number of lobbyists, though not bundlers, contributed the individual limit of $2,700 to Bush's campaign. They include Kirk Blalock of Fierce Government Relations, David Beightol and Brian Sailer of Flywheel Government Solutions, Dave Boyer of BGR Group and Josh Holly, Kimberley Fritts, David Marin and Matt Johnson of Podesta Group.

Bush also drew support from top lobbyists within major corporations, including Maria Cino of Hewlett-Packard, Ed Ingle of Microsoft, Tim McBride of United Technologies, Matt Niemeyer of Goldman Sachs and Woody Simmons Jr. of Verizon Communications. They all contributed the individual limit of $2,700.

Jeb Bush reports $11.4 million campaign haul // WaPo // Jose A. DelReal and Anu Narayanswamy – July 15, 2015

Former Florida governor Jeb Bush's campaign raised more than $11.4 million during the second fundraising quarter, according to a Federal Election Commission report, just a fraction of the $114 million total money he raised when factoring in his enormous super PAC haul.

The $11 million figure was first disclosed by the Bush campaign last week and confirmed Wednesday, the formal FEC filing deadline for the second fundraising quarter. Bush's allied super PAC, Right to Rise USA, disclosed last week that it has raised $103 million in 2015 so far. With another $5 million from his leadership PAC, Bush's total haul is an unprecedented $119 million.

The report reveals that Bush's campaign received $368,000 from small donors – less than the $390,000 the candidate himself donated to his own campaign. About $228,000 came from bundlers who are registered federal lobbyists, including $36,000 raised by William Killmer of the Mortgage Bankers Association and nearly $34,000 by Dirk Van Dongen, president and lobbyist for the National Association of Wholesale Distributors.

The campaign has spent slightly more than $3 million since Bush formally announced his campaign in mid-June, primarily on operational fees. The biggest amounts of money spent by the campaign was for travel, campaign equipment, political strategy consultants and payroll. The campaign also spent around $400,000 on legal consulting fees.

Bush donated $388,720 to his own campaign for “testing the waters” activities, covering travel, legal fees, polls and consulting done before he declared his bid in mid-June. Advocates for stricter campaign finance rules have argued that the former governor skirted reporting requirements by spending months traveling and raising money for his allied super PAC, all while maintaining that he had not decided yet whether to run. Bush aides said Wednesday that his donation to the campaign showed that he was following the rules.

"Jeb 2016’s first report affirms what we have publicly stated over the past few months — that if Governor Bush engaged in any testing-the-waters activities that they would be paid for appropriately, and that if Governor Bush decided to run for office that any testing-the-waters expenses would be reported at the required time," spokeswoman Kristy Campbell said in a statement. "In the interest of transparency, the campaign has voluntarily identified all testing-the-waters expenses as such on this first report."

All the expenditures are dated June 5 — 10 days before he announced he was running.

Jeb Bush to release names of campaign bundlers, joining Hillary Clinton // WaPo // Matea Gold – July 15, 2015

Former Florida governor Jeb Bush plans to voluntarily release the names of fundraisers bundling contributions for his presidential bid, going further than 2012 GOP presidential nominee Mitt Romney.

Bush aides said Wednesday that he will release a list of bundlers who have helped raise donations for his campaign by Oct. 15, when campaigns must file reports about their fundraising and spending during the third quarter of the year with the Federal Election Commission.

"Governor Bush is committed to transparency," said spokeswoman Kristy Campbell.

Bush's move puts the pressure on his GOP rivals to follow suit. Aides to Sen. Ted Cruz of Texas said earlier this week that he has no plans to disclose the names of bundlers. Other campaigns have not yet responded.

Democratic candidate Hillary Rodham Clinton plans to release the names of her campaign bundlers quarterly beginning with today's FEC filing deadline, officials said. That follows the practice of President Obama, who released information about his top fundraisers in 2008 and 2012.

The 2008 Republican nominee, Sen. John McCain of Arizona, also shared details about his bundlers. But in 2012, Romney only released the names of lobbyists who bundled for his campaign as required by law.

Bundlers play a key role in helping amass large sums for campaigns, which can only raise $2,700 per person for the primaries.

Bush has already laid out big goals for his fundraisers as part of a program dubbed "Mission 2016 JEB," embracing a NASA theme that hearkens to his home state of Florida.

To qualify for the first tier, called Apollo, bundlers need to bring in $75,000. The second tier, called Endeavour, is for fundraisers who reach at least $150,000. Top-flight bundlers will reach the Voyager level as they help rake in at least $250,000.

Wall Street Donated Generously to Jeb Bush, Filing Shows // WSJ // Beth Reinhard and Christopher S. Steward – July 15, 2015

Republican former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush’s first 15 days as a presidential candidate show Wall Street’s heavy hand, with nearly $145,000 in campaign contributions coming from employees at Goldman Sachs GS +0.38% and nearly $114,000 from four other big banks.

Another large batch of contributions totaling $63,100 came from employees of the financial firm Neuberger Berman, run by his cousin George Herbert Walker IV, who previously worked at Goldman Sachs, according to campaign financial disclosure reports released Wednesday.

During his six years as an adviser for the defunct Wall Street bank Lehman Bros. and later at Barclays BCS +0.81% PLC, Mr. Bush said he earned, on average, between $1.3 million and $2 million. Employees of Barclays have donated $29,700 so far.

Other large contributions came from employees of companies on whose boards Mr. Bush served following his governorship, building a fortune of at least $19 million. Employees of timber company Rayonier Inc.RYN -0.54% gave $3,950 while those of hospital operator Tenet Healthcare contributed at least $30,500.

Mr. Bush also filed a form disclosing lobbyists who have bundled at least $17,600. The top bundler was William Killmer of the Mortgage Bankers Association, who collected $36,200, followed by Dirk Van Dongen of the National Association of Wholesale Contributors, who collected $33,900.

Some companies whose employees contributed large sums have longtime connections to the Bush family, including the private-equity firm Freeman Spogli & Co, whose employees donated $5,400 and whose chairman Brad Freeman raised millions for George W. Bush's 2004 re-election.

Mr. Bush said Wednesday that he will release the names of donors who are bundling contributions for his campaign when he files his next campaign fundraising report in three months.

"This display of transparency is consistent with the high level of disclosure he has practiced during his life in public office and, frankly, should be expected from public servants," said Allie Brandenburger, a spokeswoman for Mr. Bush.

Not surprisingly, the former two-term governor of Florida received the biggest chunk of money from his home state: $2.56 million. New York came in second place with $1.27 million. Texas, home to his brother, former President George W. Bush, and his father, George H.W. Bush, contributed $1.18 million.

Mr. Bush had previously announced raising $11.4 million for his campaign, along with $103 million by his super PAC and another $5 million from a related political committee. That makes him the far-and-away fundraising leader in the 2016 field. Mr. Bush also loaned his campaign $388,720 for "testing the waters" expenses before he was an official candidate, according to a spokesman.

Mr. Bush's campaign spent more than $3 million in its first two weeks, leaving him with $8.35 million. His biggest expense was $372,647 for computer equipment, followed by $308,687 for media production and political consulting, $280,835 for air charter and $259,201 for event production and travel. Of the $2,107.83 the campaign paid for "taxi fare," $1,396.40 went to Uber.

As Republican presidential candidate Jeb Bush hustled between eastern and western Iowa this week, there were signs of the political divide between the moderate and conservative parts of the state, reinforcing the challenges of the nation's first nominating contest.

As one eastern Iowan who supports Mr. Bush put it, "Iowans can stand nose to nose and never see eye to eye."

Mr. Bush's first stop Monday was in Sioux City, which is represented by Rep. Steve King, one of the best known immigration hardliners in Congress. Mr. King created a furor two years ago for saying many border crossers are drug mules with "calves the size of cantaloupes" from hauling marijuana.

Mr. Bush then traveled east to a local Republican Party dinner at a picturesque winery in Ames, which is near the capital of Des Moines and considered "liberal" by Iowans in the more rural west.

"Mr. Bush appeals to the moderate crowd, the disaffected Democrats and the disaffected Republicans," said Norman Rudi, the former local GOP chairman, proudly holding a bumper sticker that had been signed by Mr. Bush, his father and his brother. "Sooner or later we have to realize that electability is the key."

On Tuesday, Mr. Bush was back west in Council Bluffs, disparaged by some eastern Iowans as backwater "Counciltucky." He was greeted by half a dozen protesters holding signs that said "Illegal Alien is not an Immigrant" and "No More Bushes." Mr. Bush is at odds with conservatives over allowing illegal immigrants to earn legal status. He also supports the Common Core academic standards, which some conservatives view as a federal incursion into local schools.

"This side of the state is the conservative side," said one of protesters, Craig Halverson, the former statewide chairman of a border control group called the Minutemen Patriots. "We're not for liberals or RINOS. We're for our country."

Mr. Bush didn't tailor his remarks to the geography of his audience, however, giving essentially the same stump speech in all three locations. Inside a packed Council Bluffs pub, Mr. Bush began his remarks by taking on Republican rival Donald Trump, who has come under fire in recent days for referring to illegal immigrants as rapists.

"On our side there are people that prey on people's fears and their angst as well. I don't know about you, but I think it is wrong," he said. "Whether it's Donald Trump or Barack Obama, their rhetoric of divisiveness is wrong. A Republican will never win by striking fear in people's hearts."

He was asked about Common Core by a man who said "the folks in the Midwest aren't particularly fond of that." Mr. Bush, who has fielded this question many times, reiterated his belief in high academic standards, driven by state and local officials. "What the federal government role should be is none," he said to applause.

Mr. Bush repeatedly referred to himself as a "happy warrior" during his two-day Iowa swing. He said he would campaign by "hugging and kissing" and said he was not a "grievance candidate."

That's message that the more moderate Republicans in eastern Iowa seem to like, but it could slow down Mr. Bush in the western part of the state, where voters seem to be itching for a fight against a political establishment they view as too ideologically squishy.

"We could improve him," quipped Betty Lou Law, who came to the Sioux City event. Her husband, retired farmer Verle Law, disagreed, saying, "I think he's conservative enough."

The first question Mr. Bush fielded in Sioux City was from a man upset about Central Americans illegally crossing the border. Mr. Bush sought to empathize but noted the impossibility of building a fence across the Rio Grande. And when another a man thanked him for coming to western Iowa, Mr. Bush made a promise: "I'll be back, too."

Jeb's official haul: $11.4 million // Politico // Theodoric Meyer – July 15, 2015

Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush's campaign reported on Wednesday that it had raised more than $11.4 million during the second quarter of this year. Bush announced his candidacy June 15, giving his campaign just over two weeks to raise funds before the June 30 deadline.

When combined with the super PAC supporting him, Right to Rise — which announced two weeks ago that it had raised $103 million — Bush's war chest far exceeds any of his Republican rivals.

His campaign's per-day fundraising total was just under $714,000. Below is a breakout of the campaign's finances as of the end of June:

Total raised: $11,429,897.64

Total spent: $3,078,087.31

Total cash on hand: $8,351,810.33

Total debt: $401,104.53

Goldman Bankers Are Jeb Bush's Biggest Backers for White House // Bloomberg // Max Abelson – July 15, 2015

Important people at Goldman Sachs Group Inc. want Jeb Bush to be the next U.S. president. And they're giving him a lot of money to make it happen.

More than 50 Goldman Sachs executives and employees gave the Republican more than $144,000 in the second quarter, with most of them sending $2,700, the maximum allowed, according to Federal Election Commission filings.

The company that was the next-best source of money for the former Florida governor, Neuberger Berman, is run by George Walker, Bush's second cousin. Employees at the money manager gave more than $63,000. It once was part of Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc., where Bush was an adviser.

Goldman Sachs management committee members who gave to Bush include investment management co-heads Eric Lane and Timothy J. O'Neill, investment banking co-head David Solomon, mergers and acquisitions co-head Gene Sykes, risk chief Craig Broderick and merchant banking head Richard Friedman. Dina Powell, the head of the firm's foundation, and Robert Zoellick, the chairman of the company's international advisers and a former head of the World Bank, both donated to Bush.

Goldman Sachs isn't the only Wall Street firm with employees hoping to see a third Bush in the White House. Credit Suisse Group AG, Morgan Stanley and JPMorgan Chase & Co. also were among the top sources of donations.

No Goldman Sachs employees were listed as donors during the second quarter to Vermont's Bernie Sanders. The Democratic senator has called for breaking up the biggest banks.

Republican Bush raises $11.4 million for 2016 presidential bid: filing // Reuters // Luciana Lopez – July 15, 2015

Republican presidential hopeful Jeb Bush raised $11.4 million for his 2016 campaign in the quarter ended June 30, his campaign said in a Federal Election Commission filing on Wednesday.

His campaign had released that same total earlier in the month.

A Super PAC backing Bush brought in a record $103 million, the group, Right to Rise, previously said in a statement.

The total haul means that Bush will have a considerable war chest as he goes through a potentially contentious primary season. With a large Republican field, fundraising figures are also a way for candidates to separate themselves from the pack, and Bush has so far outstripped rivals such as senators Ted Cruz and Marco Rubio.

Bush announced his bid for the White House on June 15, leaving his campaign only 16 fundraising days until the end of the quarter.

The former Florida governor is one of 15 candidates, so far, who are formally seeking the Republican nomination for the November 2016 election.

Jeb Bush to release list of campaign bundlers // CNN // Ashley Killough – July 15, 2015

In an effort to help build a brand of transparency, Jeb Bush's team announced Wednesday that it plans to reveal a list of bundlers who helped raise money for his White House bid in the first two quarters.

Bundlers are volunteer fundraisers who encourage their own circles of colleagues and friends to donate to a certain candidate, with a maximum contribution of $2,700 allowed by federal election law. Bundlers typically get credit or special access to a candidate if they cross a specific threshold of money raised.

The former Florida governor is among the first 2016 candidates to announce such intentions, taking on a voluntary task that his brother George W. Bush was known for starting during the 2000 presidential campaign. For her part, Hillary Clinton will announce her bundlers quarterly. She also revealed her bundlers when she ran for president in 2008, as did President Barack Obama and Sen. John McCain during their White House bids.

"This display of transparency is consistent with the high level of disclosure he has practiced during his life in public office and, frankly, should be expected from public servants," said Allie Brandenburger, a spokesperson for Bush, in a statement.

Plans to release the list were first reported by The New York Times.

Later on Wednesday, a spokeswoman for Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker said the newly minted presidential candidate also plans to disclose his bundlers.

Election law doesn't require candidates to name these fundraisers -- unless they are lobbyists. Representatives for other candidates said their campaigns don't plan to reveal that information.

"We'll disclose what the law requires us to, but we don't discuss our strategy beyond that," said Alex Conant a spokesman for Sen. Marco Rubio of Florida, who also gave the same quote to the Times.

A spokeswoman for Sen. Ted Cruz of Texas also confirmed that he will not disclose his bundlers.

Committee, which will be mid-October.

Bush announced last week that his campaign raised $11.4 million by the end of June, while a super PAC supporting his bid said it raised $103 million since January.

CNN reported that Bush has no plans to let his fundraising momentum stall, starting a new push called "8 by Eight" where bundlers who get eight people to donate the $2,700 maximum by the end of July will be invited to some special events in Cleveland next month and to a dinner with the candidate in Coral Gables on July 29.

Only 3 Percent of Jeb Bush's Campaign Cash Came From Small Donors // National Journal // Shane Goldmacher – July 15, 2015

Jeb Bush is a fundraising powerhouse among the Republican Party's biggest donors, but he is struggling among smaller donors. Of the $11.4 million his campaign raised during its first two weeks, only 3 percent came from donors who gave less than $200.

Small contributors gave Bush only $368,023, the campaign's federal filings show. Donors who gave the legal maximum of $2,700 accounted for more than 80 percent of Bush's total haul.

For comparison's sake, Republican Sen. Ted Cruz raised $1.8 million from small donors during the first week of his campaign back in March, nearly half of his campaign's total. And, on the Democratic side, Sen. Bernie Sanders said Wednesday that more than 76.5 percent of his fundraising ($10.5 million) came from small donors.

Bush had 12,334 donors between June 15 and June 30, his campaign said. That means his average contribution was $926. The average Sanders contribution? $35.

The new figures will likely only further fuel the perception among conservative activists that Bush is a candidate of the wealthy GOP establishment who is unable or unlikely to connect with the grassroots. In fact, the $368,000 in small-donor fundraising is less than Bush himself spent on the campaign during the brief, 10-day period in early June when he was formally "testing the waters" for a campaign.

When the $103 million his super PAC has raised is factored in, Bush's fundraising from small donors is almost surely less than the 3 percent he reported for the campaign itself on Wednesday, and likely well below 1 percent. The super PAC said last week that it had a total of 9,900 donors—which would mean its average donor contributed more than $10,000. The super PAC said roughly 500 of its donors gave $25,000 or more.

The new report does show Bush's tremendous appeal among the moneyed class of donors. In a remarkable static, the most common denomination for a donor to Bush was the legal maximum of $2,700. More than 3,400 donors gave Bush a maximum-sized contribution.

Clinton And Foundation Raked In Cash From Banks That Admitted Wrongdoing // IB Times // Andrew Perez and David Sirota – July 15, 2015

On the campaign trail, Hillary Clinton is selling her version of economic populism, including calls for Wall Street executives who engage in financial wrongdoing to be held accountable more than they have been under President Barack Obama. She has pushed that message hard as she seeks to win support from the Democratic Party's liberal base, with a speech Monday and a follow-up statement from her campaign the next day.

"Yesterday, Hillary said that when Wall Street executives commit criminal wrongdoing, they deserve to face criminal prosecution. Not a slap on the wrist, not a fine paid by their employers -- prosecution," said an email to supporters from Gary Gensler, a former Goldman Sachs executive-turned-government regulator now serving as a top Clinton campaign official.

Raking In Donations

Clinton's outrage, though, did not stop her family's foundation from raking in donations from many of the same banks that secured government fines rather than face full-scale prosecution. The Clinton Foundation has accepted $5 million worth of donations from at least nine financial institutions that avoided such prosecution -- even as they admitted wrongdoing. These include Barclays, HSBC and UBS, all of which entered into agreements with the Justice Department that allowed their employees to avoid criminal charges. The Clintons also personally accepted nearly $4 million in speaking fees from those firms since 2009.

Neither the Hillary Clinton campaign nor Clinton Foundation responded to International Business Times questions about why her family and their foundation accepted money from firms that settled financial fraud cases and avoided the kind of prosecution Clinton now says is needed.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Last week, former Attorney General Eric Holder said the Justice Department's treatment of banks was "appropriately aggressive" and told Financial Times that assessing fines was a better strategy than "trying to make examples of people" by prosecuting individual executives. On Monday, Clinton seemed to disagree. In a speech at the New School in New York City, she pressed for prosecutions and slammed regulators' tolerance of lawlessness from financial firms like HSBC -- a bank that two years ago admitted to helping Mexican drug cartels launder money in its banks, and allowing transactions by customers in countries subject to U.S. sanctions. While HSBC paid a $1.9 billion fine, none of its employees went to jail.

"Stories of misconduct by individuals and institutions in the financial industry are shocking," Clinton said. "HSBC allowing drug cartels to launder money, five major banks pleading guilty to felony charges for conspiring to manipulate currency exchange and interest rates. There can be no justification or tolerance for this kind of criminal behavior."

Money After Wrongdoing

But in 2014, two years after HSBC admitted to major violations of U.S. laws, the firm was the top sponsor at a Clinton Global Initiative (CGI) event, paying at least $500,000 to the Clinton Foundation. Earlier, in 2011, HSBC paid former President Bill Clinton $200,000 for a speech he gave in Florida.

The HSBC relationship -- taking money from a bank after the firm admitted wrongdoing -- was not unique. In 2009, UBS avoided prosecution by the Justice Department when it agreed to pay a $780 million fine and admitted to defrauding the United States by allowing American citizens to hide income from the IRS. The Swiss bank has since entered into two more agreements with the Justice Department -- one for rigging the municipal bond market and the other for manipulating global interest rates. UBS has paid former President Bill Clinton more than $1.5 million for speeches since 2009, and the firm has given more than $550,000 to the family's foundation.

In 2010, the British banking firm Barclays entered into a settlement agreement with the Justice Department, and admitted to violating U.S. sanctions by making transactions for customers in countries such as Libya, Sudan and Myanmar. Weeks later, Barclays was a sponsor at the annual CGI event. Barclays has remained a CGI sponsor in the years since, even after the bank paid more fines under a new agreement with the Justice Department for manipulating worldwide interest rates. Barclays has paid the Clinton family $650,000 for speeches since 2009. The firm has given at least $1.5 million to the Clinton Foundation.

RUBIO

Marco Rubio Has Missed Most Votes This Year of Senators Running for President // NYT // Jeremy W. Peters – July 15, 2015

If you were absent from work a third of the time, you'd probably be fired.

But among the many perks of being a United States senator is that you are your own boss and can set your own schedule. Nobody knows this better than the five senators running for president.

On average, senators miss about 3 percent of their votes, or have an attendance rate of 97 percent.

But Senator Marco Rubio, the Florida Republican, has a 70 percent attendance rate this year, meaning that for the 30 percent of the days he was out, he missed 69 votes.

Senator Ted Cruz of Texas, another Republican, isn't very far behind, with 55 missed votes, or 77 percent attendance.

Both senators have been on fund-raising binges in the weeks since they announced their presidential campaigns, trying to rake in as much as possible before the June 30 deadline that marked the end of the second quarter.

But their colleague, Senator Rand Paul, Republican of Kentucky, has managed to miss just three votes, giving him a 99 percent attendance record. Mr. Paul must factor in one thing that Mr. Rubio and Mr. Cruz do not: He is asking Kentuckians to re-elect him as senator this year while at the same time running for president.

Mr. Rubio has decided not to seek re-election, while Mr. Cruz's term ends in 2018.

Mr. Paul's record is about the same as Senator Bernie Sanders, the independent of Vermont, who is running for the Democratic nomination and has missed six votes so far this year. The fifth senator seeking the White House, Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina, has missed 45 votes.

WALKER

A Sleep-Deprived Scott Walker Barnstorms Through South Carolina // NYT // Patrick Healy – July 15, 2015

Scott Walker worked off little sleep on Wednesday during the first barnstorming trip of his presidential campaign.

On a one-day, three-city swing through South Carolina, Mr. Walker tried to sell himself to voters as down-to-earth and easy to relate to by commiserating about commercial flight delays. Mr. Walker, the governor of Wisconsin who entered the race for the Republican presidential nomination on Monday, told a lunchtime crowd here that he had been awake for the last 31 hours because his flight from Las Vegas to Atlanta on Tuesday night had been diverted to Memphis because of bad weather.

When he and his campaign team finally reached Atlanta, he said, they had missed their flight to Charleston, S.C. They opted to rent a van and make the five-hour drive, stopping at a Burger King in the wee hours Wednesday before reaching North Charleston for an 8 a.m. event at a Harley-Davidson dealership.

“I tried to sneak in a few z’s, but it’s hard when your head is up against an armrest,” Mr. Walker said in Lexington.

The lack of sleep doesn’t seem to have fazed him: Mr. Walker stayed on message during his first two campaign events. He has had a little coffee, aides say, but is drinking plenty of water.

His stop at a Lexington barbecue restaurant was the second of Mr. Walker’s four events on Wednesday, the last of which will be a fund-raiser in Atlanta before boarding a flight to New Hampshire for a couple of campaign stops there on Thursday.

Scott Walker, in South Carolina, Skirts Gun Control and Flag Issues // NYT // Patrick Healy – July 15, 2015

Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin, in his first visit to South Carolina since nine people died in the church shootings, chose to address the massacre by praising the people of the Charleston region for their unity rather than discussing the gun control issues or the Confederate battle flag debate that arose afterward.

And Mr. Walker, who officially declared his candidacy for the Republican presidential nomination on Monday, made a point of not giving any attention to the man charged in the killings, Dylann Roof.

“I’ll never say his name,” Mr. Walker said, as he briefly addressed the shootings before a crowd of about 200 people at a Harley-Davidson motorcycle dealership.

“It was amazing to see the kind of leadership you provided for this country in what could have been a negative not just for you all, but for this country,” Mr. Walker said of the peaceful and discerning responses to the massacre. “You all showed how to bring people together in this community and this region and this state and in turn you did it for this country.”

He also hailed the leadership of “my friend Nikki Haley,” the state’s Republican governor, who he cites frequently as an ally during his campaign visits to South Carolina. He did not touch on her successful effort to remove the Confederate flag from the state capitol grounds after the shooting.

As a newly announced candidate, Mr. Walker has not had time yet to give policy speeches on issues like gun control or government responses to the mass shootings that have been occurring in the United States. He often mentions his support for gun owners and for laws allowing them to carry concealed weapons.

Scott Walker Tries to Clarify Remarks on Gay Scout Leaders // NYT // Patrick Healy – July 15, 2015

Gov. Scott Walker, who recently expressed support for a ban on gay Boy Scout leaders because it “protected children,” said on Wednesday that he did not mean that children needed “physical protection” from gay scoutmasters – but rather protection from the debate over the ban.

In comments published on Tuesday by The Independent Journal Review, a news website that is popular with young conservatives, Mr. Walker said, “I have had a lifelong commitment to the Scouts and support the previous membership policy because it protected children and advanced Scout values.” But during a brief press conference in South Carolina on Wednesday, Mr. Walker said the decision on the ban was “up to the Boy Scouts” and added that his earlier remarks were not about protecting children from gay people.

“The protection was not a physical protection,” he said, but rather about “protecting them from being involved in the very thing you're talking about right now, the political and media discussion about it, instead of just focusing on what Scouts is about, which is about camping and citizenship and things of that nature."

Staking out increasingly conservative positions has emerged as a key part of Mr. Walker's strategy to compete for votes against the 14 other Republicans running for president. He has been vocal in his opposition to same-sex marriage and his support for amending the United States Constitution to allow states to define marriage as between a man and a woman.

In response to another question, Mr. Walker indicated that he would consider Gov. Nikki Haley of South Carolina as a vice-presidential running mate if he won the Republican Party's nomination, though he repeatedly emphasized that the notion was premature.

"Certainly Nikki's a friend of mine, she has been a very capable governor, and there will be a long list of people like her, but again, like I said, it's premature," Mr. Walker said.

He did sketch out the kind of person he would seek as a running mate, if he earned the nomination: "Primarily someone who is capable of being an outstanding president if god forbid something were to happen to me," as well as someone who "shares my values and my concerns."

Scott Walker Using Harley-Davidson to Burnish 'Fighter' Image // NYT // Nick Corasaniti – July 15, 2015

He could have been any one of the roughly 400 people gathered here. Clad in a black Harley-Davidson shirt, slim jeans with a slight fray and bike-ready boots, the only aspect distinguishing Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin from the rest of the crowd was he was holding the microphone, and running for president.

"I ride a 2003 100th anniversary Road King, so I'm kinda thrilled to be here," he told the crowd gathered at Red Rocks Harley-Davidson, a local dealership, minutes after taking the stage where he also introduced his wife and children.

Indeed, in his initial swing through the first four nominating states, one thing is constant for Mr. Walker and his campaign: the Harley-Davidson.

From holding his first campaign event as an announced candidate at a dealership in a nondescript mall miles from the glitz of the Las Vegas Strip, to the events planned at dealerships in New Hampshire and South Carolina, Mr. Walker is placing the revered Harley-Davidson motorcycle alongside Kohl's department store shirts as key brands in his efforts to further burnish his Everyman persona.

Holding events at Harley-Davidson dealers helps to "show his personality," said Kirsten Kukowski, a spokeswoman for the campaign. She said they're part of a larger effort to reintroduce Mr. Walker to the country, a sharp contrast to the more button-down attire of some of his rivals.

To that end, Mr. Walker, speaking under a giant plastic American flag and surrounded by shiny, five-figure Harleys – most of them Road Kings, as Mr. Walker noted in his remarks — repeatedly referred to himself as a "fighter," a characteristic he wants voters to see as evident from his battles with unions during his first term as governor and his subsequent recall election. He said the word "fight" or "fighter" nearly a dozen times in his speech and news conference afterward.

The line is not exclusively directed at bikers, but for some in this audience, it reverberated with common themes in the motorcycle-riding community, hinting at a proud individualism and even a little rebellious spirit.

"I like what he's done in his home state," said Darwin Rockantansky of Las Vegas, a motorcyclist – although not a Harley rider — who was proudly sporting a Sons of Liberty jacket. "In the local environment, there is a Spanish word 'cojones.' It has two meanings. One some people smile at, but the other means 'courage.' This particular candidate shows courage, and fortitude, and all those wonderful things."

Timothy Cashman, one of the co-owners of dealership hosting the event, said he thought Mr. Walker's use of the brand further burnished his persona as an Everyman.

"Harley-Davidson is pure American," he said, having to speak a little louder as the rumble of a revving motorcycle spun in the background. "And that's what a presidential campaign is about, speaking to the American people."

Mr. Walker will eventually step out of the dealers and hit the open road on a bike to do just as Mr. Cashman said. He had already promised to ride around New Hampshire and South Carolina and Wednesday, he promised to tour Nevada on a bike as well.

But Mr. Walker, a veteran rider who says he has put over 20,000 miles on his personal motorcycle, knew that might have to wait a bit.

“I’m gonna come back to Nevada, but I’m going to be wise, I’m going to wait till October or November before I ride,” he told the crowd, to a few knowing nods.

And he is indeed eager to ride as much as possible before the election, because, as he put it: “They tell me, if I’m successful, I don’t get to ride a Harley anymore.”

Unbending (and unexcitable) // WaPo // Michael Fletcher – July 14, 2015

He tells the story without a dose of excitement or flash of charisma. Scott Walker is standing on the stage of a Denver convention center, shirt sleeves rolled up, microphone cradled in both hands. Before him is an eager audience of more than 4,000 Republican activists at the Western Conservative Summit.

In a slightly nasal, Midwestern monotone, the Wisconsin governor talks about the furor he created. He describes how 100,000 protesters descended on the State Capitol to denounce his plan to curtail collective bargaining for public employees. And he shares, in the least fiery way possible, how he forged ahead with other polarizing policies, overcoming a precipitous slide in the polls and a fevered recall effort that inspired headlines asking whether he had become “Dead Man Walker.”

The bruising fights once threatened his political career. But he survived a recall campaign and was reelected after that. By prevailing, Walker transformed his battles into his calling card. He says one supporter summed up his appeal in a tweet: “I like Walker because he wins without caving.”

At 47, Walker’s polite unwillingness to bend, his placid determination to stand his ground at all cost, both animates and complicates his presidential candidacy. Partisans love hearing about how he decimated Wisconsin unions, cut taxes, defunded Planned Parenthood and required photo identification at the voting booth - all while calmly staring down political opponents. It has helped catapult him to the first rank of Republican presidential hopefuls.

The question is whether voters will see his style as evidence of clear vision or the mark of a man unwilling to compromise. And how far can he go without backing down as he enters an arena where the issues are more complex and the politics more treacherous?

Already, there are cracks. Speaking to farmers in Iowa earlier this year, he endorsed the federal ethanol mandate, a reversal of his previous position. Years ago, as Milwaukee County executive, he supported a plan that would create a path to legal status for the nation’s 11 million undocumented immigrants. He said in March, “My view has changed.”

But Walker is betting that voters want an unwavering, unflappable leader who knows exactly where he want to go and won’t stop until he gets there. He tells audiences he refused to back off on making change in Wisconsin even in the face of death threats, including against his wife, Tonette, and their children.

“It is a myth that winning the center requires moving to the center,” he wrote in his autobiography. “The path to a conservative comeback lies not in abandoning our principles but in championing bold, conservative reforms and having the courage to see them through.”

Pleasant. That’s even how Walker’s bitterest political foes describe him.

In the heat of the state’s showdown with its union four years ago, Rep. Peter Barca, the Wisconsin State Assembly’s top Democrat, publicly denounced the governor at protests across the state. “You know, Governor Walker, you have defiled our heritage,” Barca said at one rally. “You have disregarded our values.”

But Walker, who declined to be interviewed for this article, never took it personally. “I’d give a speech in front of 50,000 protesters saying, ‘Walker’s got to go,’ “ Barca says, “and you’d see him the next day and you’d think I just sent him a coffeecake or something.”

Barca is part of a small group of leaders who meet regularly with Walker during the legislative session, but Barca said those gatherings are almost never satisfying. “Generally, when you meet with him on the major issues, you don’t feel like it’s a dialogue,” he says. “We get along just fine. He is sort of chitchatty. He exchanges pleasantries, makes some jokes. But you just feel like that on the big issues he is just there to tell you, ‘Here’s what I am going to do.’”

The roots of his immovability may lie in what he calls being a “P.K.” - a preacher’s kid.

In the tiny farming community of Plainfield, Iowa, where Walker moved when was 2, his father, Llewellyn Walker, was pastor at First Baptist Church and served on the city council. His mother, Patricia, was head of the Sunday school. The family, which would soon include Walker's younger brother, David, lived in a parsonage next door to the church.

Walker credits his no-frills upbringing and parents' example for imbuing a deep religious belief and a clear moral vision that has guided him for as long as he can remember.

He relied on that resolve, he says in his 2014 book, "Unintimidated," even as tens of thousands of protesters marched on his office in Madison and, at times, outside his home in Wauwatosa.

"It wasn't always easy," he writes. "What gave me the inner strength to go on was my faith."

Classmates, teachers and friends say Walker has always been earnest, the kind of guy people used to call a "straight arrow."

As a young boy, he founded a "Jesus USA" club. He was so concerned that Plainfield's city hall did not have a state flag that he grabbed an old container, punched a hole in it, and started collecting donations. Before long, he had enough money to buy a flag that he presented to the city.

"Scott has a very strong sense of right and wrong," says Stephen Satran, who was in an antiabortion group with Walker in college.

In 1977, his family moved to Delavan, Wis., an agricultural town about an hour's drive southwest of Milwaukee. There, he was active in just about everything. He whittled down model wooden cars to compete in the Cub Scouts' Pinewood Derby. On Sundays, he stood next to his parents greeting parishioners at First Baptist Church. As he got older, he would at times step to the pulpit and deliver sermons himself.

"It was a biblically based church, but not fire and brimstone," says Chris Stebnitz, who attended First Baptist. "The sermons were very conversational. They always had a tie-in to the Bible and how these teachings relate to everyday life."

Walker was focused and busy as a teenager. Yearbooks from his days at Delavan-Darien High School are filled with pictures of Walker in his numerous and varied roles: on the track, cross-country, basketball and football teams; playing percussion in the pep and symphonic bands; as a member of the foreign-language club; and performing the "Stray Cat Strut" with the Swing Choir. The book from his senior year features a photo of Walker with his black hair grazing his shoulders. The caption reads, "Scott K. Walker - the Desperado"- even if the wildest thing friends remember him doing back then was painting his bedroom deep red, with a black-and-white checkerboard ceiling.

"He was very responsible for his age," says Russell Draeger, Walker's high school principal. ". . . He came from a great family. His mother would bring cookies to sporting events, and she would cut out newspaper photos of high school athletes and send notes congratulating kids for their achievements."

He became an Eagle Scout after completing a project that used old telephone poles to shore up a steep slope behind his father's church. He also worked part-time jobs washing dishes at a local restaurant and later flipping burgers at McDonald's.

But the unyielding determination that has come to define Walker as governor was not evident the first time he ventured to the nation's capital in 1985 to attend Boys Nation, the mock-government program run by the American Legion. In those days, Walker stood out as someone adept at forging compromise.

"The dichotomy is he is no longer the person I knew then. He was an intelligent, compassionate young man who seemed to care about solving problems and bringing people together," says Scott Adrian, who as a youth counselor recommended Walker for Boys Nation and now works as a Democratic staffer in the Wisconsin legislature. "Time sure changes a lot of things."

Walker returned from Boys Nation with a new sense of purpose. Seeing the capital's monuments and being able to confer with the nation's youth leaders in Washington was mesmerizing. "As someone who loved history, that just blew me away," Walker said in a 2014 American Legion video.

At Marquette University, a Jesuit school in the heart of Milwaukee, Walker dove into student politics with much more enthusiasm than he hit the books. He helped lead a campus antiabortion group and won a seat on the student Senate, heading an investigation that ended up with student leaders resigning for charging a lavish dinner to organizational accounts.

As a sophomore, he ran for student government president. Walker, who was known to wear suits to class, cited the job he did with the student Senate investigation, as well as his status as an Eagle Scout and his opposition to abortion. The campaign turned bitter, with charges and countercharges about election violations by both sides, and Walker lost.

For some young men, a defeat might have ended any political aspirations. But not for Walker.

“It’s funny - his friends were the ones losing their minds about the election,” says Satran, who supported his candidacy. “He was not upset. It was almost weird. He accepted it as God’s will.”

Walker left Marquette without graduating, and soon after he made his first attempt at public office. He ran for an Assembly seat against Democratic incumbent Gwen Moore, now a member of Congress. He pushed an anti-crime message and papered the district with handouts. The odds were stacked against him in the heavily Democratic district, and he was trounced.

Again, the defeat did little to curb Walker’s political ambitions. He volunteered in the campaigns of other Republican candidates and kept an eye peeled for future possibilities.

Soon Walker moved to Wauwatosa, the close-in Milwaukee suburb that he still calls home. He ran again for an Assembly seat, and he won.

Democrat Sheldon Wasserman, a Milwaukee doctor and former member of the State Assembly, says that, at first, Walker was a typical backbencher in all ways but one: He would not budge on the issues.

At one point, Republican leaders wanted to raise the state gasoline tax to cover the cost of a new road construction. Walker had joined a group of Republicans who opposed the legislation, causing the leadership to turn up the heat.

“They started working him over,” Wasserman recalls. “Leaders were coming over telling him: ‘You are part of the team. You have to do this.’ Some were yelling at him. Scott just sat there like a stone, with a little smile on his face. He never got upset. He just shook his head no, no, no. He was not going to change.”

By the time Walker decided to run for Milwaukee County executive, his unbending political style was in full effect. In 2002, he saw an opening in the heavily Democratic county because of a pension scandal that prompted the incumbent to resign. Walker ran as fiscally conservative reformer. Although he was by then the father of two sons, he promised to return nearly half his salary as county executive. He won.

Finally, he had a chance to put his ideas into action. He moved to privatize services, cut social service programs and reduce taxes. He pushed to lay off unionized county workers, although often the unions blunted his efforts.

Members of the county’s Board of Supervisors, which was controlled by Democrats, recall an annual budget ritual in which Walker would propose a series of tax cuts and offer a series of spending reductions. The board would undo many of the changes. Walker would then veto the budget, and the board would override his veto.

“We overrode more than 80 percent of his vetoes,” says Michael Mayo (D), a county supervisor. “He is a nice person, very pleasant. But he was determined.”

Early in his tenure, Walker moved to eliminate some bus routes in the district of Supervisor John F. Weishan, a Democrat. Concerned, Weishan met with Walker to propose a more palatable alternative. He says Walker listened carefully and promised to think about rescinding the changes. Later that morning, Weishan was stunned when Walker’s office released a statement saying the routes would be cut.

“With him, it was total warfare on everything,” Weishan says.

Despite the pitched battles, Walker was reelected twice, and he took credit for reducing the county workforce by 20 percent. And in 2010, his uncompromising posture helped him win election as Wisconsin’s governor.

Even when he encounters resistance in his family, he does not back down. He blasted the Supreme Court’s ruling on same-sex marriage last month as a “grave mistake,” despite the wishes of his two sons, who support gay marriage as well as their father’s candidacy.

Now Walker is running for president with his trademark brand of bland but unshakable certainty.

"The closer you get to being at the point of running," he tells a Washington Post reporter in Wisconsin when she asks what's fueling him, "the more you realize you have got to be crazy to want to be president of the United States. The only reason you should do it is you feel called."

Walker invokes all that he and his family have endured the past four years: the union protests, the death threats, the bitter recall, the tough reelection campaign.

"If we made it through all that," he says, "maybe it's a little bit of God's providence to say . . . this is what we are supposed to do."

Scott Walker: Boy Scouts should decide if they want gay leaders, not me // WaPo // Jenna Johnson – July 15, 2015

Scott Walker is no longer openly criticizing the Boy Scouts of America for taking steps toward allowing gay leaders.

Walker said in comments published Tuesday that the Boy Scouts should keep its blanket ban on openly gay leaders because the policy "protected children and advanced Scout values." The comment quickly attracted criticism from LGBT rights activists, who accused the governor of suggesting that gay leaders are a threat to children.

On Wednesday, Walker said the decision is up to the Boy Scouts, not him. It was another example of the governor appearing to back away from a controversial stance, even as he presents himself on the campaign trail as being a steadfast conservative not afraid of an unpopular fight.

"That's up to the Boy Scouts," Walker said of the proposed policy change, following a campaign stop at a barbecue restaurant. "I'm an Eagle Scout... All that I pointed out was that the policy was perfectly fine when I was there and I thought they should be protected from all of the political and media controversy about it. There's nothing more to it than that. It's their decision."

When asked by a reporter if he supports or opposes allowing gay Boy Scout leaders, Walker replied: "I'm not running for president of the Boy Scouts."

Another reporter then pressed Walker on what he meant in saying that the previous policy protected children. At first Walker refused to answer the question, saying that he had already done so. But he relented.

"The protection was not a physical protection," he said. "The policy protected them from being involved in the very thing that you're... talking about right now, the political and media discussion about it instead of just focusing on what Scouts is about, which is about camping and citizenship and things of that nature."

Gay rights has become a mine field for Walker, who launched his presidential campaign on Monday and is aiming to win the Iowa caucuses, which are often dominated by social conservatives. Walker called the U.S. Supreme Court's landmark decision allowing gay marriage in all 50 states a "grave mistake," frustrating some prominent East Coast supporters who worry he has gone too far to the right. Walker's two college-aged sons, Matt and Alex Walker, have said they don't agree with their father's stance and support gay marriage.

The governor also called for a constitutional amendment that would allow states to decide if they want to allow gay marriage or not -- although he has yet to add it to the list of things he would do soon after becoming president, like repealing the Affordable Care Act and getting rid of excess regulations.

This is not the first time this year Walker has appeared to back down from an issue when faced with opposition. In February, Walker introduced a budget that proposed massive reforms for the University of Wisconsin System, including changing its storied mission statement to focus on work force preparation instead of the pursuit of knowledge. University officials, alums and others erupted in protest. Walker quickly abandoned that idea and distanced himself, with an aide calling it a "drafting error."

Earlier this month, as lawmakers scrambled to finish the state budget, Republicans added a provision that would greatly restricted the types of documents reporters and others could request under the open records law. Such a change would have shielded Walker as he jumps into the presidential race and faces greater scrutiny. Amid a burst of angry protest from both liberal and conservative groups, Walker and top Republican leaders quickly issued a statement essentially killing the proposal. Although Republican leaders said Walker's staff helped to draft the language, Walker said in a radio interview that the idea was "a huge mistake" that "didn't come from us."

In South Carolina, battle flag not an issue for Walker // AP // Bill Barrow – July 15, 2015

Republican Scott Walker pledged Wednesday to scrap the Obama administration's nuclear deal with Iran if elected president.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Wisconsin governor also vowed to repeal the federal health care law, mocked climate change and railed against "union bosses" in a visit to South Carolina. But Walker did not mention the Confederate battle flag, even as he praised South Carolinians for their response to the murders of nine worshippers at a historic black church.

Welcome to the new paradigm for the South's first 2016 primary.

Walker is the first high-profile presidential candidate to campaign in South Carolina since the Civil War era battle flag was removed from the Statehouse grounds last Friday. The result of an emotional vote in the Republican-controlled Legislature, the withdrawal of the flag from the premises came in response to the killings at Emanuel African Methodist Episcopal Church; pictures of the accused gunman showed him displaying the banner that is still commonly seen throughout the Old Confederacy.

Walker praised the assembly for how South Carolinians have reacted. "You all showed how to bring people together for this region, this state and, in turn, you did it for the country," said Walker, who formally entered the Republican presidential contest earlier in the week.

He is among many Republican White House hopefuls who have tread cautiously on the flag issue, a political flashpoint for years. The state's influential conservatives have long viewed it as a symbol of Southern pride, while many minorities viewed the banner as a symbol of hate.

The debate played out most conspicuously in the bitter 2000 primary between George W. Bush and John McCain.

South Carolina leaders struck a compromise that year to move the flag from atop the Capitol dome to a ground-level pole where it remained until last week. Bush and McCain both declared that flying the banner was an issue of "state's rights," a buzz phrase that traces back to the pre-Civil War debate over slavery. Bush won that primary and the nomination; McCain later went on to disavow his position, writing in a memoir that he should have opposed its public unfurling.

As Gov. Nikki Haley — a politician who once avoided questions on the flag as well — pushed for the flag's removal in recent weeks, presidential candidates including Walker avoided taking a firm position. Walker's stock answer was to say he wouldn't address it until after the victims were properly mourned.

Cindy Costa, a Republican National Committee member from Charleston, said Wednesday it is "absolutely a good thing" that the flag is down. She called it "the right thing to do" at "a sensitive time in our state's being," but she also celebrated that the removal dulls a political attack "that Democrats used against us."

The debate comes as the GOP works to win over minority voters who are becoming a more powerful voice in national politics.

A Democratic leader in the Legislature summed up the GOP challenge.

Haley did "the right thing," said state Rep. Todd Rutherford of Columbia, adding that she is "saving the Republican Party from itself — stopping all the presidential candidates from sounding silly saying the flag is a state's rights issue and not a human rights' issue."

For her part, Haley even gives a nod to the politics. Recalling a recent conversation she had with Walker, she said, "I said if you have any uncomfortable things (regarding the flag), we'll help you get through it, but I'm going to take care of this."

Walker supporters Wednesday said they were more excited to hear the Wisconsinite's pitch on national issues anyway.

"He's a fighter, not an establishment Republican, and that will play very well here," said Edward Lynch, a self-employed security contractor.

Walker was thin on details, including offering no explanation of how his promise of "crippling economic sanctions" on Iran would differ from the sanctions that have been in place for years leading up to the Obama administration's Iran deal. The pact offers trade aid and sanctions relief in exchange for Iran giving up most of its enriched uranium and granting inspections of its nuclear operations.

But Lynch said those details don't matter. "I'm tired of the go-along-get-along politicians," he said. "He's got guts."

Scott Walker backtracks on reaction to gay Boy Scout leaders // Politico // Adam B. Lerner – July 15, 2015 reinstate a ban on gay leaders because it "protected children," he meant the ban protected them from media scrutiny.

"The protection was not a physical protection," Walker said Wednesday at an event in South Carolina, according to The New York Times. Rather, the Wisconsin governor continued, he was referring to "protecting them from being involved in the very thing you're talking about right now, the political and media discussion about it, instead of just focusing on what Scouts is about, which is about camping and citizenship and things of that nature."

The Wisconsin Republican added that, ultimately, whether or not to reinstate the ban is "up to the Boy Scouts."

The comments came after the Independent Journal Review reported Tuesday that Walker supported the Boy Scouts' "previous membership policy because it protected children and advanced Scout values."

"I was an Eagle Scout, my kids have been involved, Tonette [Walker] was a den mother," Walker told the IJ Review. "I have a lifelong commitment to the Scouts."

The Boy Scouts of America reversed a ban on gay youths in March 2013. On Monday, the Scouts adopted a resolution to allow gay Scout leaders; the resolution is expected to be ratified later this month.

The group's leader, former Defense Secretary Robert Gates, a Republican, called for an end to the ban at the group's national meeting in May.

Walker, the son of a Baptist minister, obtained the Boy Scouts' highest rank of Eagle Scout as a child.

A social conservative, Walker opposes same-sex marriage and has called for a constitutional amendment that would reverse the Supreme Court's same-sex marriage decision and leave states to decide on the definition of marriage they would like to apply in their legal system.

Waiting for Scott Walker // Politico // Eli Stokols – July 15, 2015

When Scott Walker's campaign was sketching out his post-announcement swing through New Hampshire, talks between his camp and the Strafford County GOP hit a snag. Local organizers suggested something simple and familiar to most candidates: a town hall meeting.

But the Wisconsin governor's camp, according to three people familiar with the conversations, wasn't interested in taking questions. They simply wanted to deliver a speech and meet people afterwards.

The event fell through.

That interaction, as much as anything else, provides some insight into why the clear front-runner in Iowa is merely a middle-of-the-pack candidate in New Hampshire. When Walker arrives in the Granite State Thursday, three days after launching his presidential campaign, it will be a rare appearance — his first New Hampshire sighting since May. According to figures compiled by U.S. News and World Report, only one Republican has been to the state less than Walker — Rick Santorum.

Over the July 4 holiday weekend as GOP rivals paraded down Main Streets here, not only was Walker absent – his campaign didn't bother to have surrogates march in his absence.

Walker's post-announcement tour of the early states — touted by his campaign as "the most aggressive of all the 2016 hopefuls" — includes 16 stops in five states. That includes six cookouts, four stops at motorcycle showrooms and a town hall in Iowa, where his campaign swing culminates this weekend with a three-day road trip across the state.

But in New Hampshire, he'll be in and out in under 24 hours, shaking hands and making small talk at a diner in Amherst and a Portsmouth Harley Davidson dealership, before heading down Interstate 93 to a fundraiser in Boston Thursday night.

The locals, accustomed to higher level of attention, have noticed. Chris Christie and Carly Fiorina, for example, have both done close to 10 town halls each already, following the template of John McCain, who did 150 of them on his way to winning the primary here in 2008.

"It sounds like the trip really isn't to New Hampshire," said Renee Plummer, a prominent GOP activist in Portsmouth. "It sounds like the trip is a fundraiser in Boston with a couple stops tacked on."

Walker's absence from the state has cost him in the polls. As recently as April, he led the field in New Hampshire, with support from close to a quarter of those surveyed. But in the most recent Suffolk University/USA Today poll released Tuesday, Walker was in the third place behind Donald Trump and Jeb Bush.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"New Hampshire people want to be able to look you in the eye, shake your hand and ask you the question," said Sharon Carson, a Republican state senator from Londonderry who is backing Fiorina. "And if you can't do that, you're not going to do well here."

For some in New Hampshire, a moment during Walker's last trip to the state in May serves as a metaphor for his campaign. Walker spoke to 500 Republicans aboard a 23-foot cruise boat as it sailed around Lake Winnipesaukee, but what some attendees remember is that the captain had to return to shore, mid-trip, to pick him up since he arrived late and, initially at least, missed the boat.

"I've had a lot of conversations with people here about: 'Where is Scott Walker?'" said Jamie Burnett, a GOP strategist from Concord who just signed on as a supporter with Bush's campaign. "I personally was interested in him early on but he just hasn't been here."

Gregory Slayton, a New York venture capitalist and part-time New Hampshire resident who is advising Walker's effort in the state, remains confident that Walker will win over local voters.

"Walker just connects extremely well with people," said Slayton. "He's a great retail politician. He's great at town halls."

Slayton, who President George W. Bush tapped to serve as ambassador to Bermuda, said Walker hasn't done any town halls in New Hampshire yet because he's been focused on budget negotiations at home.

"He's got a day job," Slayton said. "He's not a blowhard former governor from decades ago."

While local Walker supporters say the governor, who is planning to do a town hall in Iowa over the weekend, will do one in New Hampshire eventually, some wonder if it might be too late.

"When you've done more than a dozen trips to Iowa and four or five to New Hampshire, people are going to say, 'Why don't you just go on to South Carolina?'" said Matt Mayberry, the vice chairman of the state GOP. "People are taking note. The day of reckoning is going to come."

"The key to winning New Hampshire is being here now," notes Steve Duprey, the state's RNC committeeman. "By September, people here will be getting postcards inviting them to events every day. The candidates who work the hardest now will receive a disproportionate dividend."

After a six-week absence, it won't be easy for Walker to jumpstart his campaign in New Hampshire, where so many other candidates have been busy campaigning as if it's the only state that matters.

"He better answer the questions," said Plummer, who hosted Walker at her business roundtable in March but has been disappointed in his New Hampshire effort since then. "I would think he reads the news and sees what happens with the Hillary campaign and people being furious that she won't answer questions. You've got Jeb and Carly and Christie here saying, 'ask me anything'."

Scott Walker: Gay Troop Leader Ban Protected Scouts From 'Political Media Controversy' // Bloomberg // Ben Brody and John McCormick – July 15, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Scott Walker said Wednesday that he had been misunderstood when he said the Boy Scouts' now-defunct ban on gay troop leaders "protected children."

"The protection was not a physical protection," Walker told reporters in Lexington, South Carolina, two days after announcing his campaign for president. "It's a protection [from] discussion about the policy—protected them from being involved in the very thing you're about to talk about right now, political and media discussion about it, instead of just focusing on what Scouts are about, which is about camping and citizenship and things of that nature."

The Wisconsin governor's remarks come as he seeks to court social conservatives in Iowa and other early nomination voting states. The 47-year-old is an Eagle Scout himself. The executive committee of the Boy Scouts of America unanimously approved a resolution this week that would end a ban on gay adult leaders and let local troops set their own policies.

Walker told the conservative news outlet IJReview on Tuesday that he supported "the previous membership policy because it protected children and advanced Scout values." The Human Rights Campaign, a gay rights group, slammed the comments as "offensive, outrageous, and absolutely unacceptable" and said his "comments imply that [gays and lesbians] represent a threat to the safety and well-being of young people."

The policy should be "up to the Boy Scouts," Walker said Wednesday. "The policy was perfectly fine when I was there and I thought they should be protected from all the political and media controversy."

"I'm not running for president for the Boy Scouts," he added.

Asked in 2013 whether gay people should be allowed into the organization, Walker declined to comment, saying he had "enough troubles and challenges dealing with what I have in state government to take on anybody else's challenges," according to the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel.

Scott Walker Confronts the Rigors of t he Presidential Campaign T rail // Bloom berg // John McCormick – July 15, 2015

The brutal reality of a presidential campaign hit Scott Walker somewhere in the sky over the southern U.S. late Tuesday.

The Wisconsin governor's commercial flight had been circling amid thunderstorms on its way to Atlanta, where he and his entourage were to catch a connecting flight to Charleston.

The pilot informed the flight's passengers that they were running low on fuel and needed to divert to Memphis. After hours on the ground there, Walker resusmed his flight to Atlanta, and arrived at about 1:30 a.m., where he missed his connection by minutes.

Walker's aides decided the only way they could get him to his 8 a.m. event Wednesday at a Harley-Davidson dealership in North Charleston would be to drive. About five hours later, the newly minted Republican presidential candidate arrived with a smile on his face, taking it all in stride and telling his audience of about 250 people that he hadn't slept in more than 24 hours.

But it quickly became clear on Wednesday that Walker's challenges during his presidential announcement rollout week wouldn't involve just weather and delayed flights.

For the second day in a row, reporters pressed him on his statements in opposition to a resolution unanimously approved by the executive committee of the Boy Scouts of America this week that would end a ban on gay adult leaders. Initially, Walker had stated that the earlier policy "protected children," but after facing criticism from gay rights groups, he sought to clarify his remarks.

"The policy was perfectly fine when I was there and I thought they should be protected from all the political and media controversy," Walker said Wednesday.

The topic served as a distraction at a time Walker wanted, as much as possible, to stick to a message of resolute leadership and conservative accomplishment that he'd outlined in his announcement speech Monday in Waukesha, Wisconsin.

On Thursday, he's likely to face questions about an expected Wisconsin Supreme Court ruling. That ruling will answer the question of whether a criminal investigation can move forward into whether Walker's 2012 recall campaign illegally coordinated with outside groups exempt from donor disclosure laws.

Despite the distractions, Walker drew good-sized crowds at his stops Wednesday. A sprawling parking outside a barbeque restaurant where he spoke in Lexington was at capacity and beyond with cars double-parked and hundreds there to see him.

"I've liked Scott Walker since the media started attacking him a few years ago," said Louie Cameron, 59, an insurance agent who drove more than an hour to attend the North Charleston event. "That's always a sign of a great leader."

At that same event, Phil Schoonover allowed Walker to break one of his fundamental tenants when it comes to talking about and selling Harley-Davidson motorcycles.

"We normally don't bring politics or religion into it," said Schoonover, who for 36 years has owned Low Country Harley-Davidson.

As part of a five-state tour this week, Walker is using Harley dealerships as campaign props for four of his stops. They offer free space and help burnish his everyman image.

"We get a free doughnut and some coffee," said Schoonover, a Republican still surveying his party's presidential field.

Ahead of Walker's appearance, Schoonover's workers busily polished the dealership, moving roughly 40 motorcycles off the showroom floor to make room for Walker's stage and audience.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A Walker political operative had stopped in on the 5th of July, a Sunday, to ask about using the space for a possible event, Schoonover said.

Given the fact that the company he represents is based in Walker's Wisconsin, Schoonover said he didn't feel like he could say no. "My franchise is with Harley-Davidson, which has its home office in Milwaukee," Schoonover explained.

Besides, Schoonover said he figured it would mean some free publicity for his business and brand. "We sell everything from baby bibs to dog toys. We sell a lifestyle," he said.

Other than his history of confronting unions and the fact that he rides a Harley, Schoonover said he doesn't know much about Walker and isn't necessarily going to support him in February's South Carolina primary.

"I think he's a balanced budget guy and that appeals to me," said Schoonover, adding that he's also intrigued by the candidacy of former Hewlett-Packard CEO Carly Fiorina.

Walker, who owns a 2003 Road King, has for years used his Harley to connect with rural voters, veterans and other riders.

"They tell me, if I'm successful, I don't get to ride a Harley anymore," he said Tuesday at a Harley dealership in Las Vegas.

It was an apparent reference to limits the Secret Service might place on a future President Walker. That said, the rookie national candidate has many storms, canceled flights and controversies ahead of him before that could happen.

Flight Delays Add Exhaustion to Scott Walker's Rollout Marathon // Bloomberg // John McCormick – July 15, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Scott Walker said Wednesday he hasn't slept for more than a day after thunderstorms wreaked havoc on the commercial flight schedule his campaign created to stress his everyman persona and save some money.

The Wisconsin governor arrived just a few minutes late to his 8 a.m. stop in the early primary state of South Carolina, after driving through the night from Atlanta following a missed connection there.

Joined by his three family members and aides, Walker was trying to get to South Carolina from Las Vegas, where he'd made his first campaign appearance Tuesday after announcing his presidential bid Monday in Wisconsin.

“Finally, when they got us into Atlanta, we had missed our flight to here by about five minutes.”

"Because of the storms last night, we were diverted to Memphis for a while," Walker told about 250 people gathered at a Harley-Davidson dealership in North Charleston. "Finally, when they got us into Atlanta, we had missed our flight to here by about five minutes."

The journey then continued by rental car.

"A little before three o'clock this morning, we left Atlanta and drove here because we didn't want to let you down because we knew there was a great crowd," Walker said.

The newly minted candidate hit all his standard lines during a 26-minute speech to those gathered on the dealership's sales floor, although his eyes did look weary.

On a more serious note, Walked praised South Carolina Governor Nikki Haley and the state's residents for how they reacted to the shooting deaths of nine people at a historic black church in Charleston last month.

"Thanks to everybody in this region and this state for showing the nation about how to become united when something tragic happens," he said. "Obviously, what happened was something we denounce, not only the action, but the beliefs of the person involved. I will never say his name."

It could be a long day for Walker. He has two additional stops in South Carolina, a drive back to Atlanta, and an evening appearance there. On Thursday, Walker heads to New Hampshire before starting a three-day tour of Iowa on Friday.

Scott Walker Sues Feds Over Food Stamp Drug Testing // HuffPo // Arthur Delaney – July 15, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, one of many Republicans seeking their party's presidential nomination, is suing the federal government over his plan to make some food stamp recipients pee in cups to prove they're not on drugs.

Federal law doesn't give states much room to impose new conditions on Supplemental Nutrition Assistance Program benefits. The program is known informally by its former name, food stamps, and in Wisconsin it's called FoodShare.

“This lawsuit seeks to provide clarity that the State of Wisconsin has the authority to require drug testing for FoodShare recipients,” Wisconsin Attorney General Brad Schimel said in a press release on Tuesday.

While federal law doesn't allow states to impose drug tests on SNAP recipients, it does allow states to drug test and in general make up their own rules for the much smaller Temporary Assistance for Needy Families program, which serves about 4 million Americans. Roughly 46 million Americans receive SNAP benefits.

The Wisconsin lawsuit appears to hinge on whether the state can treat SNAP recipients like TANF recipients. The state evidently thinks it can: The new law that calls for drug tests also claims that an "individual who is a recipient under the food stamp program is considered to be a welfare recipient."

Temporary Assistance for Needy Families is the program most commonly called "welfare," though Republicans have used the term to describe most means-tested safety net programs.

In its press release about the lawsuit, Wisconsin says the state's position is that "FoodShare recipients are 'welfare recipients' and therefore may be tested and sanctioned for the use of controlled substances."

By any measure, TANF and SNAP are very different programs. SNAP is an entitlement that gives monthly food vouchers (in the form of debit cards) to anyone poor enough to qualify, with some restrictions on able-bodied adults without dependents and not too many differences across state lines. TANF, meanwhile, is generally for single mothers who meet a range of requirements that can vary widely by state. Annual federal spending for TANF is capped at about $16 billion, while annual spending for SNAP has surged to nearly five times that amount in the wake of the Great Recession.

Republicans in Congress and on the presidential campaign trail have frequently called for bringing "welfare reform" to food stamps and Medicaid, since the major welfare reform legislation of 1996 stunted TANF spending and enrollment.

When Georgia tried to drug test food stamp recipients last year, the U.S. Department of Agriculture said no.

"Requiring SNAP applicants and recipients to pass a drug test in order to receive benefits would constitute an additional condition of eligibility, and therefore, is not allowable under law," the USDA told Georgia.

Unions: This time, we’ll defeat Walker // The Hill // Tim Davaney – July 15, 2015

Labor groups are gearing up for another fight with Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker (R) now that he has entered the presidential race.

After a failed recall bid in Wisconsin, unions are determined to make sure Walker never sets foot in the Oval Office. But organized labor’s opposition could play well for Walker in the GOP primary because it appeals to his conservative base.

Some of the biggest unions are still formulating their plan of attack against Walker, even as they signal they will dip into their coffers to go after him. The strongest signal came from AFL-CIO President Richard Trumka. “Scott Walker is a national disgrace,” Trumka said in a six-word statement rebuking the Wisconsin governor.

Walker has clashed with unions since taking over as governor of the Democratic-leaning Wisconsin, a state with strong union roots, pushing policies that have weakened public and private sector unions.

Critics paint Walker as a union buster. “You can’t actually outlaw unions, but he did everything in his power to weaken unions in Wisconsin,” one labor official told The Hill.

Walker raised the stakes for unions on Monday as he announced his bid for the presidency.

“Since I’ve been governor, we took on the unions and won,” Walker said. “If our reforms can work in a blue state like Wisconsin, they can work anywhere in America.”

Shortly after taking over as governor in 2011, Walker signed legislation that severely weakened the collective bargaining rights of public sector employees such as teachers. Under the bill, state and local government workers — excluding police officers and firefighters — can only bargain for raises up to the point of inflation. Unions argue this move holds down wages throughout the state.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This led unions to attempt to recall Walker in 2012, which he ultimately survived.

Walker again targeted unions earlier this year after he was reelected, this time going after private sector unions. He signed right-to-work legislation that gives workers the choice to not join a union even if they indirectly benefit from the union's collective bargaining agreements.

Walker's campaign, which did not respond to a request for comment, is touting his record of standing up to Big Labor, but unions see it as a threat to their survival.

The back-and-forth with unions will only help raise Walker's profile among potential Republican voters, said GOP strategist Ford O'Connell.

"This is political gold for Scott Walker in the Republican primary," O'Connell said. "The fact that unions are attacking him and that he even won a recall election shows conservative voters that he's a fighter who doesn't back down and gets results."

Walker's announcement that he is running for president fired up labor activists, who are churning out stories from local union leaders in Wisconsin to "warn" the country of what's at stake.

"A Scott Walker presidency is a scary, scary thing for America," said Phil Neuenfeldt, president of the AFL-CIO's Wisconsin branch.

Sheila Cochran of the Milwaukee Area Labor Council called Walker's labor policies "idiotic."

"Labor has really taken a serious beating by the governor in this state," she said. "He looks at us as if we're trying to totally derail corporate America."

"It concerns me that he's hit the national stage," Cochran added. "I pray he never becomes president. This is a man that just cannot lead this country. I would be terrified."

Michael Bolton, the district director for the United Steelworkers in Wisconsin, said unions must "make sure that all workers in America understand Scott Walker is not a friend of the working person."

"We're going to talk about what he has done to the state and what we believe he plans to do to the country if he were elected," Bolton said.

Labor activists plan to use aggressive social media tactics to spread the word about Walker's treatment of unions in Wisconsin.

"Scott Walker has made it his mission to crush the ability of workers to come together, stick together, have each other's backs and have a meaningful voice at work through their union," said Stephanie Bloomingdale, secretary-treasurer of the AFL-CIO's Wisconsin branch.

"The concern is that is a blueprint for what he would do as president," a labor official told The Hill.

Walker's tough talk against labor generally plays well for him with many business-friendly Republican voters, but he faced backlash even from his own party earlier this year when he compared union protesters to terrorists.

The governor had been asked about how he would handle the situation with ISIS. "If I can take on 100,000 protesters, I can do the same across the globe," he responded.

Labor groups have not forgotten the comment.

"That's pretty much the most offensive thing he could say that working people who are standing up for their rights are equivalent to terrorists," one labor official told The Hill.

"I've talked to a lot of first responders who were there on 9/11, and they've also been to union rallies — and they don't look anything alike," the official added.

Scott Walker tells Laura Ingraham he doesn't believe abortion should be between a woman and her doctor // Capital Times // Jessie Opoien – July 15, 2015

In his more than 20 years in politics, Gov. Scott Walker has never wavered on his stance on abortion issues. But he has demonstrated flexibility in the way he frames it.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The most illustrative example of this was his 2014 re-election campaign, running against Democrat Mary Burke.

After being repeatedly slammed by pro-choice groups like Emily's List, NARAL Pro-Choice America and Planned Parenthood for signing into law a bill that requires women to undergo ultrasound exams before getting abortions, Walker ran an ad that described the decision of whether or not to end a pregnancy as "an agonizing one."

"That's why I support legislation to increase safety and to provide more information for a woman considering her options," Walker said, looking directly into the camera. "The bill leaves the final decision to a woman and her doctor. Now, reasonable people can disagree on this issue. Our priority is to protect the health and safety of all Wisconsin citizens."

The ad was knocked by some pro-life advocates for sounding too soft on the issue and by pro-choice groups who said it misrepresented his position. But Walker won the election, continuing a long streak of victories.

That ad has continued to come up as Walker parlays his experience in Wisconsin into a presidential bid. A recent New York Times article reported that Walker "went on to write and design the commercial himself."

"I didn't like the ad. You're using the other side's garbage and it's not helpful," Concerned Women for America president Penny Nance told Politico earlier this month.

Nance told Politico despite her displeasure with the ad, she never doubted Walker's position on the issue. She said she was "thrilled" he would soon sign into law a 20-week abortion ban.

But despite the conservative cred earned with the 20-week ban, Walker was asked about the ad once again by conservative radio host Laura Ingraham on Wednesday.

Ingraham told Walker she knows where his heart is on the issue, then played audio from the ad and asked why the ad included a line about leaving the decision to a woman and her doctor.

"Because we wanted to make the point — you had the pro-abortion, the NARAL, and Emily's List, and Planned Parenthood and others out there tying to twist our ultrasound language into something that it wasn't. We wanted to make the case, this is all it does, it doesn't do anything else for all them complaining about this, it doesn't change that decision," Walker said. "I still believe that you're talking about an unborn child as a human being, and I believe that, and I have articulated that for more than 20 years, all the way back — a lot of the people you were sitting with are folks I worked with at Marquette Students for Life when I was a student in college. I've always had a strong pro-life position, I've always defended that. But, for us, it made it able to wipe that issue right off the table because we pushed back and said, what we were proposing was a positive, strong common sense thing to do to get people information."

Ingraham responded: "But you don't believe — I just want to clarify this, governor ... you don't believe the final decision should be between a woman and her doctor—"

"No," Walker replied. "I believe it's an unborn child. My point was, in pointing that out, is the bill, all it does, is require an ultrasound. It didn't change what the law is."

PAUL

Rand Paul's official haul: $7 million // Politico // Katie Glueck and Jonathan Topaz – July 15, 2015

Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul's presidential campaign took in about $7 million in the second quarter.

The libertarian-leaning Republican, who is currently running for Senate re-election as well, transferred $1.6 million from his Senate campaign committee to his presidential committee, meaning that his White House bid raised $5.3 million in the quarter.

About 60 percent of contributions from individual donors came from those providing $200 or less to the campaign. The only GOP campaign with a greater percentage of small-dollar donations in the second quarter was Ben Carson.

Below is a breakout of where Paul's campaign finances stood as of the end of June:

Rand 2015 Runs From Rand 2007 On Iran // Daily Beast // Olivia Nuzzi – July 15, 2015

In 2007, Rand Paul gave his first interview to Alex Jones, the conspiracy theorist radio host and founder of Infowars.com.

Paul was helping his father, then-Congressman Ron Paul, campaign for the Republican presidential nomination and, Jones said, the entirety of his audience helped to make up the elder Paul's base of fervent supporters.

Jones was struck by the younger Paul's similarity to his father. "You know, talking to you, you sound so much like your dad," Jones said. "This is great! We have, like, a Ron Paul clone!"

When Jones noted that the elder Paul was the only anti-war candidate, Rand replied, "I tell people in speeches, I say you know, we're against the Iraq war, we have been since the beginning, but we're also against the Iran war—you know, the one that hasn't started yet. You know, the thing is I think people want to paint my father into some corner, but if you look at it, intellectually, look at the evidence that Iran is not a threat."

As evidence of this, he said, you needn't look further than the fact that

"Iran cannot even refine their own gasoline."

And further, Paul said, "even our own intelligence community consensus opinion now is that they're not a threat. My dad says, they don't have an air force! They don't have a navy! You know, it's ridiculous to think that they're a threat to our national security. It's not even that viable to say they're a threat to Israel. Most people say Israel has 100 nuclear weapons."

Eight years later, Paul's beliefs are very different.

"Even our own intelligence community consensus opinion now is that they're not a threat." Rand 2007
In response to the agreement reached Tuesday between Iran, the United States, the UK, France, China, Russia and Germany to diminish Iran's nuclear program, Paul, now the junior Senator from Kentucky and candidate for the Republican presidential nomination, released a statement outlining his opposition.

"The proposed agreement with Iran is unacceptable for the following reasons:

1) sanctions relief precedes evidence of compliance

2) Iran is left with significant nuclear capacity

3) it lifts the ban on selling advanced weapons to Iran

I will, therefore, vote against the agreement. While I continue to believe negotiations are preferable to war, I would prefer to keep the interim agreement in place instead of accepting a bad deal."

Asked how Paul's position had shifted so dramatically since he was campaigning for his father, Doug Stafford, his senior campaign adviser, said, "Foreign policy should reflect events and events change. Senator Paul has always thought Iran getting a nuclear weapon was a bad idea and dangerous. But over the last eight years, as Iran has made progress in their nuclear enrichment program, it's become more of a threat. Not allowing your opinions to reflect changing threats would be foolish."

But it's just frankly not true, as the Alex Jones interview demonstrates.

What is true is that the Iran deal places Paul in an impossible bind. Paul's positions are usually so nuanced that they escape criticism of flip-flopping, but his shift on Iran is unusually clear—even if it was gradual.

Whether compromise is a wise strategy for Paul in the primary is uncertain. Paul is currently polling at 6.6 percent—behind Jeb Bush, Donald Trump, Scott Walker, Marco Rubio, Ben Carson and Mike Huckabee. Paul is not going to vault back into the top tier by siphoning off votes from more establishment candidates, whose supporters will never buy him as one of their own. And he won't mobilize his libertarian base by taking them for granted.

In April, reporter David Weigel, outlined in detail Paul's transformation for Bloomberg Politics. In 2011, while in the Senate, Paul was still vocally opposed to war, telling reporter Zaid Jilani he wanted to "influence" Iran instead. In 2012, while again campaigning for his father, he reiterated their anti-war position while clarifying that Ron Paul

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"doesn't want Iran to nuclear weapons…But should they get nuclear weapons, he thinks that there are some choices." A few weeks later, Paul explained to CNN that when it came to preventing Iran from obtaining nuclear weapons, "I did finally come down to the conclusion that doing something was better than doing nothing."

By 2013, Paul was saying that "the most pressing issue of the day" was how to contend with Iran's nuclear program, and said that although he still did not want war, if he were in the White House while a deal collapsed, "I would say all options are on the table, and that would include military."

Back in March, Paul was faced with a choice: sign the open letter penned by his Senate colleague, Tom Cotton, which Cotton explicitly said was designed to halt negotiations, or be the only presidential contender in the Senate to not sign it, and risk losing support in the fallout.

Despite the fact that Paul had maintained—and continues to maintain—that he favors negotiations, he compromised and opted for the first choice, contorting himself uncomfortably in his effort to explain his decision and irking some of the longtime libertarian supporters he inherited from his father in the process.

He has pursued a similar strategy with the deal.

The Atlantic's David Frum made what on its face felt like a reckless prediction on Tuesday: "The Rand Paul Candidacy for the Republican Nomination Is Over." Frum's case was that throughout the course of his short Senate career, Paul has been able to carve out space for himself within his party by mostly focusing on the issue of domestic surveillance, which comfortably placed him in opposition to the hawks he bemoans and to President Obama. The deal presented for Paul a no-win: Were he to support the deal, however, Frum argued, he would "find himself isolated with the old Ron Paul constituency," but were he to oppose it, he would vanish amid a sea of similar voices in the primary field.

The best explanation for Paul's new position may come from Paul himself.

In an interview with The Today Show's Savannah Guthrie in April, the same day two attack ads were released tying him to Obama on the issue, Paul said, "2007 was a long time ago and events do change over long periods of time. We're talking about a time when I wasn't running for office, when I was helping someone else run for office."

So when the facts change—be they the facts of the issue at hand or the facts of Paul's personal political objectives—Paul changes his mind.

CRUZ

Ted Cruz makes New York Times' list // Politico // Dylan Byers – July 15, 2015

Five days after accusing The New York Times of bias, secrecy and foul play, Ted Cruz is finally getting what he wanted: a highly coveted spot on the paper's bestseller list.

Cruz's memoir, "A Time For Truth," will appear at No. 7 on the Times' list for hardcover nonfiction, reflecting its second-week sales, a Times spokesperson confirmed on Wednesday. The Texas senator's book had not been included on the list for its first week, on the grounds that its sales had been driven by "strategic bulk purchases."

Times spokesperson Eileen Murphy said that the newspaper made no changes to its selection process, and so the fact that Cruz's book is being included now suggests a rise in individual purchases, spurred by his public battle with the paper.

"This week's NYT best seller list was arrived at using the same process as last week's - and the week before that," Murphy wrote. "That process involves a careful analysis of data, and is not influenced in any way by the content of a book, or by pressure from publishers or book sellers."

Both HarperCollins, the book's publisher, and Amazon, the largest Internet retailer in the country, said last week that they had found "no evidence" that bulk purchases drove the book's sales numbers. On Friday, Cruz campaign spokesperson Rick Tyler accused the Times of "obvious partisan bias," and called on the paper to reveal its methodology or else publicly apologize.

The Times has resolutely stood by its claim, and has refused to reveal its methodology on the grounds that doing so might threaten the integrity of the process.

"Our approach serves Times readers by authenticating broadly popular books through the confidential reporting of a wide range of retailers," Murphy said Wednesday. "In order to avoid compromising that process, we do not disclose who reports sales to us."

Ted Cruz challenges Fox debate standards // Politico // Alex Isenstadt – July 15, 2015

Ted Cruz's campaign is leading a charge to pressure Fox News into raising their standards for the national polls that will decide who gets into the first Republican presidential debate.

In a memo sent to fellow GOP campaigns on Wednesday, Chris Wilson, who serves as director of research and analytics for the Cruz campaign, called Fox News's standards for deciding which national polls are used in its debate entry process "unclear." Wilson asks the other campaigns to "consider joining with us" in encouraging the network to impose additional polling standards. As it stands, Fox News is allowing the top 10 contenders, based on an average of the five most recent national polls, into the Aug. 6 debate.

"I'm sure you are aware, the standards set by Fox News for the first GOP Presidential debate are unclear and, it would appear, undefined," Wilson wrote in the memo.

Among the Cruz campaign's suggestions: That polls included in the national average must have at least 1,000 interviews with primary voters and must be done by telephone (not online). However, no telephone poll conducted this year has surveyed that many GOP primary voters.

Wilson also suggests that, for a survey to be included in the national average, it must not be conducted on a Friday or Saturday — when fewer voters are home to answer the phone.

By almost any averaging of recent national polls, Cruz would make the cut for the top 10. But his position in the top 10 is less certain than many other candidates.

"I'm very open to other criteria, so please let me know your thoughts," Wilson writes. "Once I hear back from you, and the other campaigns, we will put together a joint letter to sent to Fox."

Wilson did not immediately respond to a request for comment, neither did a spokesperson for Fox News.

Ted Cruz owes donor's firm $556k // Politico // Kenneth P. Vogel and Katie Glueck –July 15, 2015

Texas Sen. Ted Cruz's presidential campaign burned through more than half of $10 million he raised in the past few months and also ran up nearly $620,000 in debt — mostly to a data firm owned by a top donor — according to a report filed Wednesday with the Federal Election Commission.

Cruz's campaign reported owing $556,000 to Cambridge Analytica for "survey research" and "donor modeling." The firm is owned by the family of New York hedge fund magnate Bob Mercer, POLITICO revealed last week. Mercer and his family are among the biggest donors to a network of super PACs supporting Cruz that combined to raise $37 million. At least one of the super PACs is in discussions with Cambridge Analytica about retaining the firm's services.

The firm, which is relatively new to the competitive world of U.S. political data, provides nontraditional "psychographic" voter analyses to try to win them over with narrowly targeted micro-messages. The Cruz campaign's FEC report reveals now payments to the firm, just debt.

The debt total would seem to indicate that Cruz is relying heavily on the firm for critical data work, but it also is an unusually large debt for a campaign to owe a single vendor early in the cycle.

Cruz, a favorite of conservatives, announced his run for president a week before the first-quarter filing deadline. He had raised $4.3 million before that deadline. In the second-quarter fundraising period covered by Wednesday's report, he raised another $10 million but also spent $5.5 million, leaving him with $8.6 million in the bank.

Around 40 percent of his intake came from individual contributors donating $200 or less.

A cluster of four super PACs supporting Cruz also claims a fundraising haul of nearly $38 million. They are due to file by the end of the month, but the overall pro-Cruz total estimate puts the candidate in the top tier of presidential fundraisers, even though his poll numbers place him in the middle of the pack.

Below is a breakout of the campaign's finances as of the end of June:

Ted Cruz threatens highway bill filibuster to block Ex-Im renewal // Politico // Seung Min Kim – July 15, 2015

Sen. Ted Cruz on Wednesday raised the prospect of blocking a must-pass highway bill because the measure could be used to revive the Export-Import Bank, which expired at the end of June.

Cruz, who is running for the Republican presidential nomination in 2016, vigorously opposes the bank, which helps some U.S. exporters sell their goods overseas. At a news conference with other conservative GOP lawmakers and outside groups Wednesday, Cruz vowed to use “any and all procedural tools” to stop an Ex-Im reauthorization, particularly if it were attached to the highway bill later this month.

“I am willing to use any and all procedural tools to stop this corporate welfare, this corruption from being propagated,” Cruz (R-Texas) said Wednesday when asked whether he would be willing to filibuster the highway bill.

Sen. Mike Lee (R-Utah) agreed, adding: “I think those of us who oppose it will continue to use any and all procedural tools at our disposal in order to oppose it.”

The controversial export agency’s charter expired, making it impossible for the agency to underwrite new loans. But supporters of the Ex-Im Bank — mostly Democrats and business-aligned Republicans — have pushed to reauthorize it by attaching it to the highway bill that must pass Congress before the end of July.

A test vote last month showed that 65 senators — a clear filibuster-proof majority — favor reauthorizing the export agency. But opposition to the bank runs deeper in the more conservative House.

Cruz also took a subtle dig at Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.), openly musing that the Republican majority has not scored “conservative victories” even with a GOP-dominated Capitol.

“It’s interesting. With a Republican majority, we haven’t had a lot of conservative victories. This is one,” Cruz said, referring to Ex-Im’s expiration. “We’re here today to praise Mitch McConnell and John Boehner. They have the opportunity to deliver on their campaign rhetoric, and I am hopeful that actions follow words and every person here will gladly celebrate strong Republican leadership if we, in fact, have strong Republican leadership.”

Ted Cruz Forsees Military Action Against Iran // Bloomberg // Kathy Kiely – July 15, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Ted Cruz thinks the proposed nuclear deal with Iran could force the next president to use military force and says he's prepared to make that decision.

"I think the odds are very high the next president is going to confront an Iran on the verge of having nuclear weapons," the Texas senator said in an interview that aired Wednesday on PBS' Charlie Rose.

Asked what he would do were he to find himself in that position, Cruz replied, "I would do whatever is necessary to prevent Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons."

While Cruz did not specify his military strategy, he elsewhere in the interview expressed a preference for bombs over boots on the ground. Discussing the Obama administration's tactics against the Islamic State, Cruz called for "overwhelming air power."

"Right now, we're engaged in what I call photo-op foreign policy," he said. "We drop a bomb here, a missile there but the rules of engagement are so strict, from ISIS' perspective, they're winning." He said he disagreed with his Senate colleague and presidential rival, Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, who has called for sending 10,000 U.S. troops to fight the Islamic State.

In the interview, Cruz alluded frequently to his new book, A Time for Truth, which, according to Politico, is going to be included on the New York Times bestseller list this week, after the senator accused the paper of deliberately excluding it.

He’s Ba-a-a-ack: Ted Cruz Hints He’ll Filibuster Ex-Im Bank // Bloomberg // Heidi Przybyla – July

15, 2015

Texas Senator Ted Cruz signaled today he may be about to return to his favorite battlefield -- the Senate floor -- to fight efforts to reauthorize the Export-Import Bank.

Ex-Im's charter expired June 30, but Majority Leader Mitch McConnell, a Kentucky Republican who opposes the reauthorization, has said an upcoming bill to extend highway funding past July 31 would be an "obvious" vehicle for supporters to try to revive it. Asked Wednesday if he plans to filibuster the legislation, Cruz told reporters he plans to use "any and all procedural tools" to block the it.

Cruz's use of Senate parliamentary procedure, including the filibuster, has turned the first-term Republican into a Tea Party sensation and bolstered his 2016 presidential bid. He portrays himself as a crusader against a "Washington cartel" of lobbyists, lawmakers and big business that, in the senator's view, works against the best interests of average Americans. The Ex-Im battle gives him another opportunity to sound those themes.

The Ex-Im fight has pitted two traditionally Republican constituencies against each other. The U.S. Chamber of Commerce has pushed hard to keep the bank, provides loans, loan guarantees and insurance to aid overseas sales by U.S. companies. Supporters argue that it supports American jobs by providing financing for American companies to sell goods abroad. Small-government groups like Club for Growth argue that it should go because it interferes with the free market by choosing which deals receive financial backing.

"There are a lot of campaign conservatives in the U.S. Congress," Cruz said during the press conference. "If John Boehner and Mitch McConnell stand up and say 'we simply will not allow the Export-Import Bank to be reauthorized, that will ensure this corporate welfare goes away.'"

He also accused Republican leaders of making a "corrupt deal" in agreeing to allow a vote to reauthorize Ex-Im in exchange for Democratic support of trade legislation last month. "If there's no corrupt deal, then congressional leadership should stand with Senate conservatives and House conservatives," and block attempts to reauthorize the bank, Cruz said.

T ed Cruz relish silver m edal standing on fundraising at confab // CNN // T heodore Schleifer – July 15, 2015

Presidential campaigns are releasing their fundraising numbers on Wednesday, but Ted Cruz's top moneymen already had their moment to be giddy.

A week after announcing they had raised $52 million, the Texas senator met in Colorado Springs with about 45 of his top bundlers this weekend at The Broadmoor, a luxury resort at the foot of the Cheyenne Mountains, to celebrate the haul.

Thanks to a mix of grassroots donors and a few billionaires, Cruz's supporters boast a position few anticipated: Second place in the crowded and competitive GOP fundraising race.

In between expeditions of fly fishing and horseback riding (with Cruz himself taking part), the donors said they came to realize that the vaunted fundraising operations of their opponents aren't the juggernauts they once believed.

"We dominated everybody in the field when it comes to hard money, and everybody when it comes to soft money except Jeb, and I think that surprised people," said Houston investor and summit attendee Christopher Zook, contrasting the so-called hard money raised by official campaigns with the soft money raised by outside groups that support the campaigns.

Some Cruz loyalists acknowledge they need to keep the celebratory confidence from creeping into arrogance when sizing up others' fundraising potential. Fundraisers got a pep talk in Colorado, but one they hardly need as they hold a silver medal in a crowded field. The dollars have not translated as of yet to polling: Cruz still trails the top tier of candidates -- he got 3 percent of support from Republicans in the most recent CNN/ORC poll.

Still even observers who weren't fans of Cruz admitted they were impressed. Small online donations powered that fundraising operation, and are powering this one too: 175,000 donors gave an average contribution of $81. Carla Eudy, a top fundraiser for John McCain who is no fan of Cruz, cautioned that his backers shouldn't get ahead of themselves despite their success.

"It is better than what you consider 'a top-tier candidate' did," said Eudy, who knew Cruz would raise the small donations but thought he'd only bring in $15 to $20 million to his super PAC. "Look, you got to give hats off to the guy," adding, "which I hate to admit."

Cruz allies raised $14 million for the campaign and an additional $38 million for its super PACs, which can collect checks of unlimited amounts but cannot coordinate spending with the campaign. As the first presidential campaign to launch and open an official bank account, Cruz raised more money for his campaign than any Republican rival. And while outside groups supporting Cruz raised far less than the groups backing Jeb Bush -- which raised $103 million -- they edged out those supporting any other Republican.

So at briefings, receptions and dinners back in Colorado Springs, senior Cruz aides -- including his wife Heidi Cruz, a Goldman Sachs executive who is playing a leading role in the finance operation -- projected confidence to their donors that the race remained theirs to win.

They introduced a new adviser, Ronald Reagan speechwriter Anthony Dolan, who is expected to help the oratorically gifted Cruz. And they advised that they would have the money to go the distance -- there's no need to be the "last-man standing" and merely exist as other Republicans make errors, said one person familiar with the campaign's message this weekend.

That's especially so given other Republicans' fundraising, which both the Cruz campaign and its invited donors, who pledged to raise $100,000, see as underwhelming and not up to par. The outside groups backing Scott Walker, who announced his campaign on Monday, are expected to unveil a $20 million haul. And Marco Rubio and his allied groups raised a total of $44 million -- a sum that Cruz associates said they expected to surpass their own.

As for Bush -- who has more cash than any other Republican aspirant -- top Cruz fundraisers charge that his official campaign is too poor relative to the super PAC that supports it, which has nearly ten times as much money. And they drew comparisons between Bush and David Dewhurst, the Texas millionaire who Cruz dethroned in a come-from-behind victory in the Texas senate election in 2012.

Cruz donors heard this weekend from leaders like finance director Willie Langston and campaign manager Jeff Roe about polling, crowd sizes and the path to victory. But some Cruz donors expressed the most excitement about the data vendor employed by the Houston-based campaign, Cambridge Analytica, that uses "psychographic" profiling to predict potential supporters. The targeting, a brainchild of Cruz analytics director Chris Wilson, sifts voters into six personality types and tailors campaign messaging based on that profile.

The campaign has modeled each state's electorate through March 15, having identified three times as many potential Cruz supporters in Iowa than the total number of expected voters in the state's Republican caucus, according to spokesman Rick Tyler.

Donors ate it up.

"Everyone's got their own little agendas," said Lawrence Gelman, a Cruz donor from Texas who said he was amazed at the targeting's "sophistication" in how it could put its finger on the pulse of each voter's thinking. "I guess they tried to find it,"

Contributors like Gelman weren't given fundraising targets for the next quarter -- just to raise more and more.

The best way for donors to help the campaign might be to give to the super PAC run by longtime Cruz friends. But because the group is not allowed to coordinate with the campaign, no mention was made of the outsized power except merely to nod to it in appreciation.

Ted Cruz: 'If you think Washington is going great...then I ain't your guy' // MSNBC // Emma Margolin – July 15, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Ted Cruz fully assumed the role of Washington outsider, aspiring change agent, and — potentially — anti-establishment victor on Wednesday in New York City. While speaking to a group of hedge funders, the Texas senator once again aligned himself with fellow White House hopeful Donald Trump and went after big business just as much as big government.

"If you think Washington is going great, that we just need someone to fiddle around the edges, then I ain't your guy," Cruz told the crowd at the CNBC Delivering Alpha conference in New York.

Speaking onstage with CNBC's John Harwood, the 44-year-old Cruz again defended Trump's controversial remarks on illegal immigration — though he conceded when pressed that the real estate mogul "speaks in a way that I wouldn't speak." Over the past few weeks, Trump has been under fire for describing undocumented immigrants as "rapists" during his presidential announcement and for saying that "when Mexico sends its people," they bring drugs and crime.

Nearly every member of the GOP presidential pack has criticized those remarks — including Florida Sen. Marco Rubio, former Texas Gov. Rick Perry, and former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush. But Cruz has repeatedly stood by Trump, telling reporters as recently as Wednesday morning that he's a "big fan" of "The Donald."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Cruz reportedly met privately with Trump on Wednesday, though the reasons for that sit-down remain a mystery.

“I think it’s important to highlight illegal immigration,” said Cruz, whose father came to the U.S. legally from Cuba as a teenager. He added during Wednesday’s conference: “I don’t think it’s appropriate to be impugning the integrity of other candidates.” Cruz did, however, accuse those now “smacking” Trump of “vigorously, vocally” advocating amnesty for many years — only to just switch their positions when politically convenient.

“In politics, sometimes verb tenses matter,” Cruz said. “In every election, people become campaign conservatives.”

In addition to potentially alienating some in his own party, Cruz also seemed unconcerned with alienating big business, long viewed as a reliable source of campaign cash for Republicans. The fast-changing landscape on social issues has started to change that relationship, however, and Cruz didn’t seem eager to want to stop it.

“I think the Democrats are the party of the rich, and big government, and cronyism,” Cruz said. Earlier in the day, he praised Congress’ decision to allow the charter for the Export-Import Bank to expire, criticizing the 81-year-old institution — which acted as the U.S. government’s export credit agency — for disproportionately serving big business.

Cruz also stood by what many in his own party have characterized as an extreme response to the Supreme Court’s recent decision that made marriage equality the law of the land. Shortly after that ruling came down, he vowed to propose a constitutional amendment that would subject justices to periodic retention elections — a clear violation of Article III in the Constitution, and one that stands virtually no chance of passing.

Yet Cruz, who once clerked for former Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, did not back down from that position Wednesday.

“Under the Constitution, from the beginning of our nation, marriage has been a question for the states,” he said. “I don’t think it makes sense to have every major policy issue decided by five unelected judges.”

Several Hours Of Ted Cruz B-Roll And Interviews With Family Members Just Went Online // BuzzFeed // Megan Apper and Andrew Kaczynski – July 15, 2015

Several hours of b-roll was uploaded to YouTube Wednesday morning featuring long interviews with families members of Republican presidential candidate Sen. Ted Cruz.

The hours of interviews uploaded by “Ted Cruz for Senate” feature interviews with Cruz’s wife Heidi, his mother, his father, his aunt, and several nieces and nephews.

The interviews feature some interesting tidbits about Cruz: His family dressed him as a bald eagle one 4th of July. Cruz’s cousin made him play with Barbie dolls. His dad says Cruz was once bit by an octopus at the beach.

It is unclear why the videos were uploaded.

Campaigns legally can’t coordinate with PACs but often avoid the law by posting hours of b-roll of interviews and soundless footage of the candidate doing things like walking around and meeting with voters to get around the law.

CHRISTIE

Christie picks up 2016 endorsement from Maryland governor // AP // Brian Witte – July 15, 2015

Chris Christie has picked up the presidential endorsement of Maryland's governor.

Republican Larry Hogan says Christie tells it like it is and most politicians don't — and that the New Jersey governor can work with Democrats and independents.

Hogan made the endorsement Wednesday during a stop at a diner near the Maryland Capitol in Annapolis.

It's a bit of political payback.

Christie was a strong supporter of Hogan's underdog campaign for governor last year in a state where Democrats outnumber Republicans 2-1.

Christie led the Republican Governors Association and made several campaign appearances in Maryland for Hogan. The association spent $1.2 million in the final weeks of the campaign on Hogan's behalf.

Christie has been wearing a "Hogan Strong" bracelet since the Maryland governor's cancer diagnosis was announced last month.

Chris Christie Says Obama 'Lied' to American About Iran Deal // Bloomberg // Elise Young – July 15, 2015

New Jersey Governor Chris Christie said President Barack Obama "lied" to Americans about a deal among U.S. allies to ease economic sanctions on Iran in exchange for regulation of the nation's raw materials for nuclear weapons.

"He lied to the American people," Christie, the 52-year-old Republican presidential candidate, said in a Wednesday interview on the Hugh Hewitt radio show. "He put his entire support of this agreement, as you heard yesterday, on verification. We're not trusting anybody, and he said that we have 24/7 access to Iran's nuclear facilities, and that we could inspect anytime, anywhere. Every reading of this agreement shows that all Iran has to do to stop inspections is ask.

Christie also said Obama should have predicated any agreement on the release of four Americans held against their will in Iran. "He knows this is a bad deal," Christie said of the president.

Obama on Wednesday delivered an exhaustive news conference in which he took on critics of the deal, and argued that without the accord, the Islamic Republic "could move closer to a nuclear bomb."

Christie told radio host Hugh Hewitt that Iran could back out with a request to end inspections of nuclear facilities. An arbitration panel then could take as long as 24 days to restore the reviews—time enough, Christie said, for Iran to spirit evidence of weapons manufacturing around the country.

The U.S. Congress has 60 days to review the agreement, which also involves China, Russia, the U.K., France and Germany, Obama said at a news conference at the White House on Wednesday, a day after the deal was signed. Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu criticized the policy as a danger to the Jewish state, a key Middle East ally for the U.S.

"The protection of the state of Israel has to be a top priority of the president of the United States of America," Christie said. "What I would do as president is immediately meet with Prime Minister Netanyahu and try to repair this relationship that this president has so callously broken."

Christie, scheduled on Thursday to appear in Camden, New Jersey, for a national policy speech on criminal-justice reform, then will head to New Hampshire for two days of campaign stops.

Gov. Chris Christie bags 2016 endorsement from Gov. Larry Hogan // MSNBC // Aliyah Frumin – July 15, 2015

New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie picked up an endorsement for president from fellow blue state, Republican Gov. Larry Hogan of Maryland on Wednesday.

Outside the Double-T Diner in Annapolis, Hogan promised to "go anywhere and do anything" to help Christie –who has fallen towards the back of the emerging GOP field – win the party's nomination. "My primary mission today is to officially and enthusiastically endorse Gov. Christie for president. I happen to believe he's exactly the leader we need. I think he should be the next president and I think he will be the next president," he said.

The endorsement makes sense, as Christie, chairman of the Republican Governors Association last year, was a big supporter of Hogan during his underdog bid for governor in 2014. Christie made four campaign stops in Maryland before the general election and the RGA shelled out $1.2 million on Hogan's behalf during the final month of the race.

Christie has also shown support for Hogan—who was recently diagnosed with non-Hodgkin's lymphoma—since his win, sporting a "Hogan Strong" wristband on the campaign trail.

During the announcement, Hogan pointed to Christie's loyalty, noting when "nobody believed in our race he came here four different times." He also said Christie was the first to call him to offer advice and help when riots broke out in Baltimore over the spring and has offered him continued support as he battles cancer.

Speaking about his health, Hogan said "I feel great. I feel really good. They tell me it might not always be that way," noting he underwent his first round of chemotherapy and has six more rounds to go. "I'm fighting this with everything I got," he added.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

After the announcement, Christie took questions from reporters and skewered the Iran nuclear deal announced by Obama on Tuesday. The governor argued the announcement was "just another in a series of lies that he's told the American people." He took particular issue with the nuclear inspection part of the agreement.

"When [Obama] said yesterday that inspections will happen in Iran anytime anywhere, the agreement itself undercuts the president's position we want to inspect someplace in Iran, we have to give them notice, they could say no, it goes to an arbitration panel that they're a part of and they have 24 days to make a decision, well if they're playing around and cheating on this agreement and they have 24 days to clean up the evidence of the cheating. How's that anytime anywhere Mr. President?" asked Christie.

He also took aim at Democratic presidential front-runner Hillary Clinton who has backed the deal. "Well you know, Secretary Clinton, I've said all along she owns the foreign policy of this administration. And now she owns the second term foreign policy of this administration as well even though she's left to run for president," declared Christie.

Earlier this month, Christie also received an endorsement from Maine Gov. Paul Le Page. Christie on Wednesday called the governors' endorsement "incredibly important" because both LePage and Hogan are the leaders of political infrastructure of states and will be able to help raise money.

Separately, the super political action committee backing Christie's presidential bid announced this week that it raised $11 million since February, a haul the group says is more than double its initial goal—but one that's still significantly less than the candidate's GOP competition.

Christie has a busy week ahead. On Thursday morning, he'll go Camden, N.J. to deliver what's being billed by the campaign as a major policy speech on criminal justice reform. Later that evening, he'll be in New Hampshire, where he'll hold a town hall meeting in Franklin and another one in Milford on Friday.

PERRY

To help get Rick Perry into debates, super PAC advertises on conservative talk radio // WaPo // Philip Rucker – July 15, 2015

More than many other candidates, Rick Perry's presidential chances depend on his debate performances. The former Texas governor is determined to erase memories of his disastrous turns on the debate stage in the 2012 campaign and prove that he is a worldlier and better prepared candidate this time around.

Yet Perry is among eight or nine candidates who are on the bubble of qualifying for the first Republican primary debate, scheduled for Aug. 6 in Cleveland. So to boost his popularity and ensure he stays in the top 10 in national polls, Perry's sanctioned super PAC, Opportunity and Freedom PAC, has begun an aggressive, $1 million national advertising campaign on cable television, conservative talk radio and the Internet.

Over the next month, the super PAC will run ads promoting Perry during the nationally syndicated radio shows of Hugh Hewitt, Bill Bennett, Michael Medved, Mike Gallagher, Dennis Prager and other conservative commentators, according to Austin Barbour, the super PAC's senior adviser.

The super PAC currently is running a 60-second spot that highlights Perry's upbringing in rural Paint Creek and his leadership record and will soon switch it out for an ad focused on his work as governor to secure the border with Mexico, Barbour said. The ads with Salem Broadcasting are expected to reach 10 million listeners per week, Barbour said.

"That's a significant radio audience throughout the country, and obviously the vast, vast majority are conservative Republican voters, whether they're in Iowa or somewhere else in the country," Barbour said.

Barbour said the radio advertising was "the hidden gem" in the super PAC's advertising plan because of the built-in audience of loyal and politically active conservative listeners. Barbour would not disclose how much the super PAC is spending on radio ads other than to call it a "very deep and thorough buy."

Overall, Barbour put a $1 million price tag on the super PAC's national advertising push over the next month. The group also is running ads on Fox News Channel, the most-viewed cable network, which was first reported Tuesday by The New York Times.

In addition to the TV and radio buys, the super PAC has a series of micro-targeted digital videos and banner ads designed to reach Republican voters online. Barbour said that people who care about social conservative views will be met by an ad about Perry's faith and record on abortion and guns; those who care about veterans issues will see an ad about Perry's military career; and those who care about immigration will be targeted with an ad about his work to secure the border.

The ads were created by Vinny Minchillo, a Texas-based ad man who worked with Barbour on Mitt Romney's 2012 presidential campaign.

The super PAC's strategy is simple: Promote Perry with conservative voters who are most likely to respond favorably about Perry if pollsters call them for surveys.

Currently, Perry ranks far back in the field of 16 declared or likely Republican candidates. The Real Clear Politics average of national polls puts Perry tied for ninth place with New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie.

Fox News, which is hosting the first debate, will only allow the top 10 candidates to participate. As of today, Perry would qualify. But polling has been rather fluid and a number of factors would squeeze Perry out — such as if Ohio Gov. John Kasich makes a big splash when he announces his campaign next Tuesday. or if technology executive Carly Fiorina finds a creative way to boost her standing, or if Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (S.C.) harnesses the media attention he has received over the Iran nuclear deal to climb in the standings.

"It's obviously very important that Rick Perry participates in that first debate," Barbour said. "We have to do what we feel helps Governor Perry the most — and spending this money this way helps him the most."

Rick Perry's official haul: $1.1 million // Politico // Katie Glueck – July 15, 2015

Former Texas Gov. Rick Perry's presidential campaign on Wednesday announced that it had raised a little more than $1 million in the second fundraising quarter of the year.

Perry, who ran unsuccessfully for president in 2012, launched his second attempt at White House bid, a long-shot effort, in June. He spent about half of the money he took in this quarter, with much of that going to a firm that appears linked to Perry's campaign manager, Jeff Miller. The firm, Abstract Communications, LLC, doesn't have to further disclose its spending, and so could make strategic spending choices on campaign expenditures without the knowledge of other campaigns.

Below is a breakout of his campaign's finances for the second quarter of the year.

Total raised: $1,139,366.89

Total spent: $597,542.44

Total cash on hand: $883,913.12

Total debt: $0

The bulk of Perry's intake comes from donors who gave more than $200. Only about 8 percent of his individual donors would count as "small dollar" donors, contributing $200 or less.

Perry dismisses Trump on border policy // CNN // Theodore Schleifer – July 15, 2015

Former Texas Gov. Rick Perry said he was the only presidential candidate with the relevant experience to secure the border, casting his Republican rivals as talkers, but not doers.

"We know how to secure the border, and rhetoric's not going to do it," Perry, who is seeking the Republican nomination for the second time, told CNN's Wolf Blitzer on "The Situation Room."

Perry also said the plan submitted by Donald Trump -- also a 2016 Republican presidential candidate -- who is calling for a wall along the U.S.-Mexico border is impractical.

"A wall without personnel there means nothing," he said.

Perry has looked to parlay his executive experience from 14 years as governor to distinguish himself from his Republican rivals. As a border state governor, he's also highlighted his own record boosting the presence of patrolmen in the Rio Grande Valley.

In recent weeks, Perry has also emerged as one of the sharpest critics of Trump's comments about undocumented immigrants from Mexico. When asked if Trump was qualified to be president, Perry declined to answer, only saying that he himself is "the most qualified."

Trump was meeting in New York with Perry's fellow Texan, Sen. Ted Cruz, when speaking to Blitzer. Perry took a shot at his fellow presidential candidate when asked if he had any thoughts on the tete-a-tete.

"Everybody gets to pick who they hang out with, so I have no idea whats going on," Perry said.

Rick Perry: Obama Is 'A Very, Very Naïve Man' // HuffPo // Marina Fang – July 15, 2015

Republican presidential hopeful Rick Perry on Wednesday called President Barack Obama "very, very naive" for supporting the historic nuclear deal with Iran.

"What I saw out of this president today, and this is of great consternation to me, it's of great concern, I saw a very, very naive man who does not know how the world works, who cannot put the dots together, and stood in front of the American people and said, 'I really don't care if Congress likes this or not, I'm going to do it,'" Perry told Hugh Hewitt, the conservative radio host.

Perry, the former Texas governor, was commenting on Obama's press conference earlier Wednesday, in which the president vehemently defended the U.S. pact with Iran and five other world powers.

Perry compared Obama's defiance of an adversarial Congress with the president's earlier efforts to pass his signature health care law. Perry and many other Republicans have continually claimed that Obamacare symbolizes what they see as the president's executive overreach.

"It's a continuation of actually what we saw, Hugh, going all the way back to Obamacare, and forcing something through," Perry said.

As soon as the nuclear agreement was announced on Tuesday, Republican presidential candidates issued statements of condemnation, accusing the U.S. of ceding too much to Iran and creating the potential for more tensions in the Middle East. Perry told Hewitt that he feared the deal would strengthen rather than weaken Iran's nuclear capability.

"They are celebrating today in the streets of Tehran because of this agreement," Perry said. "They know that they just got a 'get out of jail free pass' from the president of the United States."

In Washington, congressional Republicans vowed to obstruct approval of the deal. On Wednesday, Obama implored them to read the details of the deal and put aside politics.

"I'm hearing a lot of talking points being repeated about this is a bad deal," Obama said to reporters. "What I haven't heard is, what is your preferred alternative?"

"My hope is that everyone in Congress also evaluates this agreement based on the facts -- not on politics, not on posturing, not on the fact that this is a deal I bring to Congress as opposed to a Republican president, not based on lobbying, but based on what's in the national interest of the United States of America."

GRAHAM

Lindsey Graham's official haul: $3.7 million // Politico // Katie Glueck – July 15, 2015

South Carolina Sen. Lindsey Graham's presidential campaign will report Wednesday night that it raised $3.7 million during the second quarter of the year, his first as a 2016 candidate.

Graham, who announced for president at the beginning of June, is a long-shot candidate, but he is generally respected within his own party as a prominent voice on national security, an issue that animates many of his donors.

Below is a breakout of Graham's presidential finances as of the end of June, according to his campaign:

Total raised: $3,709,552.93

Total spent: $1,126,733.82

Total cash on hand: $2,582,819.11

Total debt: $0

So Far, Little Reflection in His Fundraising of Rick Santorum's 2012 Success // WSJ // Reid J. Epstein – July 15, 2015

Four years ago, Rick Santorum ran a low-budget campaign for president because he was a little-known former senator trying to win the hearts of social conservatives in Iowa.

Winning 11 states in the 2012 primary season hasn't helped Mr. Santorum's fundraising this time around. The former Pennsylvania senator, who now lives in Virginia, raised $607,617 in the quarter ending June 30 – just $25,000 more than he raised in the second quarter of 2011.

Mr. Santorum's fundraising figure places him near the bottom of the 2016 Republican presidential contenders. Only Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal raised less, and he formally launched his campaign with a week left in the second quarter. Mr. Santorum began his campaign in late May.

Mr. Santorum's financial supporters include Kansas City Chiefs owner Lamar Hunt and Wyoming investment manager Foster Friess, who each gave the maximum $2,700 contribution for the primary season. Mr. Hunt gave an additional $2,700 for the general election, which Mr. Santorum cannot access unless he becomes the GOP's presidential nominee. Mr. Friess bankrolled a super PAC backing Mr. Santorum in 2012 and is supporting him again this year. Super PAC reports aren't due until the end of July.

The Santorum campaign also reported a $1,000 contribution from Mr. Santorum's mother, Catherine Santorum of St. Augustine, Fla. Mr. Santorum himself did not make a contribution or loan to the campaign.

Mr. Santorum's campaign reported $232,018 cash on hand.

Rick Santorum's official haul: $607,000 // Politico // Theodoric Meyer – July 15, 2015

Former Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum's presidential campaign reported on Wednesday that it had raised about $607,000 during the second quarter of this year. But Santorum had already burned through more than 60 percent of that haul, giving him only $232,000 in cash on hand as of June 30.

Santorum, a social conservative who won the Iowa caucuses in 2012, who is currently polling just outside the top 10 candidates, making it uncertain whether or not he will be on stage during the first GOP debate in Cleveland on Aug. 6.

He announced his candidacy May 27, giving his campaign a little more than a month to raise funds before the June 30 deadline. He pulled an average of about $17,360 per day. Below is a breakout of the campaign's finances as of the end of June:

Total raised: $607,617.07

Total spent: $375,598.81

Total cash on hand: $232,018.26

Total debt: $124,638.55

Rick Santorum Suggests Planned Parenthood Is Just As Racist As The Confederate Flag // HuffPo // Matt Ramos – July 15, 2015

Former Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) on Tuesday equated his fight against Planned Parenthood with recent efforts to remove Confederate symbols from public buildings.

"You want to go back and take down the Confederate flag? Let's take down Planned Parenthood," Santorum said in an interview with Simon Conway, an Iowa-based talk radio host.

The 2016 hopeful appeared on the "Simon Conway Show" to discuss his presidential campaign. The conversation changed tone when Conway voiced his disgust with a recently released sting video allegedly showing Dr. Deborah Nucatola, the senior medical director of Planned Parenthood, discussing the sale of fetal abortion tissue. The mention of the video led Santorum to go off on a tangent about Planned Parenthood's founder Margaret Sanger, whom conservatives often portray as a racist.

"If you want to scrub all racism from America," Santorum said, "let's start with Planned Parenthood because it was started by a racist named Margaret Sanger, who was a eugenist, who was someone that believed in the separation of the races, someone that started Planned Parenthood for the purpose of culling out the undesirables, including blacks in America."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

While it's true that Sanger wrote about eugenics, the claim that she "started Planned Parenthood for the purpose of culling out the undesirables" has been proven largely false. An examination of her papers indicates she used the word "race" to refer to the human race more generally. Sanger did not suggest that certain races were inferior; in fact, her work earned the support of civil rights activists from multiple eras, including W.E.B. Du Bois and Martin Luther King Jr.

Santorum railed against Planned Parenthood in his interview on Tuesday, echoing the widely debunked claims from the video.

"Planned Parenthood has continued to do disgusting things, from killing little children in the womb, to now selling their body parts and harvesting them," he said.

The video that went viral on Tuesday is an edited version of footage that was recorded almost a year ago. The full version makes it clear that the director was discussing the reimbursement cost for tissue donation. After the edited video was released, Eric Ferrero, vice president of communications at Planned Parenthood, was quick to point out that tissue donation is done under the highest ethical and legal standards and that donors do not profit.

That didn't stop Santorum from calling for government action against Planned Parenthood.

"If local prosecutors are not going to do anything about it, then clearly the state legislature and the Congress can try to hold hearings and force public pressure about the case," he said Wednesday.

Santorum's wish may now become a reality, as House Speaker John Boehner (R-Ohio) announced Wednesday that Congress will look into investigating Planned Parenthood.

While Santorum was quick to bring up federal action with regard to Planned Parenthood, he's been cautious about taking an equivalent stance on the Confederate flag issue. Last month, he told ABC's Martha Raddatz that the decision about removing the flag should be left to individual states.

"I don't think the federal government or federal candidates should be making decisions on everything and opining on everything," he said.

As a staunch social conservative, Santorum frequently attacks pro-choice organizations, and has specifically targeted Planned Parenthood. In 2012, the Sunlight Foundation found that Santorum said the word "abortion" more than any other senator between 1996 and 2007.

HUCKABEE

Mike Huckabee's official haul: $2 million // Politico // Jonathan Topaz – July 15, 2015

Mike Huckabee's presidential campaign reported on Wednesday that it had raised about $2 million during the second quarter.

But the 2008 Iowa caucus winner had already spent more than $1.1 million of that total in the quarter, leaving him with less than $900,000 on hand as he tries to ensure his spot in the first presidential debate in Cleveland on Aug. 6.

The former Arkansas governor also owes more than $11,000 in debts.

Huckabee received just over $580,000 in contributions of less than $200 or less — about 29 percent of his total haul. He announced his candidacy on May 5.

Earlier this week, a senior Huckabee adviser said super PACs supporting the former governor raised $6 million so far, giving him an $8 million total that puts him well behind many of the top Republicans and behind some long-shot candidates such as Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal.

Total raised: $2,004,360.63

Total spent: $1,118,991.72

Total cash on hand: $885,471.01

Mike Huckabee Calls Children Of Gay Parents "Little Guinea Pigs" In His 2011 Book // BuzzFeed // Andrew Kaczynski – July 15, 2015

Republican presidential candidate and former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee called the children of gay parents "little guinea pigs" in his 2011 book, A Simple Government.

Huckabee used the phrase in his chapter on gay parents titled, "Gay Parenthood: A Social Experiment."

"Still, I believe that we're in denial about potential problems as we see more and more homosexual couples raising families," writes Huckabee.

"Essentially, these are experiments to see how well children will fare in such same-sex households. It will be years before we know whether or not our little guinea pigs turn out to be good at marriage and parenthood."

Here's the full section:

I have often been criticized for my outspoken views on gay marriage and homosexuality, so let me be clear. I have no doubt at all that homosexual men and women love their children deeply. Just as deeply as heterosexuals love theirs. But love alone cannot always provide what children need. If that sounds harsh, bear with me for a moment. My main concern here is that the children, most of whom are heterosexual, will not, and really cannot, get critical early-life lessons in how a heterosexual family functions successfully. In general, men and women bring different outlooks and temperaments to the task of parenting. Those male/female dynamics that make themselves evident in parenting—including even the conflicts and inconsistencies that are likely to arise—teach a child about how men and women relate to each other. In the home with two gay parents, where is that learning going to come from? It's already challenging enough to grow up, even when the parents are more conventional role models. Of course, I'm certainly not saying that all heterosexual parents provide, or are even able to provide, a good example to their children. I know that very well from years of conversations in my pastoral study, if not from just walking through a mall. Still, I believe that we're in denial about potential problems as we see more and more homosexual couples raising families. Essentially, these are experiments to see how well children will fare in such same-sex households. It will be years before we know whether or not our little guinea pigs turn out to be good at marriage and parenthood.

CARSON

Ben Carson's official haul: $8.5 million // Politico // Jonathan Topaz – July 15, 2015

Ben Carson's presidential campaign reported on Wednesday that it had raised about $8.5 million during the second quarter, bringing his grand total since he started exploring a run to just over $10.6 million.

He did it largely with the backing of small-dollar contributors.

The retired neurosurgeon — who launched an exploratory committee in March and announced his candidacy in early May — raised nearly $5.7 million from donors contributing $200 or less, which amounts to 67 percent of his quarterly haul.

That figure is significantly higher than the other Republicans that have filed their Federal Election Commission reports so far. Liberal insurgent Bernie Sanders, who has focused almost exclusively on small-dollar donations and grassroots organizing, raised 76 percent of his total dollars from donations of $200 or less.

Still, Carson's campaign had spent more than $5.4 million this quarter — roughly tied with Sen. Ted Cruz for the largest amount of any reported candidate to date and more than $2 million more than former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, who outraised Carson.

The filing reveals that Carson has spent a large amount on fundraising expenses and less crucial ones — large salaries for the staffers on his payroll and, for example, more than $60,000 to private-jet company Starbase Jets for travel and more than $60,000 for musical entertainment.

He has more than $4.7 million on hand and still has not repaid a $25,000 loan he made to his campaign.

The strong total is another sign that Carson — who has never held elected office and whose campaign has gone through some early turmoil — is resonating with grassroots voters. He currently sits fifth in national polling according to the Real Clear Politics average — ahead of Rand Paul and Mike Huckabee — and does well at conservative gatherings. In May, he won the Southern Republican Leadership Conference straw poll.

And he has outperformed other conservatives such as Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal and the past two Iowa caucus winners, former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee and former Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum, with his fundraising totals.

Below is a breakout of the campaign's finances as of the end of June:

Why Aren't More Women's Groups Fighting to Get Carly Fiorina Into the GOP Debate? // Bloomberg // Emily Greenhouse – July 16, 2015
Yes, the presidential election is more than a year out, but how quickly now do we approach the first winnowing. On Aug. 6, 10 Republican candidates will take the stage in Cleveland for the first primary debate of the 2016 election cycle. Fox News, which is hosting the debate with Facebook, says it will determine which 10 candidates will participate based on an average of five as-yet-unspecified national polls.

There is a top tier of candidates we can safely say will be there: former Florida Governor Jeb Bush, for instance, and Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker. But below the handful of front-runners, as Bloomberg's Steven Yaccino wrote last week, many microphones are up for grabs. Single percentage points may decide the fates of contenders such as New Jersey Governor Chris Christie, Louisiana Governor Bobby Jindal, former New York Governor George Pataki, and former Hewlett-Packard CEO Carly Fiorina.

Fiorina is the only woman in the jam-packed GOP presidential field. She has worked at every step of the process to situate herself in direct opposition to Hillary Clinton, the presumptive Democratic nominee and the woman treated practically like a presidential incumbent. Fiorina has found that she can talk to (and about) Clinton as no other Republican can. And yet she may not pass the threshold to get onto the debate stage—which would make the event "all men in dark suits," said Debbie Walsh, director of the Center for American Women and Politics at Rutgers University. Imperfect optics, for a party trying to show how inclusive it is.

"What purpose does a quota serve in a general election?"

Ann Stone
Yet little strategizing seems to be taking place that would help ensure a woman's place under the debate-stage lights: a gender-blind approach or an aperture in Republican strategy, depending on where you're standing.

"Everybody's taking a very hands-off approach," said Ann Stone, a longtime GOP political operative and founder of Republicans for Choice, a pro-abortion rights political action committee.

"The Republican Party prides itself on not siding with people for their gender, their race, etcetera—not siloing people." Stone said. "Anything that smacks of quotas, no matter how strongly people feel, we want people to be on the stage for their own merit."

"What purpose does a quota serve in a general election?" she said. "They need to be able to generate their own support."

Party infrastructure

On the Democratic side, women's groups have become a large and increasingly powerful voice. EMILY's List, a political group committed to electing female Democrats who support abortion rights, has five times as many members today (3 million) as it did in 2008 and twice as many donors, according to the New York Times.

The Republican landscape is somewhat more scattered. Terri Hauser, political director of the National Federation of Republican Women—a group that was founded in 1938 and boasts a headshot of Fiorina on its homepage—declined to comment, as did spokespeople for Iowa Senator Joni Ernst, Iowa's first female Senate or House member, and Representative Mimi Walters, the sole female Republican member of Congress in California, the state where Fiorina ran for Senate in 2010. Maggie's List, a political action committee that works to elect fiscally conservative women to Congress, did not respond to e-mails.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“One of the reasons that there aren't more elected women on the Republican side is that there hasn't been a strong infrastructure pushing Republican women forward,” Walsh said. “That infrastructure exists on the Democratic side and that has made a difference.”

EMILY's List press secretary Rachel Thomas sees a deeper problem. “The Republican Party can try to appeal to women voters all they want,” she said, “but as long as they prioritize policies that hurt women and families—such as restricting women’s access to health care, refusing to support raising the minimum wage, and failing to advocate for stronger equal pay laws—they will continue to have this problem.”

Kay Bailey Hutchinson, a former Republican senator from Texas, emphasized her party's commitment to women politicians, even as she acknowledged it takes a different tack than the Democrats.

Fiorina’s base “is the same as the Republican base,” Hutchinson said. “I think that our women candidates have been very supported by the party. Recruitment of candidates has been very focused on getting women. And when there are strong women the party apparatus is very supportive. That’s the way we have worked, and that’s how we have increased our numbers. And we have been very supportive of new women that have emerged and encourage them to run.”

She added, “I’d say we do it in a different way from EMILY’s List.”

Fiorina's optimism

Campaign spokeswoman Anna Epstein elided the possibility that Fiorina might not make it to the top 10.

“Carly is confident she'll make the cut for the first debate in August,” Epstein said by e-mail. “She is continuing to work hard to meet this goal and introduce herself to voters, whether it's through meeting with Americans across the country or taking numerous questions from the media.” Epstein did not respond to questions about advocacy from other groups.

Katie Hughes, a spokeswoman for pro-Fiorina super-PAC CARLY for America, spoke energetically of her group's work to gain endorsements and help elect Fiorina. But she would not specify gender as a superlative reason for considering, or boosting, Fiorina. “Yes, she is a female so that does differentiate her,” Hughes said, “but she is a Washington outsider, she’s a cancer survivor who lost a child—she has a wide range of experiences in her life to draw from that differentiate her in the field.”

'Let Carly debate'

Mallory Quigley, the communications director for Susan B. Anthony List, a group that works to elect anti-abortion women, pointed to a recent op-ed by Marjorie Dannenfelser, the group’s president, and Frank Cannon, the head of the American Principles Project, in which they called limiting the number of participating candidates “undoubtedly a mistake.” They wrote, “It’s true that the large number of candidates presents some challenges, but voters are ill served by debates that include, for example, a national celebrity such as Donald Trump but exclude Carly Fiorina or Lindsey Graham or Rick Santorum.” Nothing further.

Only one group I encountered seemed to be working actively to promote Fiorina as a woman: Smart Girl Politics, which was founded in 2008 by Teri Christoph and Staci Mott, “two stay-at-home moms turned activists” who, according to their website, were “disgusted by the poor treatment of Sarah Palin and other conservative women in the public arena.”

Smart Girl Politics launched a petition called “Tell Fox News: Let Carly Debate” that found fault with the eligibility criteria. It reads:

Since poll numbers are notoriously flawed—just ask President Mitt Romney—this is an imprecise way to measure a candidate’s performance on the campaign trail.

Carly Fiorina has been impressing audiences (and the media!) on the campaign trail with her forthright manner and passionate approach to campaigning. She is hitting out—and outsmarting—presumptive Democrat nominee Hillary Clinton in a truly impressive manner. She is in a unique position to set the narrative as we head into primary season … and beyond.

Carly Fiorina’s voice needs to be heard.

Were the debate to be held today, Carly might not be allowed to participate. And because the GOP field is so crowded, and getting more crowded every day it seems, good candidates like Carly might not have a spot on the debate stage.

Christoph said she put forward this position chiefly because Fiorina, “being the only Republican female in the race, would add a diversity of thought and experience to the debate stage."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"We're not advocating for her merely because she's a woman," she said, then added, "Let's face it, as a woman she can talk to certain issues—and certain candidates—in a way that a man simply cannot."

The petition, which they hope to personally deliver to Fox News, has a couple hundred signatures to date, Christoph said. That's not many, and it's no match for money Fiorina or her supporters could use to buy television ads that might nudge her national poll numbers upward.

Stone acknowledged a tension between her desire to have a female candidate and her party's hesitance to treat women in politics as special, for fear of behavior that might resemble affirmative action. "The male leadership in the party isn't sexist," she stressed. She offered an analogy by way of illustration. "They're so gender-blind they're like the nerds at the party standing in the corner with pocket calculator, they don't know how to ask the girls how to dance. That's how the men in the party are, they don't know how to engage. That's why they try to bring women in the party to try to reach out to women."

(Relative to these "kind of clueless" Republicans, Stone compared Democratic men to "the cool guys who can talk women into anything, if you catch my drift.")

For its part, the Republican National Committee, which sanctioned the debate calendar, says it supports the thresholds set by Fox and CNN, which will hold the second debate on Sept. 16 and similarly use polling to help narrow the stage to 10 candidates. (Both networks will host forums for lower-polling contenders as well.)

"While by law the networks set the criteria, we are very proud that both CNN and FOX will be holding the most inclusive debates in the history of either party," RNC spokeswoman Allison Moore said.

Carly Fiorina's official haul: $1.7 million // Politico // Hadas Gold – July 15, 2015

Carly Fiorina's campaign raised $1.7 million in the second fundraising quarter of the year.

Fiorina, the former Hewlett-Packard executive and the only woman currently in the Republican primary, reported that her campaign spent just over $714,000, and has just over $990,000 cash on hand.

Around 43 percent of Fiorina's contributions, $728,423, came from small donations of $200 or less.

Robert Mercer, the New York hedge fund manager and his wife Diana, both donated to Fiorina's campaign. Mercer also provided the lion's share of the $37 million raised by the super PACs supporting Sen. Ted Cruz's campaign.

Below is a breakout of Fiorina's campaign's finances for the second quarter of the year:

JINDAL

Bobby Jindal, a Late Entry, Reports Campaign-Finance Fillings // NYT // Maggie Haberman – July 15, 2015

Bobby Jindal, the Louisiana governor who is running for president, raised about $579,000 in the week since he entered the race, he reported in campaign-finance filings on Wednesday.

The amount is smaller than many other Republican candidates in the primary field. But it comprises only a week from June 24 through June 30, the last seven days of the filing quarter. Mr. Jindal was one of the last entrants to the race.

Struggling to overcome low polling, Mr. Jindal nonetheless is being bolstered by outside groups, including a "super PAC" and a nonprofit organization, which are reported to have raised about $8 million in the last six months.

Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal, a Republican presidential candidate, has raised about $579,000 for his campaign, while his outside allies say they've collected $8.7 million more to help spread his message.

Jindal announced his candidacy June 24 and raised most of his campaign money in about a week. Documents filed with the Federal Election Commission show he is drawing most of his contributions from a base of supporters in Louisiana and spent about $65,000 by the end of June.

Like each of the 17 expected GOP presidential contenders, Jindal also benefits from outside allies.

There's a super PAC, a nonprofit policy shop and a third fundraising group — each of which can accept checks of any size from donors. That trio raised a collective $8.7 million, said Brad Todd, a senior strategist to the super PAC, Believe Again. Almost half of the total can't be confirmed because it went to America Next, a nonprofit that keeps its donors secret and doesn't have to disclose any fundraising information to federal regulators until next year.

Most presidential candidates must file their initial fundraising reports with the FEC by midnight Wednesday.

Bobby Jindal's official haul: $579,000 // Politico // Jonathan Topaz – July 15, 2015

Louisiana. Gov Bobby Jindal's campaign reported on Wednesday that it had raised just under $579,000 during the second quarter of this year. Jindal, a long-shot candidate currently polling outside the top ten candidates in the field, announced his candidacy June 24, meaning that his campaign launched seven days before the June 30 deadline. Below is a breakout of the campaign's finances as of the end of June.

Total raised: $578,759.51

Total spent: $65,043.87

Total cash on hand: $ 513,714.64

Total debt: $0

Jindal's total fell short of what several GOP candidates — including Rand Paul, Marco Rubio and Ted Cruz — raised in their first 24 hours.

Just over 10 percent of Jindal's contributions were for $200 or less. Notable donors include CenturyLink CEO Glen Post and Louisiana state Rep. Gordon Dove, who both gave the maximum contribution of $2,700.

TRUMP

Donald Trump Claims His Wealth Exceeds 'TEN BILLION DOLLARS' // NYT // Gerry Mullany – July 15, 2015

Donald J. Trump's wealth is rising with his polling numbers, if his characterization of his own net worth is to be believed.

Mr. Trump issued a statement Wednesday saying that his net worth was now in excess of $10 billion, more than the $8.7 billion he said he was worth when he announced his presidential candidacy a month ago.

The statement noted that Mr. Trump had filed his financial disclosure report with the Federal Election Commission, a requirement of presidential candidates, and the commission confirmed his filing. The Trump statement was full of the bombast often associated with Mr. Trump, including an all-capitalization declaration of his wealth:

"Mr. Trump's net worth has increased since the more than one year old financial statement produced at his presidential announcement. Real estate values in New York City, San Francisco, Miami and many other places where he owns property have gone up considerably during this period of time. His debt is a very small percentage of value, and at very low interest rates. As of this date, Mr. Trump's net worth is in excess of TEN BILLION DOLLARS."

But Mr. Trump's characterizations of his wealth have drawn skepticism in many quarters, partly fueled by his own statements.

"My net worth fluctuates, and it goes up and down with markets and with attitudes and with feelings — even my own feelings — but I try," he once said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mr. Trump continues to do well in polls of the Republican field, with a nationwide survey released Tuesday putting him in a statistical tie for the lead with former Gov. Jeb Bush of Florida.

Mr. Trump declared that he had an income of $362 million in 2014, not including dividends, interest, capital gains, rent and royalties. And he said that he had made $213 million during his 14 seasons hosting NBC's "The Apprentice." NBC recently ended its relationship with Mr. Trump after remarks he made during his presidential announcement speech in which he referred to Mexican immigrants as "rapists" and "murderers."

In filing his financial disclosure, Mr. Trump apparently followed through on a pledge that he made on June 16 when he announced his campaign, saying he would be making the submission without requesting extensions. "We don't need extensions," he said at the time.

During his speech announcing his candidacy, Mr. Trump waved a document that he said was a report on his finances, prepared by a large, respected accounting firm, reporting the $8.7 billion figure as his net worth. (He noted then that an updated accounting would probably show his net worth higher than $10 billion.)

He said that figuring out his finances was complicated. "My accountants have been working for months, because it is big and complex," he added. Of his money, he said much was earning through real estate. "I made it the old-fashioned way," Mr. Trump said.

The Trump campaign included in its news release a summary of stock transactions dating to January 2014, trumpeting Mr. Trump's prowess as a stock-picker. The records showed that Mr. Trump had gains from sales of numerous stocks, including making $6.7 million on Bank of America and $3.9 million on Boeing Co.

Mr. Trump's current investment portfolio, according to his campaign, including investments in a series of hedge funds, including some managed by John Paulson.

The Trump campaign did not release on Wednesday the actual disclosure that it said was filed with the Federal Elections Commission. A spokesman for the F.E.C. could not immediately confirm that Mr. Trump had filed a disclosure. The F.E.C. has up to 30 days to make such a disclosure public.

So, Donald Trump looks like he's serious about running for president // WaPo // Amber Philips – July 15, 2015

Update: Trump is making progress toward becoming an official, legitimate presidential candidate, so much so that we pretty much had to rewrite this whole story since posting it after his June 16 announcement.

We honestly thought Donald Trump running for president was going to be kind of like that kid in high school who says his girlfriend lives in Canada and can't make it to the prom but shows you a picture of his girlfriend in front of a maple leaf flag to prove she's real (and Canadian).

So we made a list of official candidacy-things Trump would have to do to prove to us he was serious -- like disclose the details of his finances -- with the make-or-break dates of when he'd have to get it done by. And sure enough, one by one, he dutifully checked off four of the five things on the list, all on time.

Wednesday marked the biggest news of all: Trump actually shared with us his personal finances.

Maybe Trump's fake-Canadian girlfriend is real after all? We're not quite sure. Trump assures our own Robert Costa and Philip Rucker that his girlfriend is indeed real ... er, that he's in it for the long haul.

So back in June, we thought we'd help him. Here, Mr. Future President Trump, is exactly what you had to do to prove you're serious.

1. Spend $5,000 on your candidacy

Once you do this, according to the Federal Election Commission, the law considers you a candidate. You can also receive $5,000 for your campaign to become a candidate. Mr. Trump, we know you said you'll finance your own own election -- "I'm rich," you reminded us when you announced -- and we're pretty sure your elaborate announcement at New York's Trump Tower where you rode down an escalator to wave to tourists you lured from the streets to cheer you on and rambled for 1,700 words in front of America-blue TRUMP signs cost more than $5,000.

So, Mr. Trump, you have probably already passed this threshold. Well done.

Make or break date for Trump: Done. The start of your candidacy was June 16, FYI.

2. Fill out a form

As The Fix's own Philip Bump noted, the next step to running for president is to simply fill out a form with the FEC.

There are 396 people who have filled out the FEC Presidential 2016 Form. Mr. Trump, you played by the rules here, too. You had 15 days from his announcement to file your statement of candidacy, which your did on June 20 -- ten days ahead of schedule.

Make or break date for Trump: June 30. Done.

3. Make a Trump for President committee

Within 10 days of filing your presidential form, you need to put together a campaign committee and announce its organization to the FEC. We see you've done that as well, Mr. Trump.

Make or break date for Trump: July 10. Done.

4. Share your finances

We must admit, this is the one we thought you'd never really do, Mr. Trump. A lot of other people tried to call your bluff, too: As you started surging in the polls, Fox News decided to limit its Aug. 6 debate to the top 10 candidates who actually filed their personal finance disclosures.

You had 30 days after declaring your candidacy to to file these forms -- which require you to list all your sources of incomes and all your assets and liabilities. (But lucky for you, the forms were created by members of Congress, who also have to file them, so they're pretty vague. You can list your assets and liabilities in ridiculously broad ranges, like from $500,000-$1 million.)

We really thought you'd just say "I'm rich" or announce to the media you have $9 billion in assets which, as Bump notes, is far from having $9 billion in actual cash you can spend willy nilly to become president, and just call it a day.

But on Wednesday, July 15th, you released those. "This report was not designed for a man of Mr. Trump's massive wealth," your staff said. And they're kind of right: Anything worth $50 million or more simply gets listed as $50 million+, Bump notes. So you told us you're worth $10 billion, much of that in intentionally vague real estate. And that's all we'll know for now.

Make or break date for Trump: July 22. Surprisingly, done.

5. Get on the ballot in all the states

This is the hardest part of running for president. The GOP field is competitive (especially since you're in it), so again, here's some free advice, Mr. Trump: You'll probably need to be on the ballot for the Republican primaries and caucuses in all 50 states if you want to win enough delegates to move on to the general election.

Why is this so hard? Each state has its own set of rules for how to go about that. They're designed to make it tough for random people to run for president -- not that that's you. In California in 2012, for instance, Bump reported candidates for president had to get "either 1 percent or 500 signatures (whichever was lower) from Democrats in each of the state's 50-plus congressional districts. They had two months to do so."

In 2012, Rick Santorum and Newt Gingrich, who finished second and third in the Republican nominating contest, both nonetheless failed to qualify for the ballot in some states.

Make or break date for Trump: The dates vary. Consult with a really good campaign finance lawyer. We're sure you can afford it.

Donald Trump says he's worth $10 billion. But we still won't really know. // WaPo // Philip Bump – July 15, 2015

When he announced that he was finally, actually running for president, Donald Trump held up a sheet of paper that outlined how much he was worth. "I have assets," he said, clenching a sheet compiled by a "big accounting firm, one of the most highly respected," of "9 billion, 240 million dollars." Less $500 million in debt, his net worth was a tidy, precise $8,737,540,000 (if you don't mind his accepting his contention that his "brand" and licensing was worth a third of that total).

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

That was on June 16. On Wednesday, less than a month later, he issued a press release stating that he'd filed a more detailed list with the Federal Election Commission. His net worth now, after being dropped by sponsors and battered in the press? $10 billion.

No, there's not a billion dollars in fast money to be found in anti-immigrant rhetoric. Trump claims that the difference stems from the real-estate valuations that he used in June being a year out-of-date. Then, the big accounting firm pegged the value of the properties he owned at about $4.3 billion. Since then, it's apparently jumped a billion dollars in value. (Which, to be fair, he vaguely alluded to in his speech.)

The line in Trump's release that has garnered the most -- completely justified -- snickering is the declaration that the FEC's report detailing income and assets "was not designed for a man of Mr. Trump‟s massive wealth." Un-humblebrag though it is, it is also demonstrably true. And that's why Trump's team was very careful to note that the new $10 billion figure comes from real estate. Because the vagueness of the form means that most of Trump's value will remain out of sight.

Here's Mitt Romney's disclosure from 2011, via the Center for Responsive Politics. (Trump's actual disclosure isn't yet available online.) Notice the highlighted categories for valuations. Anything worth $50 million or more simply gets flagged as "over $50 million." So if a building is worth, as Trump's press release suggested, $1.5 billion, it's listed as "over $50 million."

Notice that this always works in the other direction. If Trump's investment in a building is not worth $1.5 billion, but is instead worth, say, $50,000,001, it goes in the same category. Once the full form is released, Trump wants us to assume that he's worth far more than the sums displayed. One might as generously assume that he's not.

In light of his assertions about real estate, all of the other details he released today -- Trump getting $213 million from NBC for 14 seasons of "The Apprentice," and his $27 million in stock deals -- are peanuts. One not assumed to view his assertions generously might consider them a bit of hand-waving, a look-at-these-big-numbers move meant to be the focus of attention.

The FEC form was not designed for a man of Mr. Trump's willingness to assert massive wealth. He could eliminate any questions by releasing details of the precise valuations of his property using some other mechanism. But for Trump, that "over $50 million" loophole probably feels more than comfortable enough.

Individuals give money to billionaire Trump and more from his FEC report // WaPo // Colby Itkowitz and Rosalind S. Helderman – July 15, 2015

Donald Trump has filed his first presidential campaign filing. He's raised $1.9 million since entering the race in mid-June, of which $1.8 million was a loan from himself. He burned through most of his money, spending $1.4 million or 74 percent, leaving his campaign with $487,736 on hand.

He also gifted his campaign $4,049. The loaned amount he could hypothetically get back.

In his campaign announcement speech, Trump had declared he wasn't "using donors." Still, around 60 individual donors (who include a spice importer and a self-employed artist) from all over the country gave the billionaire's campaign $53,075, including nine who gave the maximum $2,700 contribution.

We reached one of those top Trump supporters, Jim Shore, a figurine artist from York, South Carolina.

Shore, who already gave Trump the maxed $5,400 - half for the primary and half for the general - acknowledged that Trump, who claimed Wednesday that he is worth $10 billion, is a wealthy man who might not need his money. Still, he noted that running for president is expensive--Hillary Clinton, he said, is wealthy but will fundraise for her campaign.

Plus, being a contributor is more likely to give him a voice in the campaign, he reasoned.

"I figured early on that I'm going to contribute support to the one that I want to win. It didn't matter how they're otherwise funding their campaign," he said. "If at some point I want to make a suggestion or have someone's ear, it helps if you're participating contributor."

Shore, 65, said he decided to donate to Trump after carefully researching the candidates and determining Trump's business background would make him a good president.

He has followed Trump's careers, through his ups and downs, and has admired his ability to bounce back from past missteps. "I admire anybody who has faced adversity and has overcome it," he said.

Regarding the controversy around Trump's remarks about illegal immigration, Shore said they'd been misinterpreted and that Trump was right that illegal immigration was a problem.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"The perception was 'oh he's anti immigrant, he's a xenophobe, he hates immigrants'," he said. "The truth of the matter is that he is probably the only who's standing up and saying something that protects our immigrant community."

Other fun snapshots from Trump's FEC report:

Trump's Iowa campaign manager, veteran GOP activist Chuck Laudner, was paid $11,605 since April. There had been rumors that he was paid as much as $30,000 a month, but Trump insisted he was paying the going rate.

Meanwhile, his New Hampshire state director, Matthew Ciepielowski earned more than $33,680 in that time and Iowa advisor Chris Hupke earned $20,000.

Big Mac or Fish Filet? Trump's campaign spent $457.72 at McDonalds.
More than $66,645 went to Trump-related business entities, mostly for rent and hotel stays at his properties.

Two days before Macy's cut off its business relationship with Trump because of his incendiary remarks about Mexicans, his campaign spent $94.85 in "event supplies" at the department store.

He spent $506,486 on Tag Air, Inc., a private aviation company.

Donald Trump claims he's wroth more than $10 billion // WaPo // Rosalind S. Helderman and Tom Hamburger – July 15, 2015

Celebrity mogul Donald Trump says his net worth now exceeds $10 billion, a figure more than $1 billion higher than he estimated when he announced his presidential candidacy last month.

Trump campaign officials said his wealth includes $362 million earned in 2014 alone and they estimated that he earned more than $213 million from NBC for his involvement with 14 seasons of "The Apprentice" television show.

The disclosures came as his campaign said he had filed his legally required personal financial disclosures with the Federal Election Commission, defying expectations from many who said Trump's campaign was a vanity project and he would resist legal requirements to detail his wealth.

However, his campaign did not immediately release a copy of the disclosure form. The FEC has up to 30 days to review the form before releasing it publicly.

According to the campaign, the disclosure shows that Trump is involved with 500 different business entities and is sole owner of 91 percent of them.

Just a few weeks ago, Trump estimated his net worth at $8.7 billion. But, his campaign indicated his net worth has increased since those financial documents were prepared a year ago. They also complained that the presidential disclosure form, which requires candidates to disclose assets, income and liabilities in broad ranges, is "not designed for a man of Mr. Trump's massive wealth."

"For instance, they have boxes once a certain number is reached that simply state $50 million or more," the campaign said in a statement. "Many of these boxes have been checked."

The millions Trump indicated he has earned from NBC provides some measure of the potential cost to him of his recent controversial remarks on the Republican presidential trail about immigrants. The network announced earlier this month that it was "ending its business relationship" with Trump over his comments that many Mexican immigrant who come to the United State are criminals and rapists.

In his statement Wednesday, Trump offered another view on the ending of his NBC work.

The statement said that "Mr. Trump decided to turn them down in order to run for President of the United States."

Trump has long been dogged by private sector complaints that he overstates his wealth, as part of his larger-than-life celebrity persona as a successful developer and entrepreneur. One reason longtime Trump watchers had doubted he would ultimately submit the form is it requires swearing to the accuracy of its contents.

Financial disclosure reports submitted to the Federal Election Commission "should show the full range of assets in which he has ownership," said Karl Sandstrom, a former FEC commissioner who is part of the campaign law practice at the Perkins Coie law firm in Washington. Sandstrom is accustomed to warning clients about the serious criminal penalties that can result from knowingly filing a false report with the federal government.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Whether through commission or omission,” a false disclosure subjects filers to serious federal penalties, he said. A federal statute governing “destruction, alteration or falsification” of records would subject filers to fines and prison for up to five years. Separately, the Sarbanes-Oxley financial reform legislation makes it a criminal offense to file false financial information with the federal government.

Trump has tangled in the past with analysts who have indicated he is worth less than he claims. In 2006, he sued New York Times reporter Timothy L. O’Brien for asserting in a book on the mogul that several people close to Trump had estimated his worth as somewhere between $150 million to $250 million. The suit was dismissed in 2009.

In 2011, he threatened to sue MSNBC host Lawrence O’Donnell after the O’Donnell insisted Trump was worth less than $1 billion. He never actually filed suit, prompting O’Donnell to respond that Trump’s true secret was that he could not afford to sue him.

In a statement, Trump acknowledged the doubters, noting he had filed the form within 30 days of announcing his candidacy, without even taking advantage of extensions allowed under law. “I look forward to the challenge of winning the presidency and doing a fantastic job for our country.”

Donald Trump claims ‘most people’ read his book. No one we talked to at Trump Tower has. // WaPo // Philip Bump – July 15, 2015

Donald Trump's campaign is diverse in its complaints and unified on the one necessary solution: Everything bad in America would be fixed if only we didn't keep getting out-negotiated. In his interview with "Morning Joe"'s Mika Brzezinski on Wednesday, Trump revisited that argument in his favorite way. The deal with Iran is bad, he said, because the negotiators "didn't read 'The Art of the Deal,'" Trump's 1987 bestseller about, well, deals.

"Most people did," Trump continued. "They didn't. It's a ridiculous deal."

"Most people" read it he says, in the vague/impressive/vaguely impressive way that we've all grown accustomed to with Trump. In the past, he's implied that "The Art of the Deal" is the best-selling business book of all time, which Politifact rated "false." Data from Nielsen BookScan puts the two paperback versions of the books at 168,000 in sales since 2001, when the data-tracking began. In that same time period, the 1936 book "How to Win Friends & Influence People" has sold over two million copies.

I figured there was another way to measure whether or not "most people" had read the book. I headed to Trump Tower in Midtown Manhattan and asked people there whether or not they'd cracked its spine. I asked 15 people: businesspeople, tourists, people who worked in the building.

Of the 15, precisely none had ever read it.

Like most residents of New York City, I'd never been inside Trump Tower. Having watched the campaign announcement, the space beside the escalator that Trump descended at the bottom of the building's atrium seemed surprisingly small. Normally, on days like today, there's a restaurant down there.

One level up, at street level, you find elevator banks and a little pop-up "Trump Store," selling a variety of Trump-branded merchandise. They have "The Art of the Deal," which sells for $19.95. They also have Trump: Make America Great Again campaign t-shirts -- $15 -- which seems like it probably crosses some campaign finance line. When I arrived, the cheerful woman tending the shop was folding the shirts; while I was there, I didn't see any sales.

Chris, from Wyoming, hadn't read Trump's book, but still liked him as a candidate. "Out of all the choices, I actually am for Donald Trump," Chris said. "His views on immigration are similar to mine, and it's nice to see someone who doesn't back down. He stands for what he wants and doesn't sway back and forth."

Stanca, sitting up on the second level near the Starbucks, agreed on Trump's immigration position but was a bit more skeptical on the candidate. "I don't know if I should take it seriously," he said. A few yards away, Rodi from New Jersey was a bit more enthusiastic. "We've had two Bushes, the last one for eight years. Why not Trump?" she said. "He cannot be worse than Bush." (Neither had read the book.)

Larry Mortimer, in from Connecticut on business, hadn't read the book either -- but he did have a quick story about it. His father-in-law had written a business book called "Swim with the Sharks Without Being Eaten Alive" which came out shortly after Trump's. When Mortimer subsequently ran into Trump, he pointed out that "Sharks" was (at the time) outselling "Deal." Trump's response? "I know him! I want him to market my book!"

That was it on supporters (and semi-supporters). (Though two people who worked in the building offered "no comment"s when asked about the candidacy.)

Some of the detractors were generous in their assessments. Charlie (hadn't read it) said that Trump seemed like a "very intelligent person, but not as refined as someone would expect from someone of his caliber." One man who didn't want to be named ("it's a small town"; Editor's note: No, it's not) declared that Trump seemed like an "extraordinary businessman and entertainer." When he trailed off, I commented on his decision not to add any other titles. "Dot-dot-dot," he added with a grin.

Some of the detractors, however, were not generous. The first group of people I met, right by the Trump store, were tourists in from Idaho, Nebraska and Hawaii. None had read Trump's book. Brian, the one from Hawaii, added, "Nor do I plan on it."

"He's playing games," Brian said. "He's a buffoon. Why's he even bothering?" The others with him nodded. "And that's coming from three Republicans."

I asked why the three were at Trump Tower in the first place. "Because our wives are enamored with the building," Brian said. He wasn't happy about it, and showed me a text he'd just sent to his spouse.
It's easy to pinpoint what went wrong for Brian. When debating with his wife about where they should spend the day, he got out-negotiated. The irony of Brian having a book so close by that could have taught him how not to have had to visit Trump Tower at all appears to have been lost on him.

Donald Trump, middle finger of the Republican base // WaPo // Chris Cillizza – July 15, 2015

When I left two weeks ago for vacation, Donald Trump was everywhere. I assumed by the time that I got back, he would be nowhere — or at the very least, that the massive amount of attention he was drawing to his presidential candidacy would have receded significantly.

Boy, was I wrong.

On Tuesday, USA Today and Suffolk University released a new national poll that put Trump at 17 percent and (gulp) at the front of the 2016 GOP field. New numbers from The Washington Post/ABC News out this morning show that almost six in ten Republicans have a favorable view of Trump — an unbelievable turnaround from a May poll by WaPo/ABC that had Trump's unfavorables at 65 percent. I have never seen such a reversal in poll numbers in such a short period of time. Never.

There are, obviously, a few possible answers to that question. Trump would say he is tapping into what the American people really want: a brashness and boldness that makes us (America) the good guys and everybody else the bad guys. He tells it like it is and people respond. That the political establishment and media are so surprised at his rapid rise speaks only to how out of touch those groups really are.

Then there's the explanation that in a very crowded field, name ID matters hugely — and that's something Trump has no shortage of. Philip Bump made that case here — and it's a compelling one.

I think there may be a psychological element to add to the technical explanation offered by Philip. Put simply: I do think Trump's name ID plays a role in what's happening in polls, but I don't think that's all that's at work. Everyone knew Trump's name a month ago but he wasn't at or near the top of the polls then. So what's happened? What's led to such a stunning reversal in how he's perceived among Republican voters? And what makes someone (or 17 percent of someones) say, "Yes, I think Donald Trump is the best Republican candidate for president"?

Here's my working theory: Trump's rise has very little to do with "Donald Trump" and very much to do with what Trump represents at the moment to voters.

What is that? Someone who doesn't sound or, frankly, look like other politicians. Trump's willingness to say impolitic things (Mexican/rapists etc.) actually bolsters his appeal among a certain segment of the Republican electorate, not solely because they happen to agree with his hard-line views on immigration, but because they see him as being willing to say uncomfortable things and shake up the system.

Trump's purposeful(?) positioning as the ultimate anti-politician is perfectly suited to the consequence-free mindset that dominates among likely Republican primary voters at the moment. The election is a million miles away to the average voter, so what's the harm in telling a pollster you like Trump right now? You almost certainly won't stick with him when it's time to actually vote — just 41 percent of Republicans view Trump as a "serious" candidate for president in a new Gallup poll — but he is a great vehicle to send a message to the political establishment that you're sick of them.

Think of it this way: You're single. You're in your 20s. You start dating a bad boy/girl who makes you laugh/kind of scares you/your parents hate with the white-hot passion of 1,000 suns. You are not planning to marry this person. In fact, if he/she did happen to pop the question — they wouldn't because they are a bad boy/girl and "don't like to be tied down" — you would almost certainly say no. You are going out with this person because it's fun and it's different and you are tired of the squares — is that a word people still use? — you've dated up to this point. Sure, you'll probably settle down with one of those squares (I am just going with it) but not just yet.

The tendency in politics — particularly among the journalistic and consultant classes — is to overthink things. And so it is with Trump. But I think his appeal may actually be very, very simple: He's different — and different, at least right now, is intriguing for Republicans. My strong belief is that as the election gets closer and Trump goes from colorful oddball to "Hey, wait a minute, he believes what?!?" his support will slip — probably considerably.

For now, Trump represents a middle finger from a segment of Republican voters directed at the GOP establishment. Which seems about right.

Donald Trump word cloud: Nazism and consumerism // WaPo / James Hohmann – July 15, 2015

Donald Trump spent Tuesday in the political sweet spot between Nazism and consumerism.

Our Zignal Labs partners, who measure what people are talking about across social and traditional media, showed that the chatter about the reality TV star and businessman revolved around two main themes: a tweet (later deleted) that included images of Waffen-SS solders and his ongoing dispute with Macy's about pulling his merchandise. "Retaliation" also factored big into the equation.

On the first point, the controversy began when The Donald tweeted an image of himself emblazoned on an American flag, with soldiers in the background. Only, it turned out, those soldiers came from Waffen-SS stock images, according to Internet sleuths.

As for Macy's, TMZ reported on Tuesday that 30,000 customers were so angry that the store refused to carry Trump ties that they were cutting up their credit cards as a result. The store, the website said, was "taking it in the shorts" for breaking with The Donald over his comments about Mexicans.

Recently escaped Mexican drug lord "El Chapo," in a Twitter account reportedly linked to him, threatened Trump in a profanity-laced tirade on Twitter. "I'm better than them," El Chapo wrote.

Trump took the threat seriously, increasing his security and saying he's alerted the FBI. "We have officials all over the place, including right outside hanging out in trees," Trump told reporters during an appearance at a Virginia winery, according to the New York Post.

So the word "retaliation?" Seems like it could apply to any of the above disputes.

The best of Donald Trump on 'Morning Joe' // WaPo // Elise Viebeck – July 15, 2015

Sometimes it's best to let Donald Trump's quotes speak for themselves.

Trump, now surging in the polls, joined MSNBC's "Morning Joe" on Wednesday to discuss the Iran deal, his position in the Republican field and his previous comments on immigration. He also weighed in on Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Tex.), the Hispanic vote, Hillary Clinton and Jeb Bush.

Enjoy the best quotes below:

Trump on the Iran deal and "The Art of the Deal":

They [U.S. negotiators] didn't read The Art of the Deal. Most people did, they didn't. It's a ridiculous deal ... I have seen the deal. I have seen it broken down in every newspaper you can imagine, and I have, I think I know the deal quite well because other people, I assume, are going into it in great detail. I have seen every newspaper article you can. I have seen the good points and the bad points and the good points are not very strong. That I can tell you.

Trump on President Obama and Russian President Vladimir Putin:

If you had a president that was a leader, he would be able — he can't even talk — when you look at where we are with countries, as an example, with Russia, they can't even talk together, Putin can't stand him. In all fairness, he can't stand Putin, but Putin doesn't respect him.

Trump on Hillary Clinton and the Hispanic vote:

Hillary was the worst secretary of state in the history of our country. I think that the person she doesn't want to run against is me because I say it, and [Jeb] Bush doesn't say it, nobody says it ... I would beat Hillary and I'll tell you what, a vote that I will win is the Hispanic vote ... I'll create jobs, and I'll get the Hispanic vote ... the Hispanics love me.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Trump on why he's meeting with Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Tex.):

Ted Cruz called me and I don't know why I'm meeting him, to be honest, but I do have respect for him. I respect the fact that, along with a couple of others, he came out and he came out very strongly and agreed with what I said on illegal immigration ... I like him. He called me, he wanted to meet, and we are going to meet. What it's about, I have absolutely no idea.

Trump on Iranian nuclear capabilities:

I'd hate to inherit the deal [with Iran] ... Ultimately, they're going to have the nukes all over the place.

Trump on illegal immigrants:

Illegal immigrants are causing tremendous problems coming in ... There's crime, it's a crime wave, it's a disaster ... I have hundreds and hundreds of Mexicans working for me. I love Mexican people, I love their spirit ... Mexico is sending a lot of their people over that they don't want, and that includes people that should be in Mexican prisons, and you know it and I know it and nobody wants to talk about it.

Trump on how he knows Mexico is "sending a lot of their people" over who belong in prison:

I heard from five different sources ... I'll reveal my sources when you reveal your sources, Mark [to Mark Halperin of Bloomberg Politics]. I have a lot of information on it and so do — so does everyone else, and you probably do, too, and for some reason they don't want to put out this information.

Trump on Jeb Bush and his fundraising numbers:

We have grossly incompetent leadership. That is the one overriding theme, and [voters] don't see it any better with Bush. He doesn't have the energy, he's not going to produce, and I will tell you that when he raises $100 million ... every single person that he gave every single dollar is expecting something for that money. Every single person ... So the $100 million that he raised is a bad thing, not a good thing.

Trump Files Disclosure, Touts $10 Billion Net Worth // WSJ // Heather Haddon – July 15, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Donald Trump boasted his net worth has grown to more than $10 billion as he filed his personal financial disclosure, removing a potential barrier for eligibility in the GOP debates.

"First people said I would never run, and I did. Then, they said, I would never file my statement of candidacy with the FEC, and I did," Mr. Trump said in a statement. "They said I would never file my personal financial disclosure forms. I filed them early despite the fact that I am allowed two 45 days extensions."

In a statement laden with bravado released Wednesday, the real-estate developer and entertainer said that his net worth had been boosted by rising property values in New York, San Francisco, Miami and elsewhere, and nodded to gains in the stock market as well. A one-page sheet summary released by his campaign previously showed total assets of $9.2 billion and liabilities of $502 million.

In Wednesday's statement, the campaign said that the FEC's disclosure forms couldn't capture Mr. Trump's full value, as maximum worth of assets in certain categories were set to a range of simply above $50 million. The value of some of Mr. Trump's buildings well exceeded that, the campaign said.

"This report was not designed for a man of Mr. Trump's massive wealth," his campaign stated.

The campaign didn't immediately release a copy of the disclosure Wednesday. A FEC spokesman said Wednesday that the agency was in receipt of Mr. Trump's financial disclosure form. The spokesman couldn't immediately say when the FEC would made the filing public. The commission has 30 days to do so.

Filing the personal financial disclosure removes one of the largest hurdles for Mr. Trump to go forward with a full-scale presidential bid, including appearing in televised debates.

Some of Mr. Trump's rivals had pushed Republican officials and television networks hosting the debates to exclude him if he didn't file the lengthy disclosures first. Fox News and CNN host the first two GOP debates, and the networks have chosen to contain the main debates to the candidates placing in the top 10 in an average of national polls. Lower tier candidates have been angling for ways to boost their national standing leading into the debates.

Mr. Trump, who has become a lightning rod for criticism after labeling some Mexican immigrants "rapists," said during a television appearance on MSNBC "Morning Joe" Wednesday morning that he would put out the forms

Wednesday or Thursday. A spokeswoman for the campaign said they weren't yet certain if they would release the full report or allow those interested to go through the FEC.

Mr. Trump's income last year was $362 million, not including investments, rents or royalties, according to the campaign. The campaign didn't release figures on his debt, but said it was "a very small percentage of value, and at very low interest rates."

The campaign released a list of 45 stocks that Mr. Trump sold last year, saying their sale earned him $27 million. Bank of America, Alcoa, Best Buy and Facebook accounted for the largest number of shares in the portfolio, according to the list.

The gains came "even though stock market purchases are not something that Mr. Trump has focused on in the past," the release stated.

Mr. Trump also said he held assets in 11 market funds valued at $90 million, with the largest amount of purchased shares in the Obsidian Fund LLC, Baron Funds and Oppenheimer, according to the list.

Whether Mr. Trump would go through in making the detailed filing required by those running for president has been a source of speculation since the mogul announced his candidacy last month. Mr. Trump has never disclosed a detailed accounting of his wealth.

Trump campaign sets his personal fortune at $10 billion // AP // Jeff Horwitz – July 15, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Donald Trump filed financial documents with federal campaign regulators on Wednesday and set his personal fortune at more than $10 billion with an annual income of more than $362 million.

Members of his staff had said that Trump would release the financial documents themselves, but they issued only a press release that announced the filing and included a few financial details. It provided little information about how he calculated his net worth.

The $10 billion figure — up nearly 15 percent since the previous year, by Trump's calculation — would make him the wealthiest person ever to run for president, far surpassing previous magnates like Ross Perot, business heirs like Steve Forbes or private-equity investors like Mitt Romney, the 2012 GOP nominee.

Among the sources of Trump's income has been $214 million in payments from NBC related to 14 seasons of the business reality television show "The Apprentice." NBC recently cut its ties with Trump following his controversial remarks about Mexican immigrants.

Trump is relying almost exclusively on his personal wealth to fund his White House bid. His fortune could help maintain his status as a major player in the Republican presidential primary, much to the dismay of GOP officials who worry that his hardline immigration statements could alienate Hispanic voters.

Filing a personal financial disclosure with the Federal Election Commission is one of the requirements, set by the hosts, to participate in next month's televised GOP debate.

Trump's statement Wednesday noted that a hypothetical Trump building worth $1.5 billion would be reported as simply worth in excess of $50 million on the federal forms, which offer broad ranges for asset values.

Previous reviews of Trump's real estate holdings by both Forbes Magazine and commercial real estate trade publication The Real Deal did not identify any single property with a valuation in excess of $1 billion.

His campaign noted that Trump held stakes in almost 500 business entities and said the federal forms are "not designed for a man of Mr. Trump's massive wealth."

"I have a Gucci store worth more than Romney," Trump told the Des Moines Register last month, referring to the fashion company's flagship store in New York's Trump Tower.

Trump also valued his personal brand and marketing deals at $3.3 billion when he announced his candidacy.

Forbes Magazine, however, valued his brand at just $125 million. And that was before Trump's comments about Mexican immigrants cost him business partnerships with companies such as Macy's and Univision, which experts on brand valuation said have at least temporarily tarnished the value of his name in corporate sponsorship deals.

While the Forbes estimate is likely low, "the spread between Forbes $125 million and his own estimate of $3.3 billion is explained primarily by hubris," said Weston Anson, chairman of Consor Intellectual Asset Management, a California-based consulting firm.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Anson said it was too early to evaluate the effect of Trump's comments on value of his name, but noted the rapid cancellation of partnership and sponsorship deals. The notoriety could also likely erode Trump's ability to charge a premium for his real estate, Anson said.

Trump in the past has taken umbrage at suggestions he might not be as fantastically wealthy as he says. In 2009, he sued author Timothy O'Brien for defamation after O'Brien wrote that Trump's net worth might be as low as $150 million.

Trump lost the suit and a subsequent appeal. In a deposition, the panel of appellate judges noted, Trump conceded that his public disclosures of his wealth depended partly on his mood.

"Even my own feelings affect my value to myself," Trump said.

Trump indeed funding own presidential bid: $1.8 million loan // AP // Julie Bykowicz – July 15, 2015

When he announced his Republican run for president a month ago, billionaire businessman Donald Trump said he didn't need the help of donors. That's proved true.

Federal documents Trump filed Wednesday show that he has lent his high-profile campaign $1.8 million. In a press release, he set his net worth at more than $10 billion.

The documents show that Trump has not solicited any money for his campaign, collecting only $92,000 from other people. At of the end of June, Trump had about $488,000 left in his campaign account.

Trump is vying with 16 others for the Republican nomination.

British Open waits on Turnberry call after Trump remarks // AP // July 15, 2015

British Open organizers are biding their time before deciding whether Turnberry should be removed from the championship rotation following comments by the course's owner, Donald Trump, about Mexicans.

Trump, a Republican candidate for U.S. president, is facing a backlash after saying some Mexican immigrants to the U.S. bring drugs and crime, and some are rapists.

Trump recently purchased Turnberry, a links resort on the west coast of Scotland that has hosted the British Open four times.

Asked if Trump's comments compromised Turnberry's place on the Open rotation, Peter Dawson, chief executive of the R&A, said: "We'll just let a bit of time pass, and future championship committees will deal with them at the time."

The PGA of America announced last week it will move the Grand Slam of Golf from Trump's course in Los Angeles.

The Women's British Open is to be played this month at Turnberry, and organizers have said there are no plans to change the venue.

Turnberry last staged the British Open in 2009, when Stewart Cink beat Tom Watson in a playoff, and is one of nine courses on the rotation. Royal Portrush will be added in 2019.

"It's had a lot of publicity, hasn't it?" Dawson said about Turnberry and its links with Trump. "We don't have any decisions to make about Turnberry for quite some time."

Donald Trump: 'A vote that I will win is the Hispanic vote' // AP // July 15, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Donald Trump says he's confident he could win substantial Hispanic votes if he's the party's nominee.

Brushing aside the controversy over labeling Mexican immigrants as "rapists" and "criminals," Trump argues "the Hispanics love me."

He tells MSNBC: "I employ thousands of Hispanics."

Trump also says he's not worried about any lack of support in the Latino community and argues he hasn't been hurt politically by his calls for clamping down on illegal immigration.

Trump has refused to soften his stand on immigration, even after a plea by Republican National Committee Chairman Reince Priebus (ryns PREE'-bus) that he tone down his remarks.

5 things to know about Donald Trump's personal fortune // AP // Jeff Horwitz – July 15, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Donald Trump says his personal fortune is more than $10 billion, making the businessman the wealthiest person to ever run for the White House.

Five things to know about Trump's wealth:

TRUMP IS ALMOST CERTAINLY THE RICHEST PERSON EVER IN A PRESIDENTIAL RACE

His net worth claim eclipses that of Ross Perot, the billionaire Texas entrepreneur who ran a third-party campaign in 1992. Aside from Perot, no other candidate has reached the $1 billion dollar mark, including publishing empire heir Steve Forbes (roughly $400 million) or private equity titan Mitt Romney ($250 million.)

IT'S GOOD TO START OFF RICH

Trump has cited his ability to become rich as an important qualification for public office. Though he has earned a huge sum of money, Trump started off in the upper reaches of the 1 percent. His grandfather, Fred Trump Sr., was a successful builder. His father, Fred Trump Jr., earned a fortune estimated at several hundred million dollars through building solid-but-modest housing in the New York City boroughs of Brooklyn and Queens — sometimes with government support.

TRUMP HASN'T BEEN BANKRUPT, BUT HIS COMPANIES HAVE — FOUR TIMES

"Stop saying I went bankrupt!" Trump demanded on Twitter last month, a sentiment he expresses regularly. The confusion stems from the difference between personal and corporate bankruptcy.

Various arms of Trump's hotel and casino business underwent Chapter 11 bankruptcy reorganizations in 1991, 1992, 2004 and 2009. But only in the first instance — where Trump had personally guaranteed a vast debt owed by the Trump Taj Mahal in Atlantic City, New Jersey, — was Trump's personal fortune at risk.

In the other bankruptcies, his exposure was limited to just his stake in the particular venture. While plenty of other entities with Trump's name on them have failed, including the Trump International Golf Club in Puerto Rico this week, those were just companies that were renting Trump's name.

HE TALKS UP RISK-TAKING, BUT HIS CURRENT PORTFOLIO IS QUITE CONSERVATIVE

Setting aside Trump's $3.3 billion valuation of his personal brand, most of Trump's wealth is in the form in the real estate. Yet the summary of his finances he presented at his campaign kickoff last month lists more than $4 billion in mature, fully-owned assets, with less than $500 million in debt.

That's extremely safe — and completely out of keeping with the heavy borrowing that is standard for owners of marquis commercial real estate.

In his book "The Art of the Deal," Trump extolled such borrowing: "Leverage: Don't make deals without it."

CAVEATS ABOUT HIS WEALTH MAY BE WARRANTED

Doubting Trump's fortune can be hazardous. In 2006, Trump sued author Tim O'Brien for citing anonymous Trump insiders lowballing Trump's net worth in the book "TrumpNation: The Art of Being the Donald."

Precisely valuing a fortune such as Trump's is difficult, subjective work under the best of circumstances.

Trump lost his lawsuit against O'Brien on First Amendment grounds, but the panel of judges who killed the case in 2011 noted Trump's history of claims, such as asserting that a 72-story building with tall ceilings was actually a 90-story building. Because of numerous caveats, the judges declared that even a 2004 financial statement authored by Trump's accountants had "limited value as an accurate representation of Trump's net worth."

Trump campaign to reveal wealth details: 'I'm really rich' // AP // Jeff Horwitz – July 15, 2015

As other presidential candidates fight to raise money, Donald Trump is reminding everyone he's already got a lot of it.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The celebrity businessman's campaign is expected to reveal details Wednesday of his fortune, which he estimated last month at nearly $9 billion when announcing his Republican presidential candidacy.

If accurate, that number would make Trump the wealthiest person to ever run for president, far surpassing previous magnates like Ross Perot, business heirs like Steve Forbes or private-equity investors like Mitt Romney, the 2012 GOP nominee.

"I have a Gucci store worth more than Romney," Trump told the Des Moines Register last month, referring to the fashion company's flagship store in New York's Trump Tower.

On an appearance on MSNBC's "Morning Joe" Wednesday, Trump said the personal financial disclosure forms will be filed Wednesday or Thursday.

"The numbers will be far in excess of what anybody thought," he said. "I built a great company."

How much the personal financial disclosure form will reveal is uncertain. Personal financial disclosures generally require candidates to list the value of their assets within broad ranges, with "above $5 million" as the top bucket. Many of Trump's holdings, such as Trump Park Avenue in New York, or the hundreds of millions he says he holds in cash, would far exceed that upper limit.

Even if Trump were to include a detailed summary of his assets and debts, skepticism about his net worth will likely remain.

Trump, for example, valued his personal brand and marketing deals at $3.3 billion when he announced his candidacy. Forbes Magazine, however, valued his brand at just $125 million. And that was before Trump's comments about Mexican immigrants cost him business partnerships with companies such as Macy's and Univision.

Trump in the past has taken umbrage at suggestions he might not be as fantastically wealthy as he says. In 2009, he sued author Timothy O'Brien for defamation after O'Brien wrote that Trump's net worth might be as low as $150 million.

Trump lost the suit and a subsequent appeal. In a deposition, the panel of appellate judges noted, Trump conceded that his public disclosures of his wealth depended partly on his mood.

"Even my own feelings affect my value to myself," Trump said.

Donald Trump grows up // Politico // Ben Schreckinger – July 15, 2015

In a matter of days, Donald Trump has gone from flame-throwing insurgent to statesmanlike front-runner, at least in his own mind.

As national polls continued to roll in showing Trump in first or second place in the Republican presidential primary, he showed restraint and message discipline in a phone interview with POLITICO on Wednesday, passing on multiple opportunities to level his trademark insults at political opponents and steering the conversation instead towards the economy and “making America great again.”

Trump’s ego remains intact — “I have been victorious against China on numerous occasions” he bragged minutes before his campaign forwarded a statement claiming he is now worth more than “TEN BILLION DOLLARS.”

But during the interview, away from the cameras and the packed crowds, Trump’s tone was markedly different from Saturday, when he ranted for over an hour against everyone from Jeb Bush to “Lyin’ Brian Williams” and the brands that had cut ties with him at a raucous campaign rally in Phoenix, Arizona.

Even the accent had softened from Queens to Westchester.

In Arizona, Trump cracked of Bush, “How can I be tied with this guy? He’s terrible.”

On Wednesday, he was more measured. “I think Jeb Bush is a very nice person, but I think he’ll be a terrible president in terms of negotiating trade deals with China. They’re just too tough and too smart,” said Trump, framing his critique of Bush in a way that that pivots to his own carefully crafted image as an expert negotiator, crystallized in, “The Art of the Deal,” the book he promotes relentlessly in campaign appearances.

When asked which of his opponents would make the worst president, Trump responded, “I don’t want to say that, because that would be disrespectful.”
Of Republican elites, who have been fretting out loud that Trump is tarnishing the party’s brand, especially among

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hispanic voters, Trump said, “I know the elites. Many of them are friends of mine. They’re fine. They go with whoever’s going to win.”

When asked about the possibility that he could run as a third-party or independent candidate in the general election, a nuclear option that could make him a spoiler for the eventual Republican nominee, Trump said, “Everybody wants me to run as a third-party candidate but my sole focus is running as a Republican because my best chance to take this country back … is for me to run as a Republican.”

On Sunday, Trump taunted the notorious Mexican drug trafficker Joaquin “El Chapo” Guzman, who escaped from prison over the weekend, tweeting that he “would kick [Guzman’s] ass!” only to receive back a threatening tweet from the drug lord’s account. On Wednesday, Trump said only, “Law enforcement is very strong. It’s really in the hands of law enforcement right now, ” before steering the question of his personal safety back to his campaign theme: “Making our country great again is much more important than me as an individual.”

A Suffolk University/USA Today poll released on Tuesday that showed Trump in first place with 17 percent support solidified what polling began to show last week: that Trump and Bush are currently neck-and-neck among Republican voters nationally.

Trump’s campaign announced on Wednesday that he had filed a personal financial disclosure with the Federal Election Commission, a step required of all candidates before they can participate in the first Republican debate next month and one that many political observed predicted Trump was not willing to take.

Many commentators continue to dismiss Trump’s viability in the Republican primary, pointing out that in the last presidential election former Minnesota Rep. Michele Bachmann and former Godfather’s Pizza CEO Herman Cain both achieved front-runner status in Republican polls before voters ditched them for candidates with more sober temperaments and traditional backgrounds in the actual primaries and caucuses.

But Trump isn’t the only one taking Trump seriously this week. On Wednesday evening, Texas Sen. Ted Cruz walked over to Trump tower in Manhattan to pay the mogul a visit.

A person with knowledge of the meeting described it as “very, very amicable” and said the two candidates discussed media coverage of Scott Walker’s Monday presidential launch, Jeb Bush’s fundraising prowess, Cruz’s own impressive fundraising haul, and Trump’s view that Bush does not enjoy campaigning.

They also discussed border security, the national debt, and the October 2013 government shutdown in which Cruz played a leading role, according to this person, who said the two left the door open to future meetings.

Unlike other Republican candidates, Cruz has defended Trump’s comments about the alleged criminality of undocumented Mexican immigrants. “I like Donald Trump. I think he’s terrific, I think he’s brash, I think he speaks the truth,” Cruz said of Trump last month on Fox News, calling NBC’s decision to cut ties with the mogul “silly.”

Trump for his part on Wednesday backed off of questions he’s raised previously about Cruz’s fitness for the presidency. When asked whether the fact that the Texas senator was born in Canada should affect his eligibility, Trump told POLITICO, “I don’t know. I mean I haven’t looked at it. I have not looked at it at all.”

When asked about the issue by a New York-based Fox affiliate in March, Trump had said, “It’s a hurdle. Somebody could certainly look at it very seriously. He was born in Canada. If you know and when we all studied our history lessons, you are supposed to be born in this country, so I just don’t know how the courts will rule on it.”

But Trump has apparently concluded that times have changed, and so will his tone, at least for now and to a degree: “No matter how good you are, timing is so important, and some people have timing and some people don’t, and I have it.”

Donald Trump snipes at Karl Rove // Politico // Adam B. Lerner – July 15, 2015

Donald Trump went on the attack against Karl Rove on Wednesday.

“Why do people listen to clown @KarlRove on @FoxNews?” the real estate mogul and Republican presidential candidate tweeted. “Spent $430M & lost all races — a Bushy!”

Later, he added, “.@FoxNews should not put @KarlRove on — he has no credibility, a bush plan who called all races wrong.”

Trump and Rove have been feuding in recent works, and the tiff shows no sign of dying down.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On Wednesday morning, Rove appeared on Fox News and downplayed recent poll results that show Trump surging in the GOP 2016 presidential primary.

"The fundamentals matter a lot and Mr. Trump's fundamentals are not good," Rove said on "America's Newsroom," adding that as the campaign goes on he believes Trump will be exposed as a fundamentally unserious candidate.

Trump has previously bashed Rove for incorrectly predicting the results of the 2012 presidential election, and for what he perceives as ineffective spending by the Rove-linked American Crossroads super PAC, but Wednesday was the first time he specifically called on Fox News to take Rove off the air.

Rove, a longtime aide to George W. Bush, wrote an op-ed in The Wall Street Journal on July 8 under the headline "Trump and Sanders, the Disrupter Brothers."

In it, Rove wrote that "Trump could become the 2016 version of Missouri Rep. Todd Akin, who tarnished the GOP brand in 2012 with an offensive statement about rape."

How Barack Obama Created Donald Trump // Politico // Keith Koffler – July 15, 2015

It is an unassailable doctrinal truth in the modern Republican Party that Ronald Reagan was a great president and that the United States can be restored to its former glory—i.e., the 1980s—if he is resurrected and returned to earth in the form of someone just like him who claims the GOP presidential nomination and then wins the general election.

That is, someone who, like Reagan, combines genial optimism with disciplined strength. Someone with longstanding, core conservative convictions based in a comprehensive ideology that he or she can articulate convincingly to the masses. And someone with wit, charm and never-ending charisma.

In other words, someone who is the opposite of Donald Trump.

And yet today millions of conservatives are swooning for The Donald, nothing less than the anti-Reagan. They ignore Trump's surly, intolerant suggestions that illegal immigrants are largely rapists and other types of miscreants. They tolerate his meanness, boastfulness and vengefulness against those who have crossed him. And they believe his fantastical claims, like that he can build walls atop the Mexican border and make Mexicans pay for it.

And yet I am here to tell you that despite what you've read in the media, even some outposts of the conservative media, these Trump acolytes in general are not racist against Latinos and they have not been seized by madness.

They are, however, angry. Very angry. And many are agonizingly fearful about the future of the nation. They believe that vast changes to the country are being wrought in ways that are undemocratic, dishonest and perhaps even illegal.

Trump, who seems perpetually angry, is an expression of the angst of conservatives who believe the United States has gotten so deep into a mess that a little extremism in the defense of liberty is no vice. What they adore about Trump is that he is a pugilist who has emerged at a time when someone needs to start throwing punches.

His blunt promise to stop illegal immigration touches on perhaps the conservatives' deepest concern of all: that their culture and the Constitutional order are disintegrating with such rapidity that they hardly recognize the country they are living in. There is a sense of desperation that is fueling support for a proven achiever and fearless confrontationalist like Trump.

As the editor of a conservative website, I am in contact with the Republican base every day. I read their voluminous comments on my website, and I exchange emails with them about their concerns.

Many of them right now genuinely, and even passionately, support Trump. They are happy to contradict me when I write that Trump is a self-aggrandizing demagogue who lacks a coherent agenda—conservative or otherwise—unless a scattered list of personal grudges and obsessions can be considered an agenda. In a poll last week on my website he won easily, cornering 25 percent of the vote.

Though I disagree with them, these comments make complete sense to me. Because I share much of the worldview that is animating support for Trump.

Let's start with immigration. America is, as President Barack Obama and his "immigration reform" allies like to say, a land of immigrants. But it is not a land of endless immigration from one culture that is different than ours and in many ways far less successful. Most immigrants from Mexico, no doubt, are good, hardworking people seeking a chance to better their circumstance in America. But they are not Americans. And in the numbers they are coming, the serious concern is that they are not easily assimilated.

Other cultures are supposed to augment ours, not replace it.

What's more, so many of these immigrants have, as their first act in this country, broken the law by coming here illegally. This indisputable fact is so minimized that it has become politically incorrect to call them "illegal immigrants." They are to be termed "undocumented," as if their lack of papers were a clerical error. This is a big problem for conservatives, who feel the rule of law is eroding fast under Obama.

Obama attempted to give millions of illegal immigrants legal status by simply not enforcing the law. This recourse to "prosecutorial discretion" is a shocking development, an effort to circumvent Congress and write de facto law out of the West Wing.

Many conservatives understand that millions of people cannot just be carted back to Mexico. But they want to be sure that this would be the final amnesty, unlike the last final amnesty, a law ironically enough signed by Reagan in 1986 that was supposed to mitigate illegal immigration. They don't trust Obama to enforce immigration reform that would block further illegal immigration, since he has a habit of not enforcing laws. And they believe their own Republican Party leaders are captive to business interests ravenous for cheap labor.

That is why Trump's unequivocal promise to build a wall has such resonance. They believe he'll do it. And most likely, put his name on it.

But Trump fever is about much more than immigration.

Obama's immigration fiat—which is thankfully running into trouble with the judiciary, which has halted it for now—is apiece with other solo measures he has taken that seem to many conservatives designed to dispense with the inconvenience of our system of check and balances. All in the name of doing what is "correct" as perceived by one side of the debate. The unilateral imposition of a certain viewpoint is exactly what the Constitution was designed to prevent.

Many were shocked when Obama peremptorily decided the statutory due dates of the Affordable Care Act were not to his liking and simply changed them. They were aghast that the president misled everyone about the consequences of the law, saying that people would be able to keep their doctors and health plans when they could not.

The law itself, perhaps the most sweeping legislation in half a century and a wholesale change in the way health care will be administered in this country, was rammed through Congress not by any consensus, but in a partisan vote that defied the will of the people, who opposed it. Norms were sacrificed to advance an agenda, contrary to how a republic is supposed to operate.

Meantime, the president is set to implement carbon emissions reductions that he could never get the people's elected representatives to approve. He decided on his own that the Senate was not in session and appointed judges the senate didn't approve. The IRS targeted the president's opponents, while Obama's secretary of State employed her own email server and then, after releasing what she wanted from it, erased it.

The president who cynically pretended to be "evolving" on the issue of gay marriage and then simply jettisoned beliefs supposedly grounded in his religious faith.

This president, who sold himself as "post-political," is seen by conservatives as very political, and more accurately described as "post-Constitutional."

The climate of Constitutional disorder perpetrated by Obama paves the way for demagogues like Trump to gain traction. With the rules of the game already being violated, there is greater tolerance for a man doesn't seem temperamentally inclined to obey any rules at all.

In many ways, Trump is the creation of Barack Obama.

Society, many conservatives feel, is simply unraveling.

The administration informs Americans that Obama has fixed the economy, even as it slogs along about around two percent growth. The nation debt soars skyward without anyone even faking that they have a plan to stop it—not even the supposedly budget-conscious Republican Congress. Even the Republican presidential candidates have mostly failed to explain how they will curb entitlement benefits to retirees that have been promised but cannot possibly be provided.

The institution of marriage—the foundation of society—is collapsing, as the out-of-wedlock birth rate explodes, with what conservatives fear are dire consequences for children and for women who have to raise their kids alone.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Even so, the Supreme Court—at Obama's urging—unilaterally redefines marriage to include members of the same sex instead of allowing people to democratically change the status quo and—if they like, sometime in the future—change it back.

Men can now be women and women can now be men simply if they choose to, no matter what's actually in their pants. The Court's notion that personal desires and an individual conception of "dignity" is the basis of the right to marriage surely opens the door to polygamy.

Culture seems to be falling apart—and society seems to be coarsening. Art and music alone aren't good enough anymore for commercial success; a good chanteuse today needs in her arsenal of skills a talent for twerking. Police are becoming hesitant to do their jobs lest they be accused of racism, and the murder rate in major cities is rising.

Overseas, a new terror threat in the form of ISIL is permitted to emerge and metastasize throughout the Middle East. Its virulence may soon be coming to a skyscraper near you. Iraq, which had been stable, is in pieces, as are other portions of the Middle East. China pushes up islands out of sea as it prepares for future conquests. A deal struck this week to prevent the extremist, expansionist and possibly insane leaders of Iran from gaining a nuclear weapon will actually allow them to do so within 15 years. Israel, one of our closest friends, is treated like a foe.

It is into this leadership void that Donald Trump has stepped. Say what you will about The Donald—and people certainly say plenty—but no one doubts that he's decisive and confrontational.

A strong hand like that wielded by Trump is seen as one that can help piece the seething disorder back together. That is always the promise of demagogues, who convey a sense of certainty during bewildering times, and who blame "others" and foreigners—in Trump's case Mexico and China—for the ills besetting the homeland.

What conservatives who support him are missing is that he too is a unilateralist who will only carve further cracks into the foundation of the republic.

But it is understandable that they are fooled by him. Because they are just not sure that temperate, compromising people can save the country. And in this, given how far we have fallen, they may be right.

Donald Trump: I'm getting richer // Politico // Ben Schreckinger – July 15, 2015

If Donald Trump is worried about the financial toll of his inflammatory comments on the campaign trail, which have caused many major American brands to cut ties with him, he isn't showing it.

He now claims to have a net worth greater than $10 billion.

Or as, Trump's campaign put it in a statement on Wednesday, "As of this date, Mr. Trump's net worth is in excess of TEN BILLION DOLLARS." The statement attributes Trump's supposed gain in net worth to rising property values over the past year in American cities where he owns real estate.

Trump's net worth has long been a matter of contention. In recent public statements, he's claimed to be worth nearly $9 billion, while Forbes magazine, which has been tracking his net worth for more than 30 years, pegs it at $4 billion. Much of that difference can be attributed to the value of his personal brand. Trump values his brand at more than $3 billion, while Forbes believes it is worth less than $150 million.

In the statement, Trump claimed an income of $362 million in 2014 on top of $27 million in profits from selling stocks last January. He filed a personal financial disclosure with the FEC on Wednesday, a prerequisite for participating in the first Republican primary debate next month.

Trump claims $213M payout for 'Apprentice' // Politico // Dylan Byers – July 15, 2015

Donald Trump claims that NBCUniversal paid him more than $213 million for his work on "The Apprentice," the reality show that Trump hosted up until the launch of his presidential campaign this year.

The total figure -- $213,606,575, over the course of 14 years -- was included in a news release announcing that Trump had filed his personal financial disclosure statement with the Federal Election Commission, making him eligible to run for president.

"NBC/Universal renewed, at the upfronts this year, The Apprentice (for a 15th season), but Mr. Trump decided to turn them down in order to run for President of the United States. NBC was not happy," Trump's office wrote. "During the 14 seasons of The Apprentice, Mr. Trump was paid $213,606,575."

An NBCUniversal spokesperson did not immediately respond to a request for confirmation of that figure.

Trump's office claimed that the real estate magnate's total net worth is 'in excess of ten billion dollars," and added that the FEC report "was not designed for a man of Mr. Trump's massive wealth."

Trump himself used the opportunity to strike back at critics who dismissed his presidential run as a charade.

"First people said I would never run, and I did. Then, they said, I would never file my statement of candidacy with the FEC, and I did. Next, they said I would never file my personal financial disclosure forms. I filed them early despite the fact that I am allowed two 45 days extensions," Trump said in a statement.

"Now I have surged in the polls and am fighting to Make America Great Again," he continued. "I look forward to the challenge of winning the presidency and doing a fantastic job for our country. I will make the United States rich and strong and respected again, but also a country with a big heart toward the care of our people."

Trump finished first in the most recent Republican presidential primary poll, conducted by USA Today and Suffolk University. He finished second, to Jeb Bush, in previous polls conducted by Monmouth University, CNN/ ORC and Fox News.

Poll: Trump's favorability increasing, but not with Hispanics // Politico // Nick Gass – July 15, 2015

Americans have increasingly positive views of Republican presidential candidate Donald Trump since his remarks on immigration, though many more still dislike him by nearly a 2-to-1 margin, according to a new ABC News/ Washington Post poll released Wednesday.

Thirty-three percent of those surveyed said they had a favorable view of the billionaire real-estate mogul, while 61 percent said they did not. Still, that is an improvement from the last ABC News/Washington Post poll conducted in May before Trump's campaign announcement, when 71 percent viewed him unfavorably and just 16 percent said they had a favorable impression of him.

Among Hispanics, however, his negatives are soaring. Just 13 percent said they have a positive opinion of Trump, who last month decried undocumented immigrants who are "rapists" and "killers" coming across the border from Mexico and other countries. More than eight-in-10 (81 percent) of Hispanics said they have an unfavorable impression of him.

The only groups that see Trump favorably are Republicans and strong conservatives, according to the poll. Republicans view Trump favorably by a margin of 57 percent to 40 percent, while those identifying as very conservative view him favorably, 55 percent to 37 percent. Among all whites, 53 percent see him unfavorably, along with 74 percent of nonwhites, 58 percent of independents and 60 percent of moderates.

Among Democrats, Hillary Clinton's favorability rating (52 percent to 45 percent) tops that of Bernie Sanders' (27 percent to 28 percent), though a plurality (45 percent) of those surveyed said they had no opinion of the independent Vermont senator.

The poll was conducted July 8-12 via landline and cellphones in English and Spanish, surveying a random national sample of 1,011 adults. The results carry a margin of error of plus-or-minus 3.5 percentage points.

The Trump Litmus Test // Bloomberg // Sahil Kapur – July 14, 2015

In the course of 24 hours, two of Donald Trump's Republican presidential rivals have said two very different things about him that had the benefit, for both, of attracting a bit of the media attention that follows the self-described billionaire candidate.

Jeb Bush has generated quite a bit of chatter with a comparison he made Tuesday at a campaign stop in Council Bluffs, a city on the western edge of Iowa.

"We need to stop tearing—separating ourselves by race and ethnicity and income. We need to focus on the things that tie us together. And whether it's Donald Trump or Barack Obama their rhetoric of divisiveness is wrong," the former Florida governor told the crowd. "A Republican will never win by striking fear in people's hearts."

Ted Cruz had a markedly different take. While in New York on Wednesday for a financial conference, the Texas senator planned to meet with his Republican competitor. Before the session, he described to NBC himself as "a big fan" of Trump and adding: "I think he brings a bold, brash voice to this presidential race."

The real estate mogul has drawn widespread condemnation for recently likening Mexican immigrants to "rapists" that are "bringing drugs; they're bringing crime" to the United States. His unrestrained attacks on illegal immigration have poured gasoline on an already explosive debate that has divided the party. Some conservatives have praised his focus on an issue they say the Republican Party isn't sufficiently concerned about.

The Trump schism reflects the divide within the crowded Republican field—Bush fares best among establishment figures and moderate Republicans who detest Trump and fear his ascent will damage the party. Many of his rivals, meanwhile, are competing the for the anti-establishment conservative base that Trump is effectively channeling. Retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson and former Hewlett-Packard CEO Carly Fiorina—who have said favorable things about Trump tapping into anger about illegal immigration.

Bush's broadside wasn't an off-the-cuff moment. His campaign clipped a 45-second video of those remarks and distributed them widely to reporters.

But by comparing Trump to Obama, Bush is leveling a critique calculated to resonate with conservatives. Among Republicans, it's an article of faith that Obama is one of the most divisive presidents in history, if not the most divisive. Their evidence for this generally focuses on his calls for upper income people to pay higher taxes. To his critics, that amounts to "class warfare." So the assertion is hardly novel. But the comparison to Trump—loved and hated for his incendiary, unrestrained rhetorical style—certainly is. Bush's campaign didn't respond to a message asking how he ranks Trump's divisive rhetoric against Obama's.

"The strategy is to show just how negative Trump is with his campaign and in order to effectively lead, there must be a positive vision going forward," said Ron Bonjean, a Republican operative who isn't working for any of the presidential candidates. "It's effective because it calls out how negative Trump really is with his sensationalist comments and takes it a step further by tying him to Obama's anti-Republican rhetoric."

One Democratic strategist speculated that Bush was trying to disqualify Trump with Republican voters by comparing him to Obama. That's more likely to sway Republicans than labeling Trump a racist, the theory goes.

A poll by Suffolk University and USA Today released Tuesday, the same day Bush made his remarks, found Trump leading the Republican primary field with 17 percent. Bush came second with 14 percent.

Donald Trump Claims Net Worth Over $10 Billion as He Files Disclosure // Bloomberg // Richard Rubin – July 15, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Donald Trump claimed a net worth exceeding $10 billion and a 2014 income of $362 million as he filed his financial disclosure with the U.S. government.

"This report was not designed for a man of Mr. Trump's massive wealth," his campaign said in a news release. "For instance, they have boxes once a certain number is reached that simply state $50 million or more. Many of these boxes have been checked."

Trump, a real estate developer, property owner and media personality, claimed a net worth of $8.7 billion last month. In Wednesday's statement, Trump's campaign said that number was actually more than a year old.

The Trump campaign didn't release the actual form that he filed with the Federal Election Commission, and campaign spokeswoman Hope Hicks referred a reporter to the FEC. The FEC has 30 days to release forms publicly after they are filed and reviewed. It won't confirm whether Trump's has been received.

When it's released, the form will show that Trump has "almost 500 business entities" and that 91 percent of them are fully owned by him, according to the campaign statement.

The $8.7 billion statement from last month included an assumption that Trump's brand was worth more than $3 billion. That was before companies including Macy's Inc. severed ties with Trump over his comments calling immigrants from Mexico “rapists.”

Real Estate

“Real estate values in New York City, San Francisco, Miami and many other places where he owns property have gone up considerably during this period of time,” the campaign said. “His debt is a very small percentage of value, and at very low interest rates.”

Wednesday’s statement didn’t include a precise number, instead describing his net worth as “in excess of TEN BILLION DOLLARS.”

The campaign also released a list of stock transactions, showing that Trump made $6.7 million in profits from selling shares of Bank of America Corp. and $3.9 million from Facebook Inc.

It also said that Trump has more than $9 million invested in hedge funds run by Paulson & Co.

The Trump campaign said he made $213,606,575 from NBC during the 14 years that his show “The Apprentice” was aired.

“First people said I would never run, and I did,” Trump said in the statement. “Then, they said, I would never file my statement of candidacy with the FEC, and I did. Next, they said I would never file my personal financial disclosure forms. I filed them early despite the fact that I am allowed two 45 days extensions.”

Donald Trump Says He'll Release Financial Disclosure by Thursday // Bloom berg // Ali Elkin – July 15, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Donald Trump said Wednesday that his personal financial disclosure form will come out by Thursday, and “the numbers will be far in excess of what anybody thought.”

Calling into MSNBC's Morning Joe show, Trump also confirmed he plans to meet with primary rival Ted Cruz. The Texas senator called him asking for the meeting, Trump said, and he doesn't know what it will be about.

“I respect him, I like him,” Trump said of Cruz, noting the senator's support during the fallout from Trump's comment about Mexican immigrants being “rapists.” (The Washington Post first reported on plans for the meeting, set for the Trump Tower in New York, citing Republicans familiar with the campaigns. Cruz aides declined to comment for that report, according to the newspaper, and his campaign did not immediately respond to a request for comment on Wednesday.)

During the interview, Trump also derided the Iran nuclear deal as a “disgrace” and, turning to immigration, said he had five sources supporting his claim that the Mexican government intentionally sends criminals across the border.

Asked by Bloomberg Politics' Mark Halperin to name those sources, Trump said, “I'll reveal my sources when you reveal your sources, Mark.”

Trump edged out former Florida Governor Jeb Bush for the top spot in a nationwide USA Today/Suffolk University poll of Republicans released Tuesday.

Donald Trump: I’m worth $10 billion // CNN // MJ Lee – July 15, 2015

Donald Trump -- to quote the businessman himself -- seems to be a "very rich" man.

His campaign boasted Tuesday that the Republican presidential candidate's net worth is "in excess of TEN BILLION DOLLARS," and that his income in 2014 was $362 million.

The campaign sent out a release to press Tuesday afternoon saying it had filed Trump's financial disclosure with the Federal Election Commission -- the FEC confirmed receipt of the disclosure. When asked for a copy of the full disclosure, campaign officials told CNN to request it from the FEC.

For Trump, who has never held public office, his financial disclosure would offer the most comprehensive public look yet into his massive wealth. Submitting this document to the FEC is also a requirement for any presidential candidate that intends to participate in the first GOP primary debate hosted by Fox News in August.

"This report was not designed for a man of Mr. Trump's massive wealth," the press release said. "As an example, if a building owned by Mr. Trump is worth $1.5 billion, the box checked is '$50,000,000 or more.'"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The amount of cash Trump has on hand will be particularly significant, showing how much money Trump has at his disposal to potentially put towards his own campaign.

His campaign previously released a summary of Trump's finances as of June 2014. It put Trump's net assets at $9.2 billion, and with approximately $500 million in liabilities, the businessman's net worth was stated as $8.7 billion.

"[T]hey said I would never file my personal financial disclosure forms. I filed them early despite the fact that I am allowed two 45 days extensions," Trump said in a statement. "Now I have surged in the polls and am fighting to Make America Great Again."

Trump's White House campaign, now just a month in, has been a costly affair.

His controversial comments that some people illegally crossing into the United States from Mexico are "rapists" and "criminals" have drawn widespread backlash. Numerous corporations including Macy's and NBC subsequently announced that they were severing business ties with Trump.

Macy's said earlier this month that it is phasing out the Trump-brand menswear line. And with NBC, there's more than one business venture at risk: Trump was the host of the popular reality TV show "The Apprentice," and the network also decided it would no longer broadcast the Miss USA pageant, which Trump partly owns.

Tuesday's press release claims that Trump was paid $213 million over the course of 14 seasons of "The Apprenftice."

Trump's business deals with the city of New York have also come under scrutiny: Mayor Bill de Blasio said he is reviewing the real estate mogul's contracts with the city, including for a recently opened Trump golf course in the Bronx.

But Trump has downplayed whatever financial hit he's taken so far.

"Here's the good news. I'm very rich," Trump told CNN's Anderson Cooper earlier this month. "The money you're talking about is a lot but it's peanuts for me."

Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush's campaign and a pro-Bush super PAC announced raising more than $114 million.

Donald Trump claims he's worth $10 billion // MSNBC // Carrie Dann – July 15, 2015

Donald Trump's campaign claims that he is worth over $10 billion and that he made $362 million in income last year.

His campaign made the estimate in a press release announcing that he has filed his personal financial disclosure information with the FEC. But in the statement, Trump's campaign itemized only about $50 million of his assets, including profits from stock sales and hedge and mutual fund investments.

Trump's team also made a point to lament that the FEC's personal financial disclosure form doesn't allow for a full reflection of Trump's cash.

"This report was not designed for a man of Mr. Trump's massive wealth," the press release stated. "For instance, they have boxes once a certain number is reached that simply state $50 million or more. Many of these boxes have been checked. As an example, if a building owned by Mr. Trump is worth $1.5 billion, the box checked is "$50,000,000 or more."

Trump did not make the entirety of his personal financial disclosure available to the public or to NBC News, although his campaign indicated that it was filed to the FEC Wednesday. The FEC has 30 days to release the information to the public.

When he announced his presidential candidacy last month, Trump cited his net worth as $8.7 billion. The campaign says that figure was out of date and that the increase is due in part to increasing real estate values in New York City, San Francisco and Miami.

But analysts have suggested that the real number is likely much less than that. Forbes, which has been tracking his finances for more than 30 years, estimates that his net worth is closer to $4.1 billion, less than half of Trump's figure.

CPAC Chairman: Trump a plausible president // MSNBC // Jesse Bergman – July 15, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In his some of his strongest language defending Donald Trump's candidacy, the head of the influential American Conservatives Union says Trump has a reasonable shot for the Oval Office.

When asked by "Hardball's" Chris Matthews if Trump is a "plausible President," Matt Schlapp, the chairman of the American Conservatives Union, said "Yeah. Definitely. Definitely."

"Being an outsider at this particular time in American politics sure seems to be an advantage," said Schlapp, who also serves as the chairman of CPAC.

Trump has risen to the top of the polls for the Republican Presidential primary. Whether his candidacy has staying power has been the subject of debate among analysts.

According to Trump, rival candidate Senator Ted Cruz (R-TX) called him requesting a meeting. Cruz responded in a joking tone when asked by John Harwood at CNBC's "Delivering Alpha Conference" if his motive for the meeting was to inherit Trump's followers in the event of a campaign collapse.

"I'm running to win," Cruz said. "I expect everyone to collapse and I want to inherit everyone's votes, so at the end of the day, I will readily plead guilty to that."

Former San Francisco Mayor Willie Brown echoed a sentiment expressed by many Democrats that Trump's candidacy would be a boon to Hillary Clinton, the likely Democratic nominee.

"I think Mrs. Clinton is just hoping the Republican Party continues with its insanity towards Donald Trump, and nominates Donald Trump, that will almost ensure that we'll have the first woman President in the history of the country," Brown said on "Hardball".

In response to Schlapp's argument that Trump's outsider status is an advantage in the current political environment, Brown said that in order to be taken seriously, a candidate must show talent, skill, humanity and common sense.

"Trump provides none of those things," Brown said.

Donald Trump's Team Says His 'Massive' Net Worth Is More Than 'TEN BILLION DOLLARS' // HuffPo // Igor Bobic – July 15, 2015

Donald Trump usually can't go more than a minute without reminding everyone about his huge crowds, his huge poll numbers and his hugely opulent wealth. And on Wednesday, the day presidential candidates were required to disclose their fundraising with federal regulators, Trump's campaign issued perhaps the biggest brag yet about the real estate mogul.

In a statement announcing his filing with the Federal Election Commission, Trump aides said that the FEC report "was not designed for a man of Mr. Trump's massive wealth."

"For instance, they have boxes once a certain number is reached that simply state $50 million or more. Many of these boxes have been checked," the statement says. "As an example, if a building owned by Mr. Trump is worth $1.5 billion, the box checked is '$50,000,000 or more.'"

During his presidential announcement in New York last month, Trump estimated his own net worth to be nearly $9 billion, adding that it was probably even higher. However, financial experts, including those at Forbes, have cast doubt on that claim, because Trump had evidently not factored in his estimated $5 billion in liabilities.

Trump's campaign said Wednesday that when the candidate initially brought up the $9 billion figure, it was based on data that was, in fact, more than a year old. Trump's net worth has gone up since then, the campaign's statement said, possibly because of higher property values on Trump's holdings in several cities.

"His debt is a very small percentage of value, and at very low interest rates. As of this date, Mr. Trump's net worth is in excess of TEN BILLION DOLLARS," the statement reads.

The Huffington Post has not been able to verify that claim, because Trump's official form is not yet available on the FEC's website.

Trump has risen steadily in the polls since he announced his bid for president in June, despite widespread public condemnation of his remarks about undocumented immigrants. A USA Today/Suffolk University poll released Tuesday showed the celebrity hotelier in first place among a very crowded Republican presidential field, with 17 percent support from likely GOP voters. Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush (R) trails Trump with 14 percent.

Trump touted his own ascent in the statement provided by his campaign, and thumbed his nose at critics who'd been skeptical about his presidential run.

“First people said I would never run, and I did. Then, they said, I would never file my statement of candidacy with the FEC, and I did. Next, they said I would never file my personal financial disclosure forms. I filed them early despite the fact that I am allowed two 45 days [sic] extensions," he said in the statement. "Now I have surged in the polls and am fighting to Make America Great Again. I look forward to the challenge of winning the presidency and doing a fantastic job for our country. I will make the United States rich and strong and respected again, but also a country with a 'big heart' toward the care of our people.”

Trump loaned his campaign more than $1.8 million since announcing his bid for the White House, according to an FEC report that was posted online Wednesday evening. He raised a mere $96,298, while spending more than $1.4 million of the total sum on operating expenditures. His campaign has $487,736 cash on hand.

Donald Trump Exaggerates Crowd Size At Phoenix Rally // HuffPo // Jacob Kerr – July 15, 2015

Despite Donald Trump's assertion that the crowd at his Saturday campaign event in Phoenix was the largest of any presidential candidate so far in the race, all other estimates put the number of attendees significantly below what the Trump campaign said.

The campaign moved the rally from the Arizona Biltmore hotel to the Phoenix Convention Center to allow more people to attend. When Trump arrived at the podium, he claimed the crowd was larger than those at Sen. Bernie Sanders' (I-Vt.) presidential campaign events.

"This blows away anything Bernie Sanders has gotten," Trump said.

By comparison, Sanders' largest crowd was 10,000 in Madison, Wisconsin.

In a tweet, which has since been deleted, Trump said he was "[s]peaking to 20,000+ patriots in Arizona." A post on his Facebook page claimed 15,000. After the event, a campaign press release also had the crowd at 15,000 and called the event "the largest campaign event of any presidential candidate this cycle."

But the Washington Post report on Trump's event put the audience at 4,200 individuals, less than a third the size of Trump's estimate. The Phoenix Fire Department said the crowd was capped at that number in accordance with the fire code for the ballroom.

Trump, who is now leading opinion polls in the Republican presidential primary race, has a theory on why no one agrees with his estimates.

This isn't the first time Trump's crowds have come under question. After his announcement speech last month, a Hollywood Reporter article said Trump paid audience members $50 to cheer for him.

Donald Trump’s ‘Miss USA’ Pageant Earns Record-Low Ratings // HuffPo // Gabriel Arana – July 15, 2015

Donald Trump’s "Miss USA" pageant has set a record -- but, uh, not a very good one.

The show, which networks Univision and NBC recently dropped after the Republican presidential candidate decided to stake out a position about Mexican immigrants being rapists, garnered its lowest ratings ever after airing on the little-known Reelz channel on Sunday.

A mere 925,000 people tuned in to the pageant, according to the ratings agency Nielsen. For Reelz, which reaches less than 60 percent of TV-watching homes, that's actually a pretty good number. But it’s a far cry from the roughly 5.5 million viewers who tuned in to the pageant on NBC last year. It's even a major step down from 2013, when the show’s viewership reached a then-record low of 4.6 million people.

Trump, who is currently kicking up dust on the Republican primary field, has sued Univision for $500 million for dropping the show.

The larger question here, as The Onion recently pointed out, is why, nearly a century after women won the right to vote, we still have these pageants where they're paraded around like farm animals at an auction -- and why any network would be willing to air them.

That Time Im 1988 Trump Told Oprah What Was Wrong With America’s Foreign Policy // BuzzFeed // Ilan Ben-Meir – July 15, 2015

In the final months of Ronald Reagan’s presidency, Donald Trump appeared on The Oprah Winfrey Show to discuss the advertisement criticizing U.S. foreign policy that he spent nearly $100,000 to place in three major newspapers the previous fall — and the possibility that he might run for president, himself.

Trump told Winfrey in April of 1988 that he was "tired of seeing what's happening with this country," and said that America was supporting its foreign allies at the expense of its own citizens' well-being.

Winfrey began by asking Trump about the "open letter" to the American public that he had paid to place in the New York Times, Washington Post, and Boston Globe a few months before, at a time when some were speculating that Trump was planning to enter the race for the Republican nomination to succeed Reagan in 1988.

Trump's advertisement was a sharp critique of American foreign policy, including the claim that "[t]he world is laughing at America's politicians as we protect ships we don't own, carrying oil we don't need, destined for allies who won't help."

After Winfrey pointed to the advertisement to ask what Trump would "do differently," the tycoon reiterated many of the arguments contained in the letter, telling Winfrey that he would "make our allies pay their fair share."

"We're a debtor nation," Trump said. "Something's going to happen over the next number of years with this country, 'cause you can't keep going on losing 200 billion."
Trump argueed that the Japanese "are beating the hell out of this country," because "[t]hey come over here, they sell their cars, their VCRs, they knock the hell out of our companies" — all while taking advantage of American largesse.

The solution, he suggested, was to require countries like Japan and Kuwait to pay the United States for it's ongoing support.

When Winfrey asked Trump if he would consider a run for the White House, the billionaire said he "probably" wouldn't do it.

"I just probably wouldn't do it, Oprah," said Trump, "I just don't think I really have the inclination to do it. I love what I'm doing, I really like it."

"But I do get tired of seeing what's happening with this country," Trump continued. "And if it got so bad, I would never want to rule it out totally, because I really am tired of seeing what's happening with this country — how we're really making other people live like kings, and we're not."

Trump offered praise for all three of the major candidates in the race.

"I think that probably George Bush has an advantage, in terms of the election," said Trump. "But I think Jesse Jackson's done himself very proud, I think Michael Dukakis has done one hell of a job. [...] I think people that are around all three of those candidates can be very proud of the jobs they've done."

Asked by Winfrey if he believed he could win, Trump said he "would have a hell of a chance."

"I would say that I would have a hell of a chance of winning, because I think people — I don't know how your audience feels — but I think people are tired of seeing the United States ripped off," Trump argued, promising that if he were in charge, "[t]his country would make one hell of a lot of money from those people that for twenty-five years have taken advantage" of the United States.

Trump concluded by insisting that he would abandon an unacceptable status quo.
In Donald Trump's America "[i]t wouldn't be the way it's been," Trump declared. "Believe me."

Trump To USA: Look How Rich I Am! // Daily Beast // Olivia Nuzzi – July 14, 2015

On Wednesday, Republican frontrunner Donald Trump announced in a press release that he was too rich for the Federal Election Commission forms but he filed them anyway.

"This report was not designed for a man of Mr. Trump's massive wealth," the release began, lest you had forgotten that Trump is, in his own words, "really rich."

"For instance," the release helpfully explained, "they have boxes once a certain number is reached that simply state $50 million or more. Many of these boxes have been checked. As an example, if a building owned by Mr. Trump is worth $1.5 billion, the box checked is '$50,000,000 or more."

Prior to his campaign, pundit wisdom surrounding Trump was that he would never really run for office because if he did, it would mean admitting he wasn't as rich as he said he was. That was why, it was believed, he'd chickened out of formally announcing for close to twenty years.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But, according to the press release, the pundits were wrong.

The financial disclosure is not yet available from the FEC, but Trump claims his net worth "is in excess of TEN BILLION DOLLARS." (Caps his, of course).

He also claims that in 2014 he made "$362 million (which does to include dividends, interest, capital gains, rents and royalties)."

Trump's compulsory declarations of wealth are his defining characteristic.

During his June 16 announcement, he made sure to clarify "I'm really rich."

"Now I have surged in the polls and am fighting to Make America Great Again. I look forward to the challenge of winning the presidency and doing a fantastic job for our country."
In total, he uttered the words "rich," "money" and "net worth" 30 times in 45 minutes. He also claimed his exact net worth was $8,737,540,000.

Trump, whose corporations have filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy over 10 times, is highly sensitive to accusations that he is not as wealthy as he claims.

In 2006, when Trump claimed to be worth $2.7 billion, he sued Timothy L. O'Brien, author of TrumpNation: The Art of Being the Donald and its publisher, Warner Books, for saying Trump was worth $150 million to $250 million. The suit was dismissed.

In 2011, when MSNBC's Lawrence O'Donnell mocked Trump by suggesting he was worth fewer than $1 billion, Trump responded on Twitter by threatening a lawsuit and claiming to be worth "substantially more than 7 billion dollars" with "very low debt, great assets."

In an interview with The Daily Beast about the downfall of Atlantic City in 2014, Trump declared, without prompting, "I made a lot of money in Atlantic City" over half a dozen times—five of which made their way into print. At one point, he said, "I hope you can say in your article that Mr. Trump sold out a long time ago and did well. I made a lot of money."

Having defied expectations, the tone of Trump's release was jovial.

"First people said I would never run, and I did," he said in a statement. "Then, they said, I would never file my statement of candidacy with the FEC, and I did. Next they said I would never file my personal financial disclosure forms. I filed them early despite the fact that I am allowed two 45 day extensions. Now I have surged in the polls and am fighting to Make America Great Again. I look forward to the challenge of winning the presidency and doing a fantastic job for our country. I will make the United States rich and strong and respected again, but also a country with a 'big heart' toward the care of our people."

GOP Gives Up on 'Dump Trump' // Daily Beast // Tim Mak – July 15, 2015

Republican grief over Donald Trump's all but assured presence on the debate stage next month seems to be entering it's final stage: acceptance.

Whether it's the winery-owning mega donor, or the Koch-backed Hispanic outreach group or the former head of the American Conservative Union, there is a distaste for the abrasive reality television star and businessman.

But although there was preliminary chatter about finding a way to marginalize Trump or keep him off the debate stage in Cleveland, Ohio, the unhappiness with his recent insulting comments about Hispanics has yielded to mere condemnation and an unhappy acquiescence to his presence in the race.

"They're bringing drugs. They're bringing crime. They're rapists. And some, I assume, are good people," Trump said recently.

John Jordan, the multi-millionaire winery owner and the third largest donor to super PACs in the country in 2013, had originally contemplated gathering signatures to keep Trump off the debate stage.

"Someone in the party ought to start some sort of petition saying, 'If Trump's going to be on the stage, I'm not going to be on there with him,'" Jordan told the Associated Press last week. "I'm toying with the idea of it."

But several days later, Jordan was thinking differently. He told The Daily Beast that he would not be putting together a petition effort.

"I'm content right to let the process play out, that is for the party and the candidates to figure out," Jordan said. "I have one concern, and one concern only, and that is next November. I want to make sure that the nominee has the possible chance to win."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"He's a lunatic, but we've had other lunatics run for president. The problem is not that he's on stage—it's if you don't respond and rebuke him," Alfonso Aguilar said.
Al Cardenas, the former chairman of the American Conservative Union and Florida's first Hispanic GOP state chairman, said he hoped the primary process would naturally weed out Trump's candidacy, rather than a top-down effort to push Trump out.

"[A]s distasteful as his comments have been to me, we should let the process play out. Hopefully, it's the rejection by the voters, not a group of party leaders ,that should determine his fate as a presidential candidate," Cardenas said. "I respect the feelings of a number of our colleagues who feel differently—and strongly—about this and argue that his continuation in the race is detrimental to our party and to our brand. And they may be right, but the end does not justify the means in this case."

"It's a mild form of censorship to say that because we disagree with his tone or comments about the immigrant community, [he] should leave the race," added Daniel Garza of the Koch-backed Libre Initiative, which seeks to appeal to Hispanic voters. "You allow him to mouth off… He has the right to speak, and we have the right to disagree with him… calls to have him leave the race are ludicrous."

Alfonso Aguilar, the head of the conservative American Principles Project's Latino Partnership, views Trump's "insulting and baseless" comments as creating pressure on other presidential candidates to step up their Hispanic outreach.

"Instead of seeing him as a problem, I see it as an opportunity—but one that requires strong leadership," he told the Beast. "He's a lunatic, but we've had other lunatics run for president. The problem is not that he's on stage—it's if you don't respond and rebuke him."

"He has shaken up the primary in a way that might not be welcome. But now that you have it, if you're smart and astute, maybe you can use it in your favor," agreed Garza. "Obviously you have to draw the contrast. If Donald Trump is showing how not to do Latino outreach, you show the way to do it effective."

As for the Republican National Committee, it wants no part in any effort to sideline Trump. RNC Chairman Reince Priebus had called Trump to preach civility after the businessman's controversial comments—then got mired into a he-said, he-said with the Donald over the contents of the call.

Asked about whether Republicans or big-dollar donors were making an effort to keep Trump off the debate stage, an RNC official merely said that, per Federal Election Commission guidelines, the networks and debate sponsors were responsible for setting up the guidelines for the presidential debates.
Meanwhile, a small plurality of Republican voters are favoring Trump. In a USA Today/Suffolk University poll released this week, Trump leads the field with 17%. Former Florida governor Jeb Bush is close behind him with 14%.

Two polls out last week showed him leading the field of Republican 2016 candidates, receiving 15 percent in a Economist/YouGov poll and 16 percent in a PPP poll.

Aguila, who was in Arizona to counter-message an event Trump was having with Maricopa County Sheriff Joe Arpaio, said the key to convincing Republican primary voters to steer clear of Trump, was to point out the businessman's prior positions like Trump's praise of Bill Clinton and his donation to the Clinton Foundation.

"Before he was friends with Hillary, now he's friends with Joe Arpaio," he said. "Are you really sure he's conservative?"

Donald Trump Claims $10 Billion Net Worth After Filing Election Forms // TIME // Zeke J. Miller – July 15, 2015

Business mogul Donald Trump claimed a personal net worth of over $10 billion after filing a personal financial disclosure form with the Federal Election Commission, a key procedural hurdle for his presidential campaign.

The filing clears the way for Trump to appear on the first GOP debate stage on Aug. 6 in Cleveland, and comes as he has risen to the top of polls of Republican voters. Trump reported earning more than $362 million in 2014, according to his campaign — dwarfing the rest of the GOP field's net worth by a significant margin.

In typical Trump fashion, the campaign released a statement full of braggadocio to commemorate the occasion.

"This report was not designed for a man of Mr. Trump's massive wealth," his campaign said "For instance, they have boxes once a certain number is reached that simply state $50 million or more. Many of these boxes have been checked. As an example, if a building owned by Mr. Trump is worth $1.5 billion, the box checked is "$50,000,000 or more."

The filing reportedly shows that Trump is affiliated with nearly "500 business entities of which 91% are owned 100% by him." According to his campaign, he earned $213,606,575 during the 14 seasons of The Apprentice, the NBC reality show which was renewed in May without Trump's participation.

Last month, Trump filed a preliminary financial statement claiming a net worth of about $8.7 billion.

"Mr. Trump's net worth has increased since the more than one year old financial statement produced at his presidential announcement," his campaign said. "Real estate values in New York City, San Francisco, Miami and many other places where he owns property have gone up considerably during this period of time. His debt is a very small percentage of value, and at very low interest rates. As of this date, Mr. Trump's net worth is in excess of TEN BILLION DOLLARS." (Emphasis theirs.)

In a statement, Trump needled those who said he would never file the official forms, which must be certified by the candidate as "true, complete and correct to the best of [their] knowledge."

"First people said I would never run, and I did," Trump said. "Then, they said, I would never file my statement of candidacy with the FEC, and I did. Next, they said I would never file my personal financial disclosure forms. I filed them early despite the fact that I am allowed two 45 days extensions. Now I have surged in the polls and am fighting to Make America Great Again. I look forward to the challenge of winning the presidency and doing a fantastic job for our country. I will make the United States rich and strong and respected again, but also a country with a 'big heart' toward the care of our people."

Heat on GOP Candidates Paul, Rubio to Derail Iran Pact // Real Clear Politics // Caitlin Huey-Burns and Rebecca Berg – July 14, 2015

As the Obama administration and most Democrats celebrated a nuclear deal with Iran as a historic achievement, Republicans running for president uniformly denounced it as a historic failure.

The swift opposition was expected; it's become something of a rallying cry on the campaign trail as part of slamming the administration's foreign policy and, by virtue, Hillary Clinton's, as weak and caving. But the formalized terms place a spotlight on the presidential pool's contenders from the U.S. Senate, particularly Rand Paul and Marco Rubio, whose hopes of standing apart from a crowded field rest in part on their foreign policy bona fides.

The freshmen senators both sit on the Foreign Relations Committee, which will take the first crack at the Iran deal, and have publicly sparred over their differences in this arena, most notably over the administration's thawing of relations with Cuba. Paul, the libertarian from Kentucky, has focused more on domestic policy issues like government surveillance and privacy, but has also mostly maintained a more anti-interventionist view. Rubio, from Florida, has taken an approach to foreign policy that has been among the most hawkish in the GOP field.

In a sign of how politically untenable support for this particular deal is in this Republican primary, the two senators came out on the same side on this issue.

"It will be very hard for the GOP candidates to support this deal and still argue they are tough on national security," said Danielle Pletka, senior vice president for foreign and defense policy studies at the American Enterprise Institute. "It is not simply that Hillary Clinton's resume is foreign policy heavy -- it is the fact that this president will bequeath a world in such disorder that any pretense of comfort with the world Barack Obama built will be viewed by voters as an abdication of leadership."

While Paul has said he would be open to diplomacy with Iran regarding its nuclear capabilities instead of waging war, he ultimately opposed the deal that will come soon before Congress for review. But he was not as quick with a response as his rivals.

In a statement, Paul argued that sanctions would expire before evidence of compliance and that it still leaves Iran with significant nuclear capability. Additionally, Paul said, the agreement will lift an arms embargo with Iran (the administration argues that the ban will remain for the next five years).

"While I continue to believe that negotiations are preferable to war, I would prefer to keep the interim agreement in place instead of accepting a bad deal," Paul said, noting he would vote against it.

For Rubio, who has staunchly opposed an agreement with Iran from the start, the deal presents an opportunity to further elevate rhetoric he has embraced on the campaign trail for months.

In March, Rubio was among 47 Republican senators, along with Paul, who signed an open letter to Iranian leaders noting that “the next president could revoke … an executive agreement with the stroke of a pen.” That same month, during a political event in New Hampshire, Rubio suggested that the proliferation of Iranian weapons might even warrant military intervention by the U.S.

“We may have to decide at some point what is worse: a military strike against Iran or a nuclear-armed Iran,” Rubio said, according to a Politico report at the time. “I am not cheerleading for war. I don’t want there to be the need to use military force, but a nuclear Iran is an unacceptable risk for the region and the world.”

On Tuesday, Rubio indicated in a statement that he would undo the agreement with Iran if he were elected president.

“It will then be left to the next president to return us to a position of American strength and re-impose sanctions on this despicable regime until it is truly willing to abandon its nuclear ambitions and is no longer a threat to international security,” Rubio said.

And, almost immediately, Rubio’s political network sprang into action to capitalize on the deal. An ad released Tuesday by a nonprofit group supporting Rubio for president said he “is leading the fight” in the Senate against the deal with Iran, and pressed people to urge their senators to ”join Marco Rubio and defeat Obama’s deal with Iran.

In large field of candidates, a rivalry has emerged between executive-minded governors and legislatively experienced senators. The difference becomes especially relevant, the senators argue, when it comes to foreign policy, as congressional lawmakers have more intimate knowledge and experience with classified information and international affairs.

While the GOP field is largely united around foreign policy — with Rand Paul as an outlier — the nuances lie in style and past experiences.

South Carolina Sen. Lindsey Graham has also made his foreign affairs experience a centerpiece of his campaign. He came out in perhaps the starkest of terms against the Iran deal in various cable news interviews on Tuesday, calling it “the most dangerous and irresponsible step I’ve ever seen” and one that would ensure that Iran becomes “a nuclear nation.” Graham said he fears “that we’ve set in motion a decade of chaos.”

Texas Sen. Ted Cruz also vehemently condemned the deal that he argued “legitimized” Iran’s nuclear program, taking special objection to the fact that the negotiations did not bring about the release of three American captives held in Iran.

“We owe it to our fellow Americans to elevate, not ignore, their plight, to demand their swift and unconditional release by the implacably hostile regime that holds them,” Cruz said in a statement.

Relative to the former and sitting governors running for president, Republican senators will be able to more directly affect the party’s path forward on this issue from their perch on Capitol Hill. That might lend some advantages, but also adds the responsibility of potentially presenting some legislative alternative to the agreement with Iran.

“Your Iran policy can’t just be issuing the most hyperbolic press release,” said Tommy Vietor, a former spokesman for the president on national security. “If you disagree, you need to propose a viable alternative that can unite the international community the way Obama has and actually move us closer to preventing Iran from developing a nuclear weapon.”

Vietor added, “I haven’t heard any of these guys articulate a viable alternative.”

On the Democratic side, Bernie Sanders, the Vermont senator challenging Hillary Clinton for the nomination, called the deal “a victory for diplomacy over saber-rattling.” He said it “could keep the United States from being drawn into another never-ending war in the Middle East.”

Sanders crossed paths with Clinton on Tuesday as she spent the day on Capitol Hill meeting with Democrats, with a special focus on Iran. For her part, Clinton, who worked to bring the negotiations about as secretary of state, called the agreement “an important step in putting the lid on Iran’s nuclear program.” Clinton, who will play a key role in persuading lawmakers to support the agreement, also said the deal will enable the United States in further negotiations over Iran’s other “bad actions,” including the detainment of American citizens, threats to Israel, and state-sponsored terrorism.

Lawmakers have 60 days to review the agreement before voting on it. With Republicans opposed and a handful of Democrats with constituent ties to Israeli interests skeptical of the accord, the president will have to work to win over his party and get enough support to sustain a veto if need be.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

President Obama will make a public address on Wednesday about the Iran deal, while Vice President Joe Biden will go to Capitol Hill to discuss the agreement with Democratic lawmakers. Administration officials warned that stepping away from the accord would only unravel the sanctions placed on Iran: “A vote to kill this deal could potentially be a vote to kill the sanctions regime.”

Trump Swears He’s Not Running For President As A Democratic Plant // TPM // Catherine Thompson – July 15, 2015

Real estate mogul Donald Trump on Wednesday brushed off speculation that the Democratic Party orchestrated his presidential run to disrupt the GOP primary process.

Rep. Carlos Curbelo (R-FL) said in a recent local radio interview that he thought there was a "small possibility" Trump could be a Democratic plant in the Republican presidential field.

"I think there's a small possibility that this gentleman is a phantom candidate," Curbelo said, as quoted by The Miami Herald. "Mr. Trump has a close friendship with Bill and Hillary Clinton. They were at his last wedding. He has contributed to the Clintons' foundation. He has contributed to Mrs. Clinton's Senate campaigns. All of this is very suspicious."

Trump shot down that theory on Fox News' "Fox & Friends."

"Believe me -- from Hillary's standpoint, the one person she doesn't want running against her is Donald Trump," he said of the Democratic presidential frontrunner.

The former reality TV star argued that contributing to the Clintons and others was just the price of doing business prior to entering the political arena.

"I'm a businessman. I contribute to everybody," Trump said. "When I needed Hillary, she was there. If I say 'go to my wedding,' they go to my wedding."

In his presidential announcement speech, Trump had emphasized his ability to self-fund his campaign and eschew donors.

"That's part of the problem with our system," he said on "Fox & Friends." "They're going to do for me and all their donors things that aren't necessarily good for the country, but that are good for their donors."

Republican Voters Like Trump More Than Boehner, McConnell // Morning Consult // Reid Wilson – July 15, 2015

Republican voters have a higher opinion of billionaire real estate magnate Donald Trump than they do of their party leaders in Congress, according to a new Morning Consult survey.

Forty-nine percent of self-described Republican voters said they view Trump favorably, higher than the 36 percent who have a favorable view of House Speaker John Boehner and the 31 percent who said they see Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell in a favorable light.

But Trump’s favorable ratings have actually slipped in the month since he announced he is running for president — both among Republican voters and the electorate as a whole. In an early June survey, 54 percent of Republican voters said they viewed Trump favorably, five points higher than his rating today.

And the number of those who see Trump in a very unfavorable light has spiked, from 14 percent of Republicans in June to 26 percent today. The number of registered voters who view him unfavorably is also up considerably, from 34 percent a month ago to 46 percent today.

Still, Trump is running high among Republican primary voters. A new Suffolk poll conducted for USA Today show he leads the Republican field with 17 percent. The Morning Consult poll also showed Trump as the top choice of 17 percent of Republican primary voters, up from 5 percent the previous month, though running second behind former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush (R), who took 19 percent.

Bush and Trump run far ahead of the rest of the Republican field, in which no other candidate tops 10 percent. Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) finishes a distant third, at 9 percent, just ahead of Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.), at 8 percent. Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker (R) clocks in at 7 percent, with New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie (R), Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas) and former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee (R) clustered at 6 percent. Thirteen percent of the 762 Republican voters surveyed said they didn’t know who they would support.

While Trump’s presidential candidacy has led the national news for weeks, Boehner and McConnell have gone about their work more quietly. Consequently, fewer Americans have formed an opinion about the two most powerful men in Congress.

Among all registered voters, Boehner's favorable rating sits at just 23 percent, while 48 percent view him unfavorably. Even among Republicans, 31 percent don't know enough about the three-term speaker to have formed an opinion.

McConnell, who took over as Majority Leader after Republicans won control of the Senate last year, is even less well-known. Just 19 percent see him favorably, while 39 percent see him unfavorably, and 41 percent of voters – including 44 percent of self-identified Republicans – don't know enough about him to form an opinion.

The Morning Consult survey polled 2,019 registered voters between July 8-13, for a margin of error of plus or minus 2 percent.

Paul Singer, Top Republican Donor, Is Still on the Sidelines // NYT // Alexandra Stevenson – July 15, 2015

The billionaire Paul E. Singer, one of the most sought-after donors in the Republican Party, said Wednesday that he was not committed to any political candidate yet.

Speaking at hedge fund conference in Manhattan, Mr. Singer said he was "not on the verge of committing to anyone," adding that he liked several candidates, including Senator Marco Rubio and former Gov Jeb Bush, both from Florida, and Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin, who formally announced his presidential campaign on Monday.

Mr. Singer also added, "We like Carly Fiorina, as well."

In recent months, Mr. Singer, founder of the $26 billion investment firm Elliott Management, has held a series of dinners to introduce associates to the vast array of Republican candidates.

Candidate Forum Planned in New Hampshire Before First Republican Debate // NYT // Alan Rappeport – July 15, 2015

Local news outlets in states with early primaries are teaming up to hold a Republican candidate forum in early August amid complaints that subsequent full-fledged debates are excluding candidates based merely on polling.

The New Hampshire Union Leader, along with news organizations in Iowa and South Carolina and C-Span, are sponsoring a candidate forum in Manchester, N.H., on Aug. 3. The forum, which will give each candidate five minutes to respond to questions, would come before the Aug. 6 debate hosted by Fox News, which is limiting the stage to the 10 Republicans leading in recent national polls.

"Fox says only the 'top' 10 candidates, as judged solely by national polling, will be allowed on its stage," the news organizations said in a joint statement. "That may be understandable later, but the first votes are half a year away and there are a lot more than 10 viable candidates."

The forum is not technically a debate but is expected to give candidates an opportunity to stand next to one another on stage and spontaneously answer questions.

With 15 Republican candidates currently announced, television networks and the Republican National Committee have been fearful that early debates will become chaotic unless participation is limited. However, lower-tier candidates worry that they will not have the chance to showcase themselves if they are shut out from competing so early in the election cycle.

So far Gov. Chris Christie of New Jersey; Ben Carson; Senator Ted Cruz of Texas; Gov. Bobby Jindal of Louisiana; Carly Fiorina; Senator Lindsey Graham of South Carolina; Gov. John Kasich of Ohio; and former Gov. George Pataki of New York have agreed to attend the forum. Representatives for Senator Marco Rubio of Florida and Senator Rand Paul of Kentucky said they did not yet know if they could make it.

Allison Moore, a spokeswoman for the R.N.C., said the party was allowing the forum because the candidates would be speaking one at a time.

Sniping Intensifies Between Donald Trump and Jeb Bush // NYT // Alan Rappeport – July 15, 2015

Donald J. Trump and former Gov. Jeb Bush have been deadlocked in recent polls and sniping between the two Republican presidential candidates is getting increasingly personal.

Mr. Trump said on Wednesday that the former Florida governor lacks energy and will not deliver on his promises because he is beholden to the big donors who are filling his campaign war chest.

“Somebody that’s reliant on all of these lobbyists and special interests and donors, they have no power,” Mr. Trump said on MSNBC’s “Morning Joe.”

He added, “The $100 million that he raised is a bad thing, not a good thing.”

Mr. Bush is leading the crowded Republican field in fund-raising so far, and Mr. Trump, a billionaire businessman, argues that his personal wealth empowers him as a candidate. He also said that he will file the required personal financial disclosure forms on Wednesday or Thursday.

“Every single person is expecting something for that money and that’s not good for the country,” Mr. Trump said of Mr. Bush. “That means you can’t make deals that are good for the country.”

Mr. Bush has taken issue with Mr. Trump’s comments in recent weeks, particularly his remarks that undocumented immigrants from Mexico are criminals and “rapists.” Mr. Bush also took offense to Mr. Trump’s suggestion that he has an affinity for Mexicans because his wife is Mexican-American.

“A Republican will never win by striking fear in people’s hearts,” Mr. Bush said in Iowa on Tuesday, suggesting that his rival was preying on people’s angst.

Mr. Trump continues to stand by his remarks, but said that they have been distorted and blown out of proportion. He vowed again on Wednesday that he will win the Hispanic vote because he employs thousands of them and knows how to create jobs.

“The Hispanics love me,” he said.

Trump, Carson, and Santorum burn through campaign cash fastest // WaPo // Tom Hamburger and Anu Narayanswamy – July 15, 2015

The so-called burn rate -- comparing money raised with money spent -- showed Trump in the lead, spending 74 percent of the campaign funds he has raised so far in his official campaign account. The New York real estate and entertainment magnate is running ahead of other candidates in recent polls.

Carson, the Baltimore neurosurgeon, burned through 64 percent of the money he has raised to date, putting him close to Rick Santorum, who had a 62 percent burn rate, according to numbers filed Wednesday with the Federal Election Commission.

Trump spent heavily on travel and staff, including more than $506,486 on private jet services. In total, Trump's campaign reported spending about $1.5 million dollars as of June 30 from his mostly self-funded campaign.

Typically candidates hold on to the funds they raise early in a campaign. But this year there is enormous pressure on candidates to maintain visibility and credibility in an unusually crowded GOP field.

Despite Trump's recent rise in polls, burn rate is not necessarily an indication of success. Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, who also ranks at the top of recent polls, reported a burn rate of 27 percent.

The Bush campaign spent slightly more than $3 million in the two weeks after Bush announced his campaign in mid-June, primarily on operational fees, including around $400,000 on legal consulting fees. Expenditure reports showed large payments went to political consultants, including more than $350,000 to FP1 Strategies, the firm founded by Bush campaign manager Danny Diaz. Senior adviser Sally Bradshaw was paid $25,550, including $13,300 for her work while Bush was “testing the waters.”

Bush, who touted support for Uber in face of warnings from Hillary Clinton about economic questions raised by the "sharing economy," spent $1,396 on Uber rides.

Hillary Clinton's filing revealed a burn rate of 39 percent compared with 20 percent for her nearest challenger, Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders.
Clinton, who raised the largest sums of any official campaign, was quick to start spending money. Her committee raced through nearly $19 million in less than three months, even before beginning expensive TV buys. Millions went to hire hundreds of staffers, a sign of how rapidly it has sought to ramp up a national infrastructure.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A quick review of spending by Carson and Santorum showed that the three were spending a lot on fundraising efforts.

This spending appears to have paid off in one way way for Carson, who reported a large number of small donors. All told, Carson received $5.7 million from donors contributing less than $250 each. His high proportion of small donors was exceeded only by by Sanders, whose small-donation haul topped $10.4 million, about 68 percent of his entire campaign receipts. Overall, Sanders reports show a burn rate of 20 percent.

Another GOP candidate, former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, collected a little more than $2 million this cycle, and spent $1.1 million, giving him a burn rate of 56 percent.

Huckabee's spending for his 2016 run so far includes consulting fees and salaries for a lot of familiar names from his 2008 bid. Other than the campaign's American Express bills, Huckabee paid the Wickers firm, where his son-in-law Bryan Sanders is a partner, the biggest single check: $55,586 for media consultant services.

Firm CEO Bob Wickers is Huckabee's political and media consultant. Huckabee's daughter, Sarah Huckabee Sanders, is managing her father's campaign this time around. She advised Tom Cotton in his winning Senate campaign last year and managed John Boozman's 2010 Senate bid against incumbent Blanche Lincoln.

Another sizable payment went to the Political Law Group, Doug Chalmer's political law firm in Georgia, which received $52,773. Next came Unisource Direct, a Wisconsin firm, which collected $39, 459 for direct mail services. The campaign also wrote checks totaling $20,107 to J. Hogan Gidley and $18,524 to Alice Tadlock, both of whom worked on Huckabee's 2008 campaign and are leaders in Huckabee's 2016 communications strategy. Gidley also directed HUCK PAC, Huckabee's political action committee.

Huckabee's close rival for support from Christian conservatives, Texas Sen. Ted Cruz, was behind Huckabee in his rate of spending with a burn rate of 54 percent.

Rubio, who filed late in the evening Wednesday, showed a burn rate of 35 percent and a hefty total of $9.9 million cash on hand.

As Jindal and Huckabee struggle with fundraising, super PACs bolster tallies // WaPo // Jose A. DelReal – July 15, 2015

Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal's campaign raised just $579,000 in the second quarter, according to a Federal Election Commission filing submitted Wednesday, an underwhelming campaign finance report that in past elections would have seriously called into question his ability to finance a national campaign.

But that meager sum is bolstered by more than $8.7 million raised by his allied outside groups this year – including a super PAC and a political nonprofit organization – which dwarfed his campaign's fundraising tally while highlighting the disproportionate role allied campaign committees are already playing in the 2016 election.

So it goes in the 2016 election: with bottom-tier candidates struggling to fundraise among broad bases of voters, astronomical super PAC hauls can prop up candidates as they find their footing in an exceptionally crowded 2016 presidential field. And the campaigns and their allies have gladly publicized those numbers alongside each other -- either through closely staggered media disclosures or blatantly coordinated press releases -- to demonstrate they have the money they need to compete.

Jindal's fundraising is particularly striking: his allied super PAC raised $3.7 million throughout 2015, according to a report published Wednesday by the Washington Examiner. In addition to that sum, an allied political nonprofit – classified as a tax-exempt 501(c)4 by the IRS -- raised an additional $4 million. Yet another group, American Future Project, a 527 political committee, raised an additional $1 million.

That brings the governor's war chest to more than $9 million, of which about 5 percent actually came from official campaign. His allies' decision to release the numbers at the same time serves the goal of silencing criticism over his fundraising power.

That approach has become the strategy du jour for campaigns. Former Texas governor Rick Perry last week reported raising $1 million around the same time his super PAC disclosed it had released $17 million. And it's not just back-of-the-pack candidates; financial frontrunner Jeb Bush's campaign and super PAC released their tallies on the same day, prompting stories about his unprecedented $114 million haul that combined both sets of numbers.

The coordinated release of fundraising records has raised eyebrows among campaign finance watchdogs but does not necessarily indicate any wrongdoing. Although super PACs -- which can accept unlimited sums of money -- are legally barred from coordinating on strategy with campaign officials, they are not specifically prevented from communicating directly. In that sense, conversations between outside groups and official campaign advisers frequently fall into grey zones that even legal experts disagree over. The 2016 is in that sense the wild west on campaign finance reform, with campaigns and outside groups continually pushing the boundaries of what is appropriate and what is questionable.

Consider former Arkansas governor Mike Huckabee, whose advisors on Tuesday night released the campaign's total contributions alongside tallies for several outside groups, which also included a super PAC and a political nonprofit. That moved Huckabee's fundraising tally from $2 million to a significantly more robust $8 million.

The key importance super PACs are playing this cycle has run amok of laws that prohibit coordination between campaign committees and super PACs in other areas. The Post's Matea Gold reported some examples last week:

Before former Florida governor Jeb Bush (R) announced his bid in mid-June, the Right to Rise super PAC filmed footage of him that the group plans to use in ads. Hillary Rodham Clinton's campaign is collaborating directly with Correct the Record, a super PAC providing the Democratic hopeful's team with opposition research.

Top advisers to Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker (R) have been positioned at two big-money groups as they await his presidential announcement next week. GOP candidate Carly Fiorina has gone even further, outsourcing core functions such as rapid response and event preparation to her allied super PAC, the aptly named CARLY for America.

As Matea noted last week: It's bold, but it's legal.

2016 fundraising shows power tilting to groups backed by wealthy elite // WaPo // Matea Gold – July 15, 2015

A small cadre of super-wealthy Americans are dominating the fundraising for the 2016 Republican presidential nominating contest, doling out huge sums to independent groups that overwhelm total contributions to the candidates.

Nearly $4 of every $5 raised so far on behalf of GOP White House contenders has gone to independent groups rather than the official campaigns. Outside groups have already amassed more than $235 million — more than four times the $60 million raised collectively by the Republican field through June 30, according to reports filed Wednesday with the Federal Election Commission.

So far, the dynamic is different on the Democratic side, with 80 percent of the nearly $78 million raised so far to support Hillary Rodham Clinton and her competitors flowing to their campaigns.

The lopsided war chests on the right underscore how the financing of political campaigns has been fundamentally rewired in the five years since federal courts loosened restrictions on political spending by corporations and rich individuals.

Those decisions triggered a rush of big donations and political operatives to independent groups that can accept unlimited donations, a trend that has dramatically accelerated this year. This election cycle has already seen bolder collaboration between super PACs and campaigns than previous races, as well as a proliferation of nonprofit groups aligned with individual candidates.

The 2016 elections are now poised to mark a tipping point: the first time outside groups outstrip the clout and resources of many campaigns.

"It's pretty clear that the super PACs are playing an unprecedented role," said Michael Malbin, executive director of the nonpartisan Campaign Finance Institute, which tracks political contributions.

"This whole development to me is staggering," he said. "You're in a fundamentally different system than 12 years ago or eight years ago."

The huge pack of well-funded independent groups flanking the Republican candidates has fueled anxiety among party elders that the GOP is in for a drawn-out, bloody primary fight — one that could possibly roll into the nominating convention in July.

"It could end up with the Republican vote split up in a lot of different ways," said Ron Weiser, a former finance chairman of the Republican National Committee, who is neutral in the 2016 race. "No one is going to go away if they have a lot of money in their super PAC."

"There are people who are concerned that this could end up a long and very extensive primary that could allow the opponent to gain substantial advantage," Weiser added.

Former Florida governor Jeb Bush is far aheada of his rivals in the money race with $119.4 million raised by various entities supporting his bid. In second place, Sen. Ted Cruz is being bolstered by $51.2 million raised by his campaign and aligned super PACs, while supporters of Sen. Marco Rubio have donated $45 million between his campaign, a super PAC and a nonprofit.

Strip away their outside allies and the top contenders are more evenly matched. Cruz, who jumped in the race first in late March, has raised $14.2 million for his campaign. Rubio pulled in about $12 million, while Bush collected $11.4 million in just two weeks as a declared candidate. Retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson is not far behind, with $10.5 million.

Even longer-shot candidates are able to tout big fundraising hauls by their outside allies. Former Texas governor Rick Perry raised just $1 million for his campaign, but has generated more than $16 million in super PAC money, largely from three wealthy backers. The biggest sum came from his campaign finance chair, oil pipeline executive Kelcy Warren, who donated $6 million.

Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal, who pulled less than $600,000 during his first official week as a candidate, will benefit from three different groups — a super PAC and two nonprofits — that have collected more than $8 million so far.

Brad Todd, the GOP strategist running the pro-Jindal Believe Again super PAC, said an expanding universe of donors has helped fuel the big takes.

"It used to be that once you went through the Bush ambassador list, you were at the end of the rainbow," he said. "But there are people who are very engaged in this presidential contest who were never a Ranger or a Pioneer," the titles given top bundlers for former president George W. Bush.

The biggest campaign haul in the second quarter was by Clinton, who pulled in $45 million in 2-1/2 months. Priorities USA Action, a super PAC backing her, raised another $15.6 million.

One of her challengers for the Democratic nomination, Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont, also posted a strong showing, raising $15.3 million — the vast majority from small donors who gave less than $200.

But other contenders on the left lagged behind. Former Maryland governor Martin O'Malley announced he pulled in $2 million, while former Rhode Island senator and governor Lincoln Chafee reported that he had raised just $30,000 from donors, in addition to lending his campaign $364,000.

Several contenders — including Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker and New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie — declared their runs after the close of the last quarter, so will not file their finance reports until mid-October.

The Trump-Bush feud: Frontrunner edition // WaPo // Jose A. DelReal – July 15, 2015

Last week, Jeb Bush said he was done talking about Donald Trump. What he meant was "done for the week": on Tuesday, he took a major swing at the mogul, who has surged to the top tier in recent GOP national polls.

Trump, of course, never pledged to hold his fire. On Wednesday, he again took aim at Bush.

"[Bush] doesn't have the energy, he's not going to produce, and I will tell you that when he raises $100 million -- nobody knows about campaign contributions more than me because I've probably given more than almost anybody," Trump said on MSNBC's "Morning Joe" Wednesday morning. "When you give $100 million to Bush, he's got his $100 million sitting there, every single person that he gave every single dollar is expecting something for that money. Every single person."

He added: "And that's not good for the country. You know, that's a problem.

Bush on Tuesday jabbed Trump by name during a Tuesday event in Iowa, suggesting that the presidential candidate's brand of politics are toxic and saying he doesn't "want to be associated with the kind of vitriol that he's spewing out these days."

"On our side, there are people that prey on people's fears and their angst. I don't know about you, but I think it is wrong," he said. "I believe we need to unify our country. ...And whether it's Donald Trump or Barack Obama, their rhetoric of divisiveness is wrong. A Republican will never win by striking fear in people's hearts."

Later, Bush's campaign highlighted the comments about Trump, emailing them to reporters and posting a clip of those remarks to the Web. Bush himself didn't seem to mind either, as The Post's Ed O'Keefe reported:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On Tuesday, the same day a Suffolk University/USA Today survey showed Trump atop the fractured Republican presidential field, Bush walked into an overheated sports bar here and took a direct shot at his surging rival.

With a group of Trump supporters picketing outside, Bush seemed to relish the chance to call out the mogul's attacks on Mexican immigrants and to cast himself as an adult alternative.

Trump, for his part, said Wednesday that Clinton and Bush are worried about his surge in the polls and insinuated they are in cahoots to play down his candidacy.

"Look, Hillary was the worst secretary of state in the history of our country. I think that the person she doesn't want to run against is me because I say it, and Bush doesn't say it, nobody says it. I don't know if they have, like, a deal, these politicians...they don't speak truly about others. But they have some kind of a deal," he said.

Trump also said he wasn't sure exactly why Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Tex.), one of the only presidential candidates to speak in his defense in the wake of his controversial comments about Mexican immigrants, was coming to visit him at Trump Tower Wednesday.

"Ted Cruz called me. And I don't know why I'm meeting him, to be honest, but I do have respect for him," Trump said. "I respect the fact that along with a couple of others, he came out and he came out very strongly and agreed with what I said on illegal immigration. And he came out very strongly and he came out early, and I respect that. I like him."

Earlier this year, Trump took a more skeptical stance on Cruz, saying there were real questions about the Canadian-born senator's eligibility to run for president, despite his U.S. citizenship and U.S.-born mother.

"[His birthplace is] a hurdle. Somebody could certainly look at it very seriously," he told a Fox affiliate in March. "He was born in Canada. If you know, and when we all studied our history lessons, you are supposed to be born in this country, so I just don't know how the courts will rule on this."

Trump also hinted that one of Cruz's main campaign themes was borrowed. From him.

"The line of 'Make America great again' -- the phrase, that was mine, I came up with it about a year ago and I kept using it, and everybody's now using it, they are all loving it," Trump said then. "I don't know, I guess I should copyright it. Maybe I have copyrighted it."

Bush, Walker to reveal top presidential money-raisers // AP // Julie Bykowicz – July 15, 2015

Jeb Bush's campaign is promising to reveal the names of top money-raisers in October, making him the first Republican presidential candidate since 2008 to take such a step.

Called "bundlers," these fundraisers gather up many $2,700 checks — the maximum legal limit for the primary contest — from fellow donors, making them critical players in any campaign. There's no legal requirement to make bundler names public, except in the case of registered lobbyists.

After Bush announced his plan, Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker's campaign indicated he'll also disclose bundlers. The other Republican candidates have either declined to follow suit or not responded to requests for comment.

The Republican moves come after Democratic frontrunner Hillary Rodham Clinton said she'll be releasing names of top fundraisers on Wednesday.

Cruz sets meeting with Trump, praises 'bold, brash voice' // AP // Erica Werner – July 15, 2015

Two of the most outspoken Republican presidential candidates on illegal immigration — Sen. Ted Cruz of Texas and businessman Donald Trump — are set to talk.

Cruz, who requested the Wednesday meeting, told reporters at the U.S. Capitol that Trump "is bringing a bold, brash voice to this presidential race."

"One of the reason you're seeing so many 2016 candidates go out of their way to smack Donald Trump is they don't like a politician that speaks directly about the challenges of illegal immigration," said Cruz.

"Many of the politicians who are running out of their way to smack Donald Trump have for years or even decades been vocal advocates of amnesty," he said. "I for one am grateful that Donald Trump is highlighting these issues, they're critical issues, they're issues I've been fighting for a lot of years."

Trump has drawn controversy for calling immigrants arriving illegally from Mexico "criminals" and "rapists."

Many GOP contenders including former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush and Sen. Marco Rubio have criticized the comments, and Republican National Committee Chairman Reince Priebus called Trump to ask him to tone it down, which Trump said he would not do.

Cruz declined to offer details on the purpose of the meeting. Trump said earlier in an appearance on MSNBC's "Morning Joe" that he doesn't know what the meeting is about.

"He came out very strongly and agreed with what I said on illegal immigration, and he came out very strongly and he came out early, and I respect that," Trump said. "I like him. He called me, he wanted to meet, and we are going to meet. What it's about, I have absolutely no idea."

Early-state newspapers plan GOP forum before Fox debate // AP // Kathleen Ronayne – July 15, 2015

A trio of newspapers in the early presidential nominating states is pushing back against the plan by Fox News to allow only 10 Republican candidates on stage in its Aug. 6 debate, the first of the 2016 campaign.

The New Hampshire Union Leader plans to host a candidate forum Aug. 3 at the New Hampshire Institute of Politics, in partnership with The Post and Courier of Charleston, South Carolina, and The Gazette of Cedar Rapids, Iowa. The event will be live on C-SPAN as well as TV stations in Iowa and South Carolina and a New Hampshire radio station.

All 15 candidates now in the Republican pack have been invited to participate and about half have committed so far.

The Union Leader initially threatened to host a forum on the same day as the Fox debate after more than 50 prominent New Hampshire Republicans wrote to Fox protesting the network's debate format.

Fox plans to limit its debate to 10 candidates based on their national polling averages. Most contenders at risk of not making the debate stage have committed to the newspaper event, including South Carolina Sen. Lindsey Graham, Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal, former New York Gov. George Pataki and Ohio Gov. John Kasich, who has yet to declare his candidacy. Texas Sen. Ted Cruz, former neurosurgeon Ben Carson, former technology executive Carly Fiorina, former Texas Gov. Rick Perry and New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie also are coming, according to the Union Leader. No details were released about the format.

The publishers of the three newspapers said it's important for early-state voters to have a look at each candidate on a level playing field.

"There are a lot more than 10 viable candidates," they said in a statement. "The early primary process gives all candidates a chance to be heard. If networks and national polls are to decide this now, the early state process is in jeopardy, and only big money and big names will compete."

The Republican National Committee has authorized nine debates, from August through March. It is up to the organizations holding the debates to decide the entry criteria and format. Party rules say any candidate who participates in an unapproved debate will not be eligible for the approved ones. Allison Moore, speaking for the committee, said participation in the New Hampshire newspaper forum will not exclude candidates from the authorized debates.

The campaigns of other candidates — among them former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, Florida Sen. Marco Rubio, Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker and Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul — did not immediately say whether those candidates would join the New Hampshire forum.

The first presidential caucuses are in Iowa. The first primaries are in New Hampshire and South Carolina respectively.

Charleston massacre, flag debate put Haley in 2016 spotlight // AP // Bill Barrow and Meg Kinnard – July 15, 2015

From her public statements of grief to removing the Confederate battle flag from outside her Statehouse office, South Carolina Gov. Nikki Haley has drawn wide praise since the massacre of nine black churchgoers from a historic Charleston congregation.

Now the 43-year-old looks to her next role as the self-described host of a key early presidential primary, with the national attention feeding chatter about her potential as a running mate and as a voice for a Republican Party that needs more votes from women and minorities.

Just how prominent she remains in 2016, though, depends on factors well beyond this latest chapter in Haley's intense, complicated rise from state representative to her tenure as South Carolina's first female and minority governor, a five-year stretch that has rankled many of her fellow Republicans.

"There are sometimes events in an elected official's life that transcend politics, and this certainly was one for Gov. Haley," said Ted Newton, who helped lead the research team that vetted vice presidential prospects for Mitt Romney in 2012.

Newton praised Haley's "skill and grace" in recent weeks. Yet, he said, "The fact that she's in the headlines briefly doesn't guarantee anything. If she stays on a short-list (for vice president), it will be because she survives more intense scrutiny."

Besides, he said, more often than not, the deciding factor for a nominee picking a running mate is quite simple: personal and political compatibility.

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker was campaigning Wednesday in South Carolina for the first time since formally launching his bid, the first out-of-state Republican candidate to visit since the Confederate flag came down Friday.

According to her aides, Haley has met in recent months with Walker, Rick Perry, Jeb Bush, Chris Christie, Ted Cruz, Carly Fiorina, Bobby Jindal, Marco Rubio, Rick Santorum, and her hometown senior Sen. Lindsey Graham, fully 10 of the GOP's 15 prominent declared candidates.

Haley refuses to discuss the massacre at Emanuel African Methodist Episcopal Church in the context of her future, and she maintains that her change of heart on the battle flag — she had steadfastly sidestepped questions about the banner despite longstanding calls for its removal — was not a political calculation.

"If people are talking about that, then I'm not working hard enough to talk about the (Emanuel) families," Haley said in a recent interview with The Associated Press. "I don't want to think about it or talk about it or even acknowledge it at this point."

South Carolina's place as the first Southern presidential primary next February, weeks after Iowa and New Hampshire open the nominating process, offers a different reality.

"Everybody was going to covet Nikki's endorsement already," said Katon Dawson, a former state Republican Party chairman who backs the White House candidacy of Perry, the former Texas governor. "Now business is really going to pick up for her."

Haley, the daughter of Indian immigrants, first garnered national attention in 2010, when she won a bruising Republican primary and a competitive general election.

She has sought to define her administration on job creation, primarily through the decisions by BMW, Mercedes-Benz, Volvo, Boeing and a host of tire makers to establish or expand plants in South Carolina. But she's also had to fend off ethics complaints and routinely battles with her fellow Republicans in the Legislature on tax and budget issues.

In the weeks leading up to 2012 presidential primary, Haley endorsed Romney, who went on to lose South Carolina. The move angered tea party conservatives critical to Haley's 2010 election, but established her as a team player for the national party.

State Rep. Rick Quinn, who has aligned with Haley in her fiscal fights, said the governor faces "jealousy" in the Republican-controlled state. But he said presidential candidates should take note of the governing skill she demonstrated in cajoling lawmakers to remove the battle flag.

"To get 170 politicians to come along with her was a tough task," Quinn said, adding, "She did a lot more than just go have press conferences. She brought us in. ... She showed that she's more than just a talking head or a mouthpiece."

The decision also helps presidential candidates who now won't have to answer uncomfortable questions about the banner, as candidates have faced in previous election years.

Recalling a conversation she had with Walker about the flag after the church attack, Haley said she told him, "If you have any uncomfortable things, we'll help you get through it, but I'm going to take care of this."

GOP candidates slam Iran deal, but will it play in 2016? // AP // Nicholas Riccardi – July 15, 2015

Republican White House hopefuls are already vowing to overturn President Barack Obama's deal with Iran.

The stance may help Republicans score political points among the conservatives who dominate the GOP presidential primary electorate. But Tuesday's unanimous opposition could be less effective among general election voters in the fall of 2016.

Politically speaking, experts predict the issue could be a wash.

Republicans are seizing on American voters' deep distrust of Iran, while Democrats say that the deal is much better than another war in the Middle East.

The contrast was clear as Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Rodham Clinton quickly embraced the deal. At the same time, several Republican candidates, Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, Florida Sen. Marco Rubio and former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush vowed to rescind the agreement.

Officials say Cleveland on track for 2016 GOP convention // AP // Mark Gillispie – July 15, 2015

Organizers say Cleveland must secure 4,000 more hotel rooms and raise an additional $25 million to meet its money commitment for the 2016 Republican National Convention next July, but preparations are nevertheless on pace.

About 50,000 people, including 15,000 members of the media, are expected to attend the convention and more than 1,000 related events.

Officials from Cleveland 2016 Host Committee see the four-day event as Cleveland's opportunity to show the world how the city has been transformed in the past decade. Mayor Frank Jackson said at a news conference Wednesday that the hope is to "present Cleveland in the greatest light that we can."

MILLIONS TO BE RAISED

Cleveland's winning bid included a commitment to raise $64 million in cash and in-kind services to pay for convention-related expenses. Most of the money will be spent preparing Quicken Loans Arena for the convention, David Gilbert, head of the host committee, said in an interview last week. Cleveland has raised about $39 million, mostly from within Ohio. Fundraising efforts will now focus nationally on corporations and individuals, Gilbert said. Philadelphia is expected to raise $84 million for next year's Democratic convention.

GIVE THEM SHELTER

The host committee's effort to secure the 16,000 hotel rooms required by the RNC stumbled in recent months after some hotels reneged on voluntary agreements to provide about 1,500 rooms. Those rooms, Gilbert said, represent a big chunk of the 4,000 rooms that still need to be secured. Gilbert said some of the hotel rooms could be located outside the 35-mile radius from Quicken Loans Arena established in the host committee's agreement with the RNC.

THE BUS STOPS HERE

Gilbert is mindful of the transportation problems that plagued the 2012 Republican convention in Tampa, Florida. Some delegations had to endure long waits for buses taking them to and from the convention site. A transportation consultant is being hired to help Cleveland figure out how best to move thousands of people in and out of downtown. Gilbert hopes that the 5,000 downtown hotel rooms will help reduce traffic snarls. Parking will be at a premium and shuttle buses will be needed for lots situated outside of downtown, he said.

SECURITY MINDED

The city will be responsible for administering a $50 million federal grant to pay for a security plan created by the U.S. Secret Service. A good chunk of that money will be spent on uniforms, housing and food for thousands of law enforcement officers who will be hired for the convention. A security perimeter will be established around Quicken Loans Arena where only those with credentials will be allowed inside. An area will be established outside that zone for protesters.

LONG-TERM BENEFITS

While the convention will result in hundreds of millions of dollars being spent in Cleveland in the coming months, local officials like Gilbert, who is also president and CEO of the region's tourism agency, see the convention as a prime opportunity for the city to shine. Roads are being resurfaced and streetscapes are being gussied up. A $30 million makeover of iconic Public Square is expected to be completed. Gilbert said the convention's biggest benefit would be a boost in tourism and convention bookings that will help sustain the city and region for years to come. "We want people to understand that it's not only about that one week," he said. "We think this will position us incredibly well for the future."

George Pataki's official haul: $256k // Politico // Ben Schreckinger – July 15, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Former New York Gov. George Pataki's campaign reported on Wednesday that it had raised just under $256,000 in the second quarter of this year.

Pataki, who launched his campaign on May 28, is a long-shot candidate for the Republican presidential nomination. His hopes are pegged to New Hampshire, where his more moderate stances on issues such as gun control and the environment might be better received than in Iowa.

He is currently not polling among the top 10 candidates and is not expected to make the cut for the first nationally televised Republican debate next month.

Below is a breakout of the campaign's finances as of the end of June:

Total raised: $255, 794.96

Total spent: $48,174.71

Total cash on hand: $207,620.25

Donald Trump changes tune on Cruz // Politico // Ben Schreckinger – July 15, 2015

All of a sudden, Donald Trump is a lot less willing to question Ted Cruz's fitness for the presidency.

After raising questions in March about the Canada-born senator's eligibility to run for president, Trump told POLITICO on Wednesday that he didn't know if Cruz's birthplace affected his eligibility and had not paid attention to it.

Trump's remarks came hours before he was set to hold a private meeting with the Texas senator.

"I don't know. I mean I haven't looked at it. I have not looked at it at all," Trump said in an interview, when asked whether Cruz, who was born in the Canadian province of Alberta, should be eligible for the presidency.

When asked in March by a local New York television station about Cruz's birthplace, Trump said, "It's a hurdle. Somebody could certainly look at it very seriously. He was born in Canada. If you know and when we all studied our history lessons, you are

While many Republican candidates have condemned Donald Trump's comments about the alleged criminality of undocumented Mexican immigrants, Cruz defended Trump recently on Fox News, saying, "I like Donald Trump. I think he's terrific, I think he's brash, I think he speaks the truth." Cruz also took issue with NBC's decision cut ties with Trump over the comments, calling it "silly" and "wrong."

On Wednesday, Trump told POLITICO that he appreciated Cruz's defense of his comments. "I have great respect for him," said Trump.

Cruz was born to an American mother, making him a United States citizen at birth. Most experts agree that this means he meets the Constitution's requirement that the president be a "natural born citizen," though the Supreme Court has not ruled definitively on the question.

Trump has been a leading proponent of the theory that President Obama was born in Kenya, despite the overwhelming evidence that he was born in Hawaii.

Cruz called the planned Wednesday evening meeting with the real estate magnate, but Trump said Wednesday morning that he did not know the purpose of the sit-down.

Donald Trump: I don't know why I'm meeting Ted Cruz // Politico // Nick Gass – July 15, 2015

Donald Trump is meeting with Texas Sen. Ted Cruz in Manhattan on Wednesday, though he claimed in an interview on MSNBC that he does not know why.

"Ted Cruz called me. And I don't know why I'm meeting him, to be honest, but I do have respect for him," Trump said on "Morning Joe" in a wide-ranging interview in which the Republican presidential contender commented on issues foreign, domestic and everything in between.

"I respect the fact that along with a couple of others, he came out and he came out very strongly and agreed with what I said on illegal immigration. And he came out very strongly and he came out early, and I respect that. I like him," he added.

Asked about Tuesday's announcement of a nuclear agreement with Iran, Trump said "it's a ridiculous deal" and "a disgrace." The United States, he said, "should have doubled up the sanctions."

"Well, they didn't read The Art of the Deal. Most people did; they didn't," he said. "I have seen the deal. I've seen it broken down in every newspaper you can imagine, and I think I know the deal quite well," he added, when pressed about whether he had read the deal himself.

Trump also had harsh words for the political media discussing his first month on the campaign trail.

One thing he has learned is "how dishonest ... some of the political media" is, in contrast to the financial journalists with whom he normally interacts.

"They don't want to print the truth. They don't want to say what you said. They don't want to say what you mean. They know what you said, they know what you mean, and they put it in totally different words. It's like you didn't say it, it's incredible to me," Trump said, noting that he has become "more careful" in dealing with some people in the media as a result.

One such media distortion, Trump said, stemmed from the reaction to reports of his remarks about undocumented immigrants coming to the U.S. illegally from Mexico. Trump cited "five different sources" at the border telling him that Mexico is sending its worst. "They're almost crying," he said.

Pressed to provide the sources by Bloomberg Politics' Mark Halperin, Trump demurred.
"I'll reveal my sources, Mark, when you reveal your sources," he countered.

He also took the opportunity to slam Republican rival Jeb Bush on jobs and once again claim that he would win the Hispanic vote.

"The Hispanics love me," Trump said, adding that he would open up more jobs for everyone in the economy. "Jeb Bush wouldn't know where to go to create a job," he declared, telling host Joe Scarborough that Bush "only can follow you or a pollster. I can only go with what's right."

Trump, who came out on top of a recent Suffolk University/USA Today poll of GOP contenders, also trailed former secretary of state Hillary Clinton badly in a head-to-head matchup.

"I think that the person that she doesn't want to run against is me," he said.

Rivals Cruz, Trump play nice en route to 2016 // CNN // Eric Bradner – July 15, 2015

Texas Sen. Ted Cruz, Donald Trump and their wives were scheduled to have lunch in New York City in June, before the real estate mogul became a candidate for president.

Senate votes intervened and Cruz couldn't make it and the two postponed.

A month later, the two Republican presidential candidates -- this time, without their wives -- finally got together Wednesday afternoon at Trump Tower. Trump said Cruz had called him Tuesday to ask for the meeting.

And in that time, what would have been a low-key meeting took on new importance. Trump surged to first place in the GOP primary polls, and Cruz's warm words toward Trump separated him from a crowd of candidates denouncing the real estate mogul over his controversial remarks about undocumented immigrants.

From the outside, Wednesday's meeting made it look like a calculating Cruz was actually betting against Trump -- cozying up to him in hopes of earning an endorsement if Trump's campaign ultimately collapses.

But after the meeting, Cruz said that wasn't happened at all.

"We had a conversation about the race," Cruz said. "He's running, I'm running and we both agreed that we started out as friends and will end as friends."

"Donald and I have gotten together and visited a number of times before he was a presidential candidate, and it was a good visit. It was the first time we've really sat down since he launched, and so we had a good conversation," Cruz said. "And I enjoy Donald. He's one of a kind."

The two have praised each other on the campaign trail in recent weeks.

Before heading to New York, Cruz said on Capitol Hill Wednesday that he's "a big fan of Donald Trump."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He praised Trump as a "bold, brash voice" and criticized -- though not by name -- other GOP contenders who "go out of their way to smack Donald Trump."

Republican pollster Kellyanne Conway said the fact that the two got together -- despite other GOP candidates like Jeb Bush turning against Trump -- shouldn't be surprising, since during the 2012 campaign most Republican candidates, and some non-candidates like Sarah Palin, sought meetings with Trump.

"They are both anti-Establishment candidates unafraid to shake up the system," Conway said. "Cruz's approach is different. He has said he will level no personal insults against other candidates. Clearly, in going foursquare after Jeb and (Karl) Rove, Trump has not made a similar promise."

Trump had met with many other GOP presidential hopefuls, including Cruz, in the months before he decided to launch his own bid. Trump also donated $5,000 to Cruz's political action committee last year.

Other political observers said Cruz's meeting -- highly publicized after Trump announced it would happen during an appearance on MSNBC -- was a savvy play for conservative hardliners' support in case those voters ultimately decide against supporting Trump.

"Politically this is a smart move by Cruz. While no one can know for sure, there is a fair to good chance Trump will drop out or cease active campaigning at some point," said Larry Sabato, director of the Center for Politics at the University of Virginia.

"Who will inherit Trump's backers? Certainly not Jeb Bush. And Trump has criticized others by name, too," he said."Should Trump leave the field, Ted Cruz would be a likely beneficiary. He is considered an immigration hardliner, like Trump. And Cruz is showing Trump respect, and Trump has already shown us that he has a good memory for respect and slights."

Donald Trump meeting with Ted Cruz on Wednesday // CNN // Jeremy Diamond – July 15, 2015

Donald Trump will meet Wednesday with fellow Republican presidential contender Sen. Ted Cruz.

Trump said Wednesday on MSNBC's "Morning Joe" that Cruz called him to set up the meeting, but said he didn't know what the Texas Republican wanted to discuss.

The meeting comes amid Trump's rise in the polls to second and first place in the latest national polls and as Cruz has played weeks of defense for Trump amid the billionaire's controversial comments likening some Mexican immigrants to "killers" and "rapists."

"I do respect the fact that along with a couple of others he came out very strongly," Trump said of Cruz's backup on the illegal immigration saga.

Cruz and Trump have both locked heads with the Republican establishment, with Cruz fighting the status quo in Congress with unorthodox tactics, while Trump has locked horns with party elites over whether his comments about illegal immigrants have hurt the party's outreach to Latino voters.

Trump had met with many other GOP presidential hopefuls, including Cruz, in the months before he decided to launch his own bid.

Trump also donated $5,000 to Cruz's political action committee last year.

Cruz's campaign did not respond to requests for comment.

Cruz defends Trump's 'bold, brash voice' ahead of private meeting // MSNBC // Emma Margolin – July 15, 2015

Republican presidential candidate and Texas Sen. Ted Cruz again defended fellow White House hopeful Donald Trump's controversial remarks on illegal immigration Wednesday, though offered no details about what the two will discuss in a private meeting later in the day.

"I'm a big fan of Donald Trump's," Cruz told reporters in Washington, D.C., Wednesday, following a press conference on the Export-Import Bank of the United States. "I think Donald Trump is bringing a bold, brash voice to this presidential race."

Among the crowded GOP presidential pack, Cruz was virtually the only one to not condemn Trump's remarks on immigration – specifically that "when Mexico sends its people," they bring drugs and crime. Quite to the contrary, Cruz said on Fox and Friends last month that Trump "speaks the truth" and later "salute[d]" him on Meet the Press

"for focusing on the need to address illegal immigration."

Trump said on msnbc's "Morning Joe" Wednesday morning that Cruz had called him for a meeting, but that he didn't know what it would be about. The Cruz campaign has not responded to msnbc's request for comment or confirmation, but Trump's spokesman told msnbc the sit-down in New York City would be private.

Cruz is also scheduled to sit down Wednesday afternoon with CNBC's John Harwood at the network's Institutional Investor Delivering Alpha conference in New York City. Earlier in the day, Cruz appeared alongside fellow Republican lawmakers in Washington, D.C., to praise Congress' decision last month to allow the charter for the Export-Import Bank of the United States to expire. The 81-year-old institution, commonly known as Ex-Im, acted as the export credit agency for the U.S. government and has been criticized for disproportionately supporting big business.

Cruz called Ex-Im a "classic example of corporate welfare" and vowed to use "any and all procedural tools" to ensure it stays dead.

"When it comes to campaign season, every Republican is a conservative," Cruz said. "Well now, when push comes to shove, we discover if people are merely 'campaign conservatives,' or if they actually are going to be practicing conservatives, consistent conservatives."

Asked about his meeting with Trump, Cruz demurred: "Let's keep the questions on Export-Import bank."

Following the press conference, however, Cruz was more receptive to speaking about Trump, whom he suggested was being unfairly maligned by fellow White House hopefuls.

"One of the reasons you're seeing so many 2016 candidates go out of their way to smack Donald Trump is they don't like a politician that speaks directly about the challenges of illegal immigration. They don't like a politician who speaks directly about sanctuary cities about the law enforcement and safety and security issues that are raised," Cruz said. "Indeed, many of the politicians who are running out of their way to smack Donald Trump have for years or even decades been advocates of vocal amnesty. I for one am grateful that Donald Trump is highlighting these issues."

How much m oney have Bobby Jindal and Mike Huckabee raised for 2016? // CBS // Reena Flores

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

– July 15, 2015

During his first week as a presidential candidate, Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal hauled in nearly $579,000 in direct donations -- though outside groups backing the 2016 contender say they have another $8.6 million to add to that number. He only spent $65,044 in that first official week, leaving him with over half a million cash on hand at the end of the second quarter fundraising period.

Jindal, who entered the White House race in the last week of the fundraising period, drew in $578,758 from just over 2,000 individual donors, according to a Washington Examiner report. About 87 percent of donations were under $100 each.

But with the support of a super PAC, a 501(c)4 nonprofit, and a 527 committee, the Louisiana Republican's presidential treasure chest is effectively much larger. Jindal's super PAC, Believe Again, has raised $3,7 million since January, while the America Next nonprofit has raised nearly $4 million. That's in addition to Jindal's 527 group, the American Future Project, which has raised $1 million.

Meanwhile, former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee will report raising $2 million in this past quarter, with related super PACs drawing in an additional $6 million.

The $8 million dollars nearly matches Huckabee's fundraising numbers from his first White House bid in 2008. His last presidential campaign, which predated the arrival of the super PAC on the political scene, only had $9 million to spend.

In the Republican presidential field, the fundraising totals of other candidates easily dwarf the money raised by Huckabee's and Jindal's operations. In the second fundraising quarter alone, Florida Sen. Marco Rubio announced that his campaign had raised $12 million, with a leadership PAC bringing in $1.2 million. Texas Sen. Ted Cruz, meanwhile, has just over $50 million from his presidential committee, with $37 million from outside PACs. At the top of the pack, former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush has raised a whopping $103 million since January, via his Right to Rise super PAC.

Republican Presidential Candidates To Disclose Bundlers For First Time Since 2008 // HuffPo // Paul Blumenthal – July 15, 2015

For the first time since 2008, two Republican presidential candidates will publicly disclose the names of campaign bundlers raising money for them.

Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, according to The New York Times, and Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, according to The Associated Press, will disclose their bundlers in October. They join former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, a Democratic presidential candidate, in agreeing to disclose the big-money fundraisers who collect contributions for the campaigns.

The decision by Bush and Walker to disclose their bundlers comes after no Republican candidates in the 2012 presidential election volunteered to reveal the identities of their top fundraisers. In 2008, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), a proponent of campaign finance reform, released names of his bundlers. George W. Bush revealed bundler names in both the 2000 and 2004 elections.

Other Republican presidential candidates, however, are not on board with transparency. Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) and Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas), won't voluntarily disclose their bundlers, spokespeople told the Times.

It isn't yet clear how much information the candidates who will disclose their bundlers will reveal. In 2008 and 2012, President Barack Obama released bundler names in ranges, from a low of $50,001 to $100,000, to $500,001 and above. When Clinton disclosed her bundlers in the 2008 Democratic primary, she released only those raising $100,000 or more.

Ted Cruz Defends Donald Trump On Immigration Before Their Dinner Date // HuffPo // Michael McAuliff and Elise Foley – July 15, 2015

Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas) on Wednesday offered another passionate defense of Donald Trump, while also attacking a number of fellow Republican presidential hopefuls who have criticized the real estate mogul's views on immigration.

"I'll say this: I think Donald Trump is bringing a bold, brash presence to this presidential race," Cruz told reporters on Capitol Hill. "It's one of the reasons you're seeing so many 2016 candidates go out of their way to smack Donald Trump. They don't like a politician who speaks directly about the challenges of immigration. They don't like a politician who speaks directly about sanctuary cities, about the law enforcement and safety and security issues that are raised."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Trump drew condemnation from both sides of the political spectrum when he suggested during his presidential campaign launch that undocumented Mexican immigrants were criminals and rapists. Among the GOP presidential candidates who spoke out against Trump's remarks were Florida Sen. Marco Rubio and former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush.

"Indeed, many of the politicians who are running out of their way to smack Donald Trump, have for years or even decades been vocal advocates of amnesty," Cruz said on Tuesday, likely referring to Rubio's and Bush's criticisms. Rubio helped craft an immigration reform bill that offered a pathway to citizenship, and anti-immigration conservatives accuse Bush of favoring "amnesty."

"I, for one, am grateful that Donald Trump is highlighting these issues," Cruz continued. The senator made similar remarks last month, saying he didn't think Trump "should apologize for speaking out against the problem that is illegal immigration."

Cruz's defense of The Donald appears to have won him some love from the big-mouthed billionaire: The two candidates are expected to dine together later on Wednesday at Trump Tower in New York.

The conservative Texas senator went on to blast the Obama administration's immigration policies and to suggest that Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton should answer for them. Cruz repeated claims -- which fact-checkers deem "half-true" -- that the administration inappropriately released some 36,000 criminals in 2013 who were undocumented immigrants.

"One question anyone should ask President Obama, or especially Hillary Clinton: Does Hillary Clinton think it is appropriate for the federal government to release 116 murderers who are illegal aliens? I don't," Cruz said. "Does Hillary Clinton think it's appropriate that in 2013 the Obama administration released over 15,000 illegal aliens who had drunk driving convictions?"

Cruz was citing figures from a 2014 report from the Center for Immigration Studies, which advocates for reducing immigration levels. The report said that Immigration and Customs Enforcement released 36,007 convicted criminals in fiscal year 2013, including about 16,000 people with convictions for driving while under the influence of alcohol or drugs.

ICE officials have said their hands are tied with regards to releasing some undocumented immigrants. Some are released by court order, while others are set free because of a 2001 Supreme Court ruling that the government can't hold people for deportation indefinitely when another country refuses to take them back.

In fiscal year 2014, ICE carried out 177,960 deportations of convicted criminals. Homeland Security Secretary Jeh Johnson defended the agency's record on Tuesday.

"It is a fiction to say that we are not enforcing the law," Johnson said.

Cruz did not concern himself on Wednesday with the laws requiring releases. "People are fed up with this," he said, "and I think that frustration with politicians in both parties who say one thing and do another -- I think that's going to be front and center in the 2016 election."

It's true that Democrats are likely to focus on Trump's comments during the election season -- though not for the reason Cruz predicted. The remarks are almost certain to come up time and again as Democrats make the case to voters that the Republican Party is hostile toward Latinos.

This, Democrats believe, should encourage Latinos to get out and vote. Rep. Luis Gutierrez (D-Ill.) said on the House floor Tuesday that the 4.5 million Latinos who are eligible for citizenship but have not yet applied should fill out their paperwork so they can vote against Trump.

"Let me fill you in on a little secret: With fee waivers for up to 20 percent of those applying, it is absolutely free," Gutierrez said. "Becoming a citizen for free so you can make it clear that you are offended by Donald Trump. It is poetic and patriotic."

C-SPAN to preempt first GOP debate // The Hill // Jonathan Easley – July 15, 2015

C-SPAN is partnering with a handful of regional newspapers in early-voting states for a nationally televised forum with the Republican presidential candidates just days before Fox News Channel's first scheduled debate.

The network has invited all 17 of the GOP presidential hopefuls to the Aug. 3 Voters First Forum in New Hampshire.

Publishers at the New Hampshire Union Leader, South Carolina Post and Courier, and Iowa Gazette say the forum was prompted in part by Fox News Channel's controversial decision to cap the number of candidates in their Aug.

6 debate at 10.

“Fox says only the ‘top’ 10 candidates, as judged solely by national polling, will be allowed on its stage,” the publishers said in a joint statement. “That may be understandable later, but the first votes are half a year away and there are a lot more than 10 viable candidates.”

“The early primary process gives all candidates a chance to be heard,” they continued. “If networks and national polls are to decide this now, the early state process is in jeopardy and only big money and big names will compete.”

The statement reflects the concerns of many Republicans, who say the national media and unreliable early polls shouldn’t play a role in determining the top tier of candidates in a year when the GOP has a deep and diverse field.

So far, Ben Carson, Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas), New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, Ohio Gov. John Kasich, businesswoman Carly Fiorina, Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal, Sen. Lindsey Graham (S.C.), and former New York Gov. George Pataki have committed to the C-SPAN forum.

Of those, only Carson is currently a lock to participate in the Fox News debate. The rest of the candidates will be scrapping to raise their poll numbers to qualify for the final spots on the debate stage.

The C-SPAN forum will be hosted by WGIR radio’s Jack Heath, who hosts the “New Hampshire Today” show. The candidates will take turns answering questions in five minute segments.

To accommodate for those who will be left off the stage, Fox News will hold a nationally televised forum earlier in the day for those who don’t qualify.

The Republican National Committee has sanctioned nine debates and signed off on the formats, but it’s been a struggle for the national party to deal with the huge number of candidates running for the presidential nomination.

The C-SPAN event is not a sanctioned RNC debate, but rather one of more than a dozen forums and cattle calls this cycle that have materialized as demand for access to the candidates has skyrocketed.

What Campaign Filings Don’t Show: Super PACs’ Growing Sway // NYT // Eric Lichtblau and Nicholas Confessore – July 15, 2015

Presidential contenders are set to provide a glimpse inside their campaign war chests on Wednesday, releasing financial statements that will give the first detailed accounting of how the candidates are raising and spending hundreds of millions of dollars in pursuit of elected office.

But while the reports, to be filed with the Federal Election Commission, provide an early look at the campaigns’ financial operations, they promise to tell only part of the story because they do not include any of the money being raised by the “super PACs” and other outside groups supporting many of the candidates. In many cases, the money raised by those groups is likely to dwarf what the campaigns bring in.

The Republican presidential candidates are almost uniformly relying on these groups, which can tap unlimited corporate and individual contributions, to amass the financial firepower they need to break through a crowded primary field, as long as they do not coordinate with candidates. This is a stark departure from past campaigns and has made most of the candidates deeply reliant on a small handful of ultra-wealthy donors.

The new fund-raising model has already altered the landscape of a campaign that is still months away from the first votes.

Without super PACs, four Republicans — Jeb Bush, Marco Rubio, Ted Cruz and Ben Carson — would have raised roughly the same amount of money, between $10 million and $12 million during the second quarter of 2016. A fifth, Rand Paul, would be close behind, while several others, including Rick Perry, would be trailing.

Instead, the field has rapidly separated into three distinct financial tiers. Mr. Bush has raised about $114 million with the help of a super PAC. Mr. Cruz, Mr. Rubio and their super PACs occupy the next-highest tier, with each having raised more than $40 million.

Lagging them is a third tier of candidates, including several who declared their bids near or after the end of the fund-raising quarter and others who have been slow to raise money.

Mr. Perry, who began a second presidential bid in June, provides another illustration of the imbalance.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A fund-raising powerhouse during his years as Texas governor, Mr. Perry has not yet lived down his aborted 2012 campaign, and many big Republican donors who supported him in the past have not yet flocked to get behind him for 2016. His campaign announced last week that in about a month of fund-raising, he brought in just over $1 million from regular donors, leaving him near the back of the Republican pack. Individual donations are capped at $2,700.

But a constellation of super PACs backing Mr. Perry brought in many times that amount from megadonors — almost $12.8 million through the end of June, according to Austin Barbour, a senior adviser to the groups. Another $4 million check — four times what Mr. Perry's campaign raised — came in a few days later, he said.

More than half the group's total came from just two donors: Kelcey Warren, an energy company executive who is also the finance chairman of Mr. Perry's campaign, and Brint Ryan, a Dallas businessman.

"Rick Perry's had an impressive few months," Mr. Barbour said. "Some of the hesitation I know has softened up a lot."

On the Democratic side, the picture is the reverse. Hillary Rodham Clinton, who is far outpacing her rivals on the fund-raising front, has raised almost four times as much as the super PAC supporting her candidacy. Her campaign expects to report raising about $45 million so far in her White House bid.

The 2016 campaign could prove to be the most expensive on record, with the candidates, political parties, super PACs and special-interest groups spending perhaps $10 billion under fund-raising rules made much looser by the United States Supreme Court's Citizens United decision in 2010. That ruling paved the way for the emergence of super PACs.

The early fund-raising hauls have already prompted complaints to the election commission and the Justice Department from citizen watchdog groups. One of them, the Campaign Legal Center, charges that Mr. Bush and other candidates skirted the law by raising large amounts of money before they officially declared their candidacies.

Paul S. Ryan, senior counsel for the watchdog group, said he will be looking at the filings on Wednesday to determine whether the candidates complied with the law.

"If not," Mr. Ryan said, "the Campaign Legal Center will be filing complaints."

Hillary Clinton and Donald Trump are set to barnstorm New Hampshire. Here's what to watch. // WaPo // Sean Sullivan – July 16, 2015

MANCHESTER, N.H. -- The clear front-runner for the Democratic presidential nomination and the Republican candidate who has become a headache for many in his own party as he surges in the polls will descend on this key early voting state on Thursday, giving voters here a glimpse of two contenders who have received widespread attention in recent weeks.

Former secretary of state Hillary Clinton (D) will make two campaign stops here as she looks to expand on ideas she offered in her Monday economic policy speech: an early afternoon town hall in Dover then an organizing event in Windham. The town hall meeting will be Clinton's first of the campaign.

Not far away will be Donald Trump (R), the real estate mogul who has become a sharply polarizing figure in Republican circles. Trump will hold a campaign rally and field questions in Laconia.

Two other candidates will also be in the state to campaign: Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker (R) and New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie (R). Walker, who officially kicked off his campaign on Monday, is sweeping through the early voting states this week.

But the presence of Clinton and Trump here presents each party with key early tests in the first-in-the-nation primary state.

For Clinton, who has faced criticism for Republicans that she has not opened herself up to enough scrutiny, the town hall will serve as a chance to field questions from voters in an unscripted setting. It's also a chance for Clinton to speak in more detail about the corporate profit-sharing proposal she spoke about in general terms in her Monday speech.

An impressive showing could blunt some of the momentum Clinton's Democratic rival from neighboring Vermont, Sen. Bernie Sanders, has picked up in recent weeks. But a rocky one could spur more interest from voters here in the liberal firebrand.

Trump, who comes to New Hampshire as polls show he has climbed into the top tier of Republican hopefuls, will have a chance to to address criticism from those who say he is hurting his own party. His visit is a chance to convince skeptical Republicans in a crucial state that he is a serious candidate for president -- or to fall flat trying.

Some Republicans have praised Trump's blunt style, but others have expressed concern that his brash rhetoric and controversial comments about illegal immigrants from Mexico -- he said they are "rapists" who are bringing "drugs" and "crime" into the country -- have harmed the Republican Party, which has struggled in recent elections to win Hispanic voters.

Those looking to see Clinton and Trump in the same state will have another chance the next two days. Trump is the feature speaker at a Republican dinner on Friday in Arkansas. On Saturday, Clinton will speak at a Democratic dinner in the state, where she was first lady when husband Bill Clinton was governor.

Bush, Clinton dominate early 2016 presidential fundraising // AP // Julie Bykowicz – July 15, 2015

The two presidential candidates whose immediate families include former presidents loom large in early fundraising for 2016.

Hillary Rodham Clinton and Jeb Bush account for almost half the roughly $377 million that presidential groups for all the expected 22 candidates say they've raised. Most campaigns, including Clinton's and Bush's, were required to file their initial reports with the Federal Election Commission by midnight Wednesday.

Those document financial activity between April 1 and June 30 and will list the names of everyone who gave at least $200. The maximum contribution for the primary is $2,700. The FEC reports also will show how candidates are spending their money — on consultants, office space, advertising, polling and more.

Wednesday's reports provide only a glimpse of all the money that donors are handing over. The candidates also benefit from super PACs created specifically to help them. Those groups, which accept contributions of any size and are subject to legal limits on how closely they can work with the campaigns, file their FEC reports at the end of the month.

Ahead of the deadlines, many candidates and their super PAC boosters have publicized their fundraising totals.

The AP tallied those numbers and found that donors have handed over a third of a billion dollars. That's more than the presidential candidates raised for the entire primary election of 2000, according to the Center for Responsive Politics, a group that tracks election spending.

Dominating the cash haul are Clinton and Bush.

Clinton, the Democratic front-runner, has raised $45 million in checks of $2,700 or less for her campaign. Priorities USA Action, a super PAC that counts on seven-figure donors, raised an additional $15 million.

Bush's money looks different. Before he officially declared his candidacy, the former Florida governor spent the first six months of the year raising huge sums of money for Right to Rise, a super PAC that's boosting his bid to win the Republican nomination. That group says it has raised a record $103 million. Bush's presidential campaign, which officially began on June 15, collected $11.5 million from contributors.

Outside groups are furthering the ambitions of at least four other Republican presidential aspirants: Cruz, Florida Sen. Marco Rubio, Texas Gov. Rick Perry and Ohio Gov. John Kasich. In each case, the fundraising for the outside groups helping them is outpacing the fundraising for their own campaigns.

Rubio's overall take from donors — $44.7 million to his campaign and two outside groups — includes $15.8 million for a nonprofit that won't file any public budget information until at least next year and keeps its donors secret.

Meanwhile, retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson, a conservative GOP candidate, and Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, a liberal candidate seeking the Democratic nomination, have harnessed grassroots enthusiasm to fill campaign coffers with small donations. Carson's campaign says it has raised more than $10.4 million, and Sanders has brought in $15 million. Because the money is coming directly to them, they have tighter control over how it is used.

Wednesday's filings will shed more light on how the others are doing with small donors, defined as individuals who give $200 or less. On the other side of the spectrum, the end-of-July super PAC filings will provide a snapshot of who's doing the best with the biggest donors, those writing six-figure checks or more.

By mid-day Wednesday, campaigns for just two of the major presidential candidates had filed their reports, Republican Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal and Democratic former Rhode Island Gov. Lincoln Chafee. Both are longshots who reported six-figure fundraising totals. Chafee is mostly funding his own bid.

A few major Republican candidates will be missing from the initial campaign finance reports. Kasich, Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker and New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie made their campaigns official too recently to file second-quarter FEC reports, although a Christie-allied super PAC said on Tuesday that it has raised $11 million. The first look at their campaign numbers will come in mid-October.

Fundraising - and spending- shatter records // Politico // Kenneth P. Vogel and T arini Parti – July 16, 2015

The crowded field of 2016 presidential candidates spent $48 million through the first half of the year –nearly twice as much as their counterparts had at this point in the 2012 cycle – reflecting the new realities of fast, expensive campaign launches.

The dramatic spending spike – detailed in Wednesday's reports to the Federal Election Commission covering the beginning of April through the end of June – was underwritten mostly by fewer donors each giving more money.

But overall, fundraising increases did not keep up with spending inflation, leading to spending ratios that in past elections might have provoked worry among campaign finance operatives. Such early-campaign "burn rates" appear to be becoming more common in an age when races start earlier, pivotal digital and data tools cost more, consultants fetch huge salaries and campaigns rely on mega-donor-funded super PACs to fill many traditional functions.

A handful of Republican presidential candidates who brought in at least $1 million-a-piece in the last three months each spent more than half of their haul – from the mid-50-percent burn rates of Ted Cruz, Rick Perry and Mike Huckabee to the 74-percent rate of Donald Trump.

All but Trump, who provided nearly his entire $1.9-million haul from his own pocket, are expecting big-money super PACs to come to their aid. Reports detailing the unlimited contributions and spending of super PACs aren't due with the FEC until the end of July.

But perhaps no candidate personified big early spending like Democratic frontrunner Hillary Clinton. Her campaign, which cast itself as a penny-pinching operation that relied heavily on small donors, revealed itself to be something quite different in its FEC report.

While the campaign brought in $47.6 million – three times more than the next most prolific fundraiser and more than any other presidential campaign had posted in its first quarter – it also spent more than three times as much as the next biggest spender, $18.7 million, amounting to a burn-rate of 39 percent.

In fact, Clinton's juggernaut spent more on payroll for her massive staff – $6 million – than any other candidate spent in total. Her staff worked out of more than 20 offices for which the campaign paid $540,000 in rent – including about $106,000 for a Manhattan office space where Clinton herself often works, miles from her main campaign headquarters in hip Brooklyn.

It also spent heavily on cutting-edge campaign tactics, including investing $276,000 in an envelope-pushing relationship with a supportive super PAC called Correct the Record, which plans to coordinate research activities with Clinton's campaign. The campaign also spent nearly $500,000 on voter data and data services, and $1.4 million on online advertising through a firm Bully Pulpit Interactive that shaped the pioneering digital marketing effort behind Barack Obama's 2008 campaign.

Unlike Obama's 2008 bid, which at first leaned heavily on low-dollar online contributions and boasted that it was ushering in a small-donor revolution in American politics, neither Clinton, nor the GOP's top fundraising presidential candidate, Jeb Bush, raised significant portions of their cash from small donors.

Only 17 percent of Clinton's cash came from donors contributing $200 or less, while 65 percent of it came from donors who gave the primary maximum of $2,700 or more.

Of the $11.4 million Bush raised since announcing his campaign in mid-June, 3.2 percent came from donors who gave $200 or less. An overwhelming 85 percent came from donors who gave $2,700 or more.

Both leaned on networks of well-connected donors to collect, or bundle, collections of checks from other donors. Clinton's campaign voluntarily released a list of more than 100 top bundlers. including Democratic mega-donors like billionaire media moguls Fred Eychaner and Haim Saban and a handful of current and former lawmakers such as Reps. Joaquin Castro, Grace Meng and Jim Himes. Bush's bundlers included lobbyist power players like Al Cardenas, Dirk Van Dongen and former Rep. Tom Loeffler.

Clinton and Bush also helped seed their own campaigns as they considered entering the race, reporting spending

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

$279,000 and $389,000, respectively, from their own pockets on staffing and services. And both made use of private jets to hop-scotch the country. Clinton paid nearly $180,000 to a charter plane company and Bush paid $281,000 for private jet use, including $153,000 to "The Johnson Co.," apparently for the use of mega-donor Woody Johnson's jet for a European trip.

Both Clinton and Bush – as well as Cruz, Marco Rubio and other candidates – have deep-pocketed super PACs that raised tens of millions to support their campaign.

On the far other end of the finance spectrum is the campaign of Democratic insurgent Bernie Sanders, which is not supported by a super PAC and has not courted big donors, yet managed to raise the second-biggest haul of the second quarter: $15.2 million.

An overwhelming 76 percent of Sanders' money came from donors giving $200 or less, while only four percent came from max donors – perhaps unsurprising from a candidate whose campaign centers partly on reducing the influence of big-money in politics.

Yet, more than populist zeal is powering Sanders' impressive fundraising. His campaign paid $1.3 million for digital consulting and advertising services from Revolution Messaging, which has helped lead the senator's digital fundraising and social media effort.

Other candidates also seemed to view data as the key early-campaign investment. Cruz spent more than $1.4 million renting voter and email lists from a handful of digital consulting firms, including Campaign Solutions, Mustard Seed Media, Pinnacle List Co., Targeted Victory, Lukens Co. and Active Engagement. The Texas senator also reported owing $556,000 to Cambridge Analytica for "survey research" and "donor modeling." The firm is owned by the family of New York hedge fund magnate Bob Mercer, POLITICO revealed last week. Mercer and his family are among the biggest donors to a network of super PACs supporting Cruz that combined to raise $37 million and at least one of the super PACs is in discussions with Cambridge Analytica about retaining the firm's services.

The firm, which is relatively new to the competitive world of U.S. political data, provides nontraditional "psychographic" analyses of voters to try to win them over with narrowly targeted micro-messages. The Cruz campaign's FEC report does not reveal any payments to the firm, just debt. The total owed would seem to indicate that Cruz is relying heavily on the firm for critical data work, but it also is an unusually large debt for a campaign to owe a single vendor early in the cycle.

Other candidates carrying significant debts included Clinton (who owed $574,000, including more than $553,000 to pollster John Anzalone's firm), Bush (who owed $401,000, including $148,000 to a Michigan firm for a list he purchased) Republican Rick Santorum (who owed $125,000 after raising only $608,000).

Not including the debt, the candidates who finished June with the most in the bank were Clinton ($29 million), Sanders ($12 million), Rubio ($10 million), Cruz ($8.5 million), Bush ($8.4 million), Carson ($4.7 million), Rand Paul ($4 million) and Lindsey Graham ($2.6 million).

Chart: The 2016 Presidential Candidates' Time in Elected Office, Ranked // Bloomberg // Andrew Feather – July 15, 2015

In poll after poll, Americans say they want their presidents to have experience.

But what, exactly, is experience, and does it extend to work history outside of elected office? Should, for instance, Donald Trump's real estate and reality television success count?

In a 2013 survey conducted by Des Moines Register pollster J. Ann Seltzer, voters said they prefer business experience to experience in any political office. However, Selzer says whether or not experience matters depends on the candidate and how effectively he or she is able to sell what experience they do have.

"It is a piece of the puzzle," Selzer said. "It is not the puzzle all by itself, and really depending on the candidate's ability to make the case why he comes to run for the presidency with a unique history."

Although voters say they value experience, the frontrunners in both parties have had some of the shortest terms in elected office. While some of the longest serving candidates have struggled to gain traction in the polls.

Candidates Show First Glimpse in Historic 2016 Money Race // Bloomberg // Zachary Mider – July 15, 2015

If money equals speech, then in the U.S. presidential race right now it's millionaires and billionaires who are doing most of the talking.

The campaign fundraising efforts of the 22 major declared or all-but-declared contenders are coming into focus this week as campaigns and related groups disclose the amounts they've raised so far, and the numbers point to a historic shift. For the first time in decades, contributions of unlimited size from deep-pocketed donors—as much as $6 million from a single person—are eclipsing the amounts raised from thousands of smaller contributors.

Today is the day when most candidates are required to disclose to the Federal Election Commission the fundraising totals for their official campaigns if they haven't already done so. Super-PACs don't have to report until the end of the month, although many of them have already allowed their numbers to trickle out, along with the names of some of the biggest contributors.

The Republican primary, where 17 candidates are seeking the party's nomination, may end up being financed mostly by a handful of wealthy donors. Some $235 million has been raised by super-PACs and other unlimited-contribution groups backing particular GOP candidates, a still-incomplete tally shows, compared with only $58 million raised in smaller amounts by the campaigns themselves.

"Outside money has been taken to a new level, beyond, I think, anybody's reasonable expectations," said Kenneth Gross, a political-law partner at Skadden Arps Slate Meagher & Flom who has counseled campaigns for both parties.

With the exception of Donald Trump, a billionaire who has said he plans to pay his own way, every major Republican contender has an allied outside group working on his or her behalf. By comparison, at this point in 2011, only one of the 12 Republican contenders had a super-PAC. That was Mitt Romney, whose super-PAC's $12 million haul was less than the $18 million raised by his official campaign at that point. Super-PACs never represented more than a small fraction of the total spending in the race.

American elections are being transformed by a series of court rulings, including the Supreme Court's 2010 decision in Citizens United, which loosened decades-old limits on money in politics by declaring that political spending was a form of speech protected by the First Amendment. For proponents of the changes, the current fundraising cycle is a sign of a reinvigorated democracy, and may help explain why so many candidates are throwing their hats in the ring.

"More speech freedom means more candidates, and more choices for voters," said the Center for Competitive Politics' David Keating, who helped bring about another key court decision, Speechnow V. FEC, that laid the groundwork for super-PACs in 2010. "We may end up with best informed primary electorate ever."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But Gross called the prominence of the outside groups “unhealthy” to the system. “Candidates who are not viable can be propped up by a handful of donors,” he said.

Thanks to the court rulings, super-PACs can raise unlimited amounts from individuals and corporations, and can spend money directly on campaign advocacy, as long as they don't coordinate spending with a candidate. (Direct campaign contributions are still limited to $5,400 between the primary and general election.) Although some super-PACs were around in the 2012 race, they were newer and campaign lawyers were cautious about using them. This time around, they are not only starting earlier and with better funding, but in some cases they are taking over functions traditionally handled by campaigns, such as fielding press inquiries and organizing volunteers in early primary states.

The head of the PACs so far is Jeb Bush, the former Florida governor, who founded and raised millions for his super-PAC months before he officially declared his candidacy. The PAC's $103 million haul is about 9 times what his actual campaign has raised.

Bush faces a field of GOP contenders with similarly deep-pocketed backers. Groups backing Scott Walker, the Wisconsin governor, and Senators Marco Rubio and Ted Cruz have all indicated they've got $25 million or more to spend.

“In the era of super-PACs, as long as you have even just one or two donors who are willing to write large checks to support a candidate, that may be enough to keep a candidate in the race,” said Anthony Corrado, a professor of government at Colby College in Maine. He said this year's Republican field is the largest for either party since at least the 1970s.

The story is different on the Democratic side, where front-runner Hillary Clinton has focused her fundraising efforts on her official campaign. She's raised $45 million, compared with about $24 million gathered by allied outside groups. Bernie Sanders has discouraged super-PACs from backing his campaign and has raised about $15 million through traditional means.

Former hedge-fund manager George Soros, the media mogul Haim Saban, and the DreamWorks Animation CEO Jeffrey Katzenberg are among those mentioned in media reports as having written large checks to groups backing Clinton. The Florida car dealer Norman Braman, the pipeline billionaire Kelcy Warren, and the hedge-fund executive Robert Mercer are among those said to be already backing various Republicans.

The only Republican candidate unlikely to be dependent on outside money is Trump, the real-estate mogul and television personality who pegs his own net worth at almost $9 billion. “I'm not using donors,” he said when he declared as a candidate last month. “I don't care. I'm really rich.”

Trump's Popularity Rises, Still 2-1 Negative, While Clinton Regains Positive Territory //ABC //
Gregory Holyk – July 15, 2015

Positive views of Donald Trump have doubled since his controversial comments on immigration, although many more Americans still dislike rather than like him, now by nearly a 2-1 margin — and his negatives have soared among Hispanics, a sought-after group in national politics.

Thirty-three percent of Americans see Trump favorably; that’s doubled from 16 percent in a pre-candidacy ABC News/Washington Post poll in late May. Sixty-one percent see him unfavorably, down from 71 percent but still leaving him deeply under water in popularity overall.

Among Hispanics, negative views of Trump have jumped by 21 percentage points, from 60 percent in May to 81 percent today. That’s a potential challenge for the Republican Party, which has struggled to win support among racial and ethnic minorities, with Hispanics a prime target.

Trump’s not alone with popularity challenges. While Republican fundraising leader Jeb Bush has gained some ground, just 38 percent of Americans see him favorably – a scant 5 points more than Trump’s rating — while 47 percent rate Bush unfavorably.

On the Democratic side, Hillary Clinton’s favorability rating has improved to a majority after a sustained fall from her heights as secretary of state. The much less well-known Bernie Sanders, while drawing crowds on the campaign trail, gets a split decision, 27-28 percent.

Trump’s positive ratings are up very sharply among Republicans and strong conservatives, by 34 and 30 points, to 57 and 55 percent, respectively. He’s also gained 26 points among seniors and 24 points among whites, to 38 and 42 percent in this poll, produced for ABC by Langer Research Associates.

That said, Republicans and strong conservatives are the only groups in which majorities see Trump favorably. He’s seen unfavorably, for example, by 53 percent of whites, rising to 74 percent of nonwhites; 58 percent of independents; and six in 10 political moderates. And far more people strongly dislike than like Trump, 45-14 percent.

Fifty-two percent see Clinton favorably, up 7 points from late May, while 45 percent see her negatively – putting her popularity back above water, if not broadly so. The result reverses a 22-point drop in favorability from her peak in January 2013.

Clinton's improved the most since May among minorities, including Hispanics (up 17 points) and blacks (+12 points), as well as a mix of other groups, including Northeasterners (+16), "somewhat" conservatives (+14) and young adults (+12).

Positive ratings of Bush are up 6 percentage points from late May, albeit just to 38 percent; the 9-point gap between his favorable and unfavorable ratings has narrowed from 19 points in late May. Still, Bush has been stuck in the 30s in favorable ratings all year.

His improvement is broadly based, highlighted by 18- and 11-point advances in favorable scores among Midwesterners and Westerners and double-digit gains among Hispanics (+14 points), Democrats (+12), conservatives (+10) and men (+10).

Sanders, for his part, remains little known: Forty-five percent of Americans have yet to form an opinion of him. As noted, he breaks even among others, 27-28 percent, favorable-unfavorable, with his best ratings among liberals (45 percent), high-income earners (42 percent), college graduates (41 percent) and Democrats (36 percent).

Groups

Clinton's popularity in a comparatively uncluttered Democratic field reflects her better performance relative to Bush and Trump among her partisan and ideological base, as well as some key demographic groups. She's viewed positively by 82 percent of Democrats, for example, while 63 and 57 percent of Republicans like Bush and Trump, respectively.

Further, while Clinton's seen favorably by 76 percent of liberals, there are greater ideological divisions on the GOP side. Bush is seen favorably by just 43 percent of strong conservatives (vs. 52 percent of somewhat conservatives). That flips for Trump – 55 percent favorability among strong conservatives vs. 40 percent among somewhat conservatives.

Clinton essentially breaks even among independents, while Bush and Trump are under water by 13 and 23 points, respectively, in this group. Bush is much closer to Clinton among moderates, while Trump's popularity is well behind.

Clinton also gets at least as good a favorability rating as Bush or Trump among men, whites and seniors — more GOP- than Democratic-leaning groups — as well as scoring much better among women, nonwhites and young adults. Notably, two-thirds of Hispanics view Clinton positively, compared with 46 percent for Bush and, for Trump, 13 percent.

Bernie Sanders Won't Accept Money From Billionaires. Donald Trump Donated $100,000 to Hillary Clinton. // HuffPo // H.A. Goodman – July 15, 2015

American politics today is a battle for the trust and loyalty of not only rank and file Democrats or Republicans, but also for the ever-elusive swing voter. In 2016, Colorado, Ohio, Florida, Nevada and Virginia will be what POLITICO refers to as "super-swingy states" and with their total of 75 electoral votes up for grabs, the next president will have to convey an image of trustworthiness before reaching the White House. Therefore, it's tough to say "Basta" when it comes to rhetoric, but not around $100,000 from a controversial billionaire. According to The Clinton Foundation, Donald Trump is listed as contributing somewhere between $100,000-$250,000, making it difficult to believe (if one correlates values to refusing money from people they oppose ideologically) the verbal sparring match between Clinton and Trump.

In terms of honesty from a new perspective in American politics, POLITICO published a piece titled "Bernie Sanders Doesn't Follow the Money" and quotes Vermont's Senator as boldly stating, "I don't want money from the billionaires." Sanders wants to break up the banks, enact a modern-day Glass Steagall, thinks that we've entered an era that could lead to oligarchy, and believes the "Billionaire Class" has too great a control of our political system.

The man is honest. He says things that simply aren't said in today's jaded political environment. Furthermore, not since the days of Theodore Roosevelt or William Howard Taft has a political figure spoken and acted in such a bold manner towards Wall Street and big business. Speaking of Roosevelt, the University of Virginia's Miller Center describes the Republican icon in the same manner people today speak of Bernie Sanders:

At the turn of the 20th century, Americans had begun to look for ways to address some of these problems. As chief executive, Roosevelt felt empowered by the people to help ensure social justice and economic opportunity through government regulation.

One of Roosevelt's central beliefs was that the government had the right to regulate big business to protect the welfare of society.

Judging by America's wealth inequality, it seems that we have more in common with the Gilded Age than Clinton, Trump, or Bush would like to admit. Also, comparing Roosevelt to Sanders is not only apt, but also addresses the key issues that make Vermont's Senator so popular. It's also important to note that if Fox News were around during Roosevelt's time, the conservative news station would refer to TR as a "socialist."

Sanders speaks his mind, and his actions back up both his value system and political philosophy. If it's too big to fail (even after the horrendous 2008 financial crisis), then it's too big to exist. For this reason, Bernie Sanders raises money primarily from his website and not investment banks like other candidates.

Hillary Clinton, on the other hand, will not propose a new Glass-Steagall, her foundation is linked to ethical scandal, and Mother Jones estimates that Clinton has earned $5 million from speaking engagements to "corporate heavyweights." In terms of Donald Trump's latest xenophobic comments, it's admirable that Clinton has condemned the Donald's racist remarks, but donations from the billionaire raise questions as to the sincerity of their recent sparring match. According to a Daily Caller article titled Donald Trump Donated At Least $100K to Clinton Foundation, the same people claiming to vehemently disagree with one another seemed to have agreed in the past on campaign donations:

Potential 2016 Republican presidential candidate and attention-seeking businessman Donald Trump has donated at least $100,000 to the Clinton Foundation, despite his criticism of the foundation's dealings.

...What Trump neglected to mention was his own donations to the foundation. Trump is listed on the Clinton Foundation's donor page as having given somewhere between $100,001 and $250,000.

Perhaps the donation shouldn't be so shocking considering Trump also donated to Hillary Clinton's New York Senate campaign, before selling himself as conservative firebrand.
The Washington Post states that not only did Trump donate to Clinton, but "The biggest recipient of all has been the Democratic Senate Campaign Committee of New York."

As for the history between both Trump and Clinton, POLITCO published a piece titled Donald Trump has spent years courting Hillary and other Dems, and while they might be sparring politically at the moment, they've had a political association in the past:

Clinton, the Democratic front-runner and former New York senator who had some say over policy that could have impacted Trump's vast business dealings, received donations from both him and son Donald Trump Jr. on separate occasions in 2002, 2005, 2006 and 2007, according to state and federal disclosure records.

Trump has also been generous with the Clinton Foundation, donating at least $100,000, according to the non-profit.

...Trump defended his donations to New York Democrats in an interview with Fox News' Sean Hannity that April, proclaiming that in the state, "everyone is Democratic" and implying that to donate otherwise would be waste of his money.

In 2016, there's one question that all voters should ask: Why would Trump imply "that to donate otherwise would be waste of his money," and what utility did he derive from not "wasting" his money and donating to Clinton and other Democrats?

On the other side of the political spectrum, Bernie Sanders doesn't need the money of billionaires, since most likely they'd be "wasting" money on donating to his campaign. After all, Sanders is quoted in The Washington Post as saying things that no other politician in America would dare utter during an election cycle:

The American people do not want an economy dominated by a handful of gigantic Wall Street firms who live in their own world... These guys have engaged in a whole lot of illegal activity and highly complicated financial tools designed to enrich themselves. That has gotta be broken...

Let me give you some interesting news. I announced yesterday. In 24 hours, 100,000 people have signed up to join the campaign. We have received 35,000 donations. You know what the average donation was? $43. We raised a million and a half dollars in 24 hours with an average donation of $43.

That is where most of our money is going to come from...I will not be part of any Super PAC.

Throughout my career I have not taken any corporate PAC money. That will remain for this race as well.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Can I raise a billion dollars? Probably not. But the question is, can I raise enough money to run a grass roots campaign and utilize millions of people? I think we can raise that kind of money.

In contrast to Clinton, Bush, Trump and America's political establishment, Bernie Sanders sounds more like the protagonist in an old Hollywood film than a jaded politician eager to cater to all sides of the political spectrum.

Bernie Sanders can easily defeat any GOP nominee because he stands for the exact opposite of Jeb Bush or Donald Trump. For the Clinton campaign, donations from Trump and Wall Street could be a factor in why CNN published a piece titled Clinton's honesty and trustworthy problem extends to swing states. While Clinton, Bush and others will have to be all things to all people, Bernie Sanders simply needs to be himself.

For swing voters in swing states like Ohio or Florida, the trustworthiness of our future president will be partially linked to how they finance their campaigns. It's 480 days from Election Day, and Bernie Sanders has already stunned Washington's establishment and the country. It's likely that his refusal to accept money from people like Donald Trump will continue to help him, especially in swing states. It might also send an invaluable precedent and enable him to achieve a title once thought impossible for Vermont's Senator: Mr. President.

Bush Hails Uber, While Clinton Criticizes // TIME // Jay Newton-Small – July 15, 2015

Uber hitched an unexpected ride on the 2016 campaign trail this week.

During a rollout of her economic plan Monday, Democratic frontrunner Hillary Clinton took companies like Uber to task for not giving drivers benefits. On Friday morning, Republican presidential candidate Jeb Bush plans on hailing an Uber in San Francisco to show his support for the ride-sharing company and others like it.

For some Republicans, the contrast made Clinton an easy target.

Rep. Elise Stefanik of New York, the youngest woman ever elected to Congress, argued the former Secretary of State was out of touch with the younger generation. “If you look at millenials, we love those companies [like Uber], we love consumer choices,” she said. “It’s a big mistake, I think, that Secretary Clinton chose to go after those companies that are really disrupting those industries for the better.”

But the politics of Uber aren’t so clear cut for either side.

While Republicans love the idea of breaking taxi unions, GOP support for the sharing economy isn’t so clear-cut. Most of the sharing economy vanguard—companies like Uber, AirBnB and Lyft—were born in California, a big blue state, and their corporate blueprints assume the kind of large social safety net favored by Democrats.

As Uber CEO Travis Kalanick told reporters in Washington in November, the Affordable Care Act was “huge” for his company because the “democratization of those types of benefits allow people to have more flexible ways to make a living.” In other words, his company didn’t have to provide health insurance because drivers could buy it on their own through Obamacare. (That was eight months before a California court ruled that Uber drivers are, in fact, employees and thus were owed typical benefits, a decision the company is appealing.)

Democratic Sen. Mark Warner of Virginia, who built a fortune in cell phone technology, calls it “the gig economy.” Part-time or temporary workers already account for 40.4% of the workforce, up from 35.3% in 2006. Many of these workers have several jobs doing things like driving for Uber, renting out their couch through Airbnb or doing freelance journalism, software coding or videography. These jobs provide workers with flexibility and give them an alternative to unemployment, but the drawback is that they don’t come with the standard package of benefits most full-time workers have long enjoyed.

Despite Clinton’s harsh words for Uber, Jake Sullivan, one of her top policy advisors, told a group of Washington journalists at a breakfast Tuesday organized by the Christian Science Monitor that there’s no easy answer. “It’s a huge question and a very hard one,” he said.

While Clinton faces the risk of looking uncool by criticizing Uber, Bush faces an even tougher question. After all, repealing Obamacare is at the top of every 2016 Republican candidates’ list. It’s one thing to ride in an Uber, but quite another to figure out how to fix its business model if the safety net shrinks.

But if the 2016 candidates are just skirting around the edges of the issue, Congress has barely touched it.

A self-described pro-business moderate, Warner is just about the only one on Capitol Hill thinking about these issues. He’s exploring legislation that would help freelancers, such as creating an Obamacare-type program for retirement benefits or building off the model that some trade unions have for contract workers to receive benefits. He also is looking to revamp the tax code to create a category for “dependent workers,” a hybrid between a contractor and a full-time employee that would end the debates, if not the legal challenges, on exactly what kind of an employee gig economy workers are.

But Warner is months, if not years, away from legislation and little is likely to pass before the election, regardless. Which leaves the issue open for debate among the 2016 field. Where should workers in the gig economy get benefits: from their employers or the government?

Jim Webb: A respectable alternative to Hillary Clinton // Newsday // July 15, 2015

Jim Webb, a former Democratic senator from Virginia, likes to joke that he is probably the only person ever elected to statewide office in the Old Dominion who has "a union card, two Purple Hearts and three tattoos."

Now, as the fifth candidate to vie for the 2016 Democratic presidential nomination, Webb is aiming to become the first commander in chief with those possessions -- along with many other credentials. The highly decorated combat veteran, who led a Marine Corps platoon and company in Vietnam, went on to serve as assistant defense secretary and secretary of the Navy. His other medals include the Navy Cross, the Silver Star and two Bronze Stars. He has also written 10 books (including six novels), taught literature at his alma mater (the United States Naval Academy), won an Emmy Award in 1984 for reporting he did on U.S. Marines in Beirut in as a journalist for PBS, and earned a law degree at Georgetown University. He's the real deal.

Yet, when I was asked recently by a television producer what I thought Webb brought to the presidential race, the last thing on my mind was his resume. Rather, what occurred to me were the various constituencies -- including Democrats and independents -- that Webb might appeal to that are being ignored, feel they have no voice or haven't found a candidate they can support.

The media don't get it. The narrative I've seen is that Webb speaks for "Southern whites" -- the kind of folks who, the rest of the country assumes, want to roll back affirmative action and save the Confederate battle flag.

It's much more complicated than that. There are at least five different constituencies that might embrace someone like Webb:

-- Blue-collar workers. If you're in a union and you worry about being pushed out of your job by a trade deal that undermines American workers or you fear having to compete with newly legalized immigrants who take jobs and lower wages, then you're going to be leery of Hillary Clinton and the Democratic establishment. You want someone who fights for you. Webb could step into that role.

-- Those who want a "Plan B." Even if you support Clinton, you might still worry that she can't go the distance. Polls show that many Americans don't trust her, which is a likely response to multiple scandals involving everything from deleted emails to questions surrounding the killing of four Americans in Benghazi, Libya. If you feel like the revelation that torpedoes the Clinton campaign is just around the corner, you might consider Webb a safer bet.

-- Conservative Democrats. While our politics are polarized, we used to have liberal Republicans and conservative Democrats. Webb is the latter. Among Democrats, Clinton and Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont are racing to the far left. Conservative Democrats might feel as if they have no good choices. Webb gives them an option to stay in the party.
Opinion

-- The ABH ("Anyone But Hillary") crowd. There are Democrats who are not anxious to usher in another Clinton era. They want fresh blood, and so they're now supporting other candidates. For Democrats who are tired of dynasties and think the way to beat someone like former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush is to nominate a candidate who believes the presidency should be merited not inherited, Webb could be appealing.

-- Finally, the strategists. In 2012, Democrats defined Mitt Romney as rich, privileged and detached from reality. Now, if Clinton wins the nomination, it will be the Democratic candidate who -- with her husband -- is estimated to be worth between $100 million and $200 million. Meanwhile, on the Republican side, Sen. Marco Rubio of Florida is the son of a bartender and hotel maid. Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker is the son of a pastor and part-time secretary. And Sen. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina had parents who ran a restaurant and pool hall. Democrats need a candidate who can counter the populist appeal that this crop of Republicans could generate. That's not Clinton. It could be Webb, who grew up in a military family.
For the media to ignore all this, and boil down Webb's candidacy to crass racial politics and an attempt to give voice to Southern whites is an insult -- not just to Webb but to the remarkable country that he has spent much of his life serving and defending.

Dem ocratic poll shows Nevada Senate race a dead heat, Hillary up in the state // Ralston Reports

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

// Jon Ralston – July 15, 2015

The U.S. Senate race in Nevada is a dead heat while every Republican candidate would lose today to Hillary Clinton in Nevada, according to a poll conducted by a Democratic-leaning pollster for a Democratic SuperPAC.

The numbers for the Senate Majority PAC actually make sense despite what some will criticize as the source, especially because the partisan breakdown is reasonable (the pollster used the actual 39-34, D-R split, although performance usually favors the GOP to cut into that edge) and past crosstabs have shown the pollster, Public Policy Polling, knows the state. PPP, though, has had mixed results in Nevada, botching last cycle's LG race but besting other pollsters at times, including during the 2010 U.S. Senate race that most others had Sharron Angle winning.

Here's what the numbers show from this month, with a margin of effor of just under 5 percent:

►Catherine Cortez Masto, 42 percent; Joe Heck, 41 percent

►Clinton is up 48/43 on Marco Rubio, 48/42 on Donald Trump, 48/41 on Scott Walker, and 49/37 on Jeb Bush.

Six points on Trump! My God.

Those presidential numbers are not that surprising, considering the voter registration edge (55,000-plus) the Democrats have and the performance in 2008 and 2012 here.

The survey also shows the federal minimum wage could be an effective wedge issue for the Democratic contender, as you will see from the memo below.

By the way, the PPP poll is much more credible than the U.S. Chamber survey that showed Heck winning in a landslide and had questionable demographics. (The chamber, which started running ads for Heck this week, also refused to release any more information when I asked.)

Also, let's be clear: Any poll taken in July of 2015 does not mean all that much, and its release is designed to help fundraising and little more. Also, this race has always been destined to be close unless something unforeseen occurs, and the presidential contest in Nevada is a mystery wrapped in a conundrum surrounded by an enigma until we see who the nominee is.

And did I mention the election is 481 days away?

Here's the polling memo:

Subject: Nevada Senate Race Tight; Clinton Well Positioned in State

Date: July 15, 2015

A new Public Policy Polling survey finds that the open race for the Senate in Nevada is a toss up, with Democrat Catherine Cortez Masto leading Republican Joe Heck by a single point. Meanwhile Hillary Clinton is well positioned in the Presidential race, leading the top Republicans by 5-12 points in the state. Key findings from the survey include:

-For now the Senate race is about as close as it can be, with Cortez Masto leading Heck 42/41. There are indications within the numbers of Cortez Masto having more room for growth though- the undecideds voted for Barack Obama by 24 points in 2012 and they support Hillary Clinton over the trio of Jeb Bush, Marco Rubio, and Scott Walker by an average of 11 points. Those folks are likely to end up voting Democratic for the Senate too in the end.

-Hillary Clinton is the clear favorite for President in Nevada, and her coattails are likely to benefit Cortez Masto in the Senate race as well. Clinton’s up 48/43 on Marco Rubio, 48/42 on Donald Trump, 48/41 on Scott Walker, and 49/37 on Jeb Bush. If Clinton’s winning the state by those kinds of margins, she’s likely to bring Cortez Masto along with her.

One issue that gives Cortez Masto a decided advantage over Heck is increasing the federal minimum wage. 59% of voters support doing that to only 34% who are opposed. Heck’s conservative stance on that issue may prove untenable in a state that’s becoming increasingly Democratic in Presidential elections.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Nevada Senate race starts out about as tight as it can be. But Hillary Clinton's strength in the state and the continued growth of voters in Democratic friendly demographic groups leave Catherine Cortez Masto pretty well positioned for next year.

Public Policy Polling surveyed 677 Nevada voters on July 13th and 14th on behalf of Senator Majority PAC. The survey's margin of error is +/-3.8%. 39% of those surveyed were Democrats, 34% were Republicans, and 27% were independents or members of other parties.

Senate clears way for final vote on No Child rewrite // AP // Jennifer C. Kerr – July 14, 2015

The Senate has cleared the way for a vote by Thursday on a bipartisan bill to rewrite the George W. Bush-era No Child Left Behind education law.

Lawmakers have been considering the bill since last week. They voted Wednesday to limit additional debate on further changes to the legislation and move forward to a vote on final passage.

The bill, sponsored by Sens. Lamar Alexander, R-Tenn., and Patty Murray, D-Wash., would narrow the federal role in public schools by giving states and school districts more control over assessing the performance of schools, teachers and students.

It would keep No Child Left Behind's requirement for annual math and reading tests but prohibit the federal government from requiring or encouraging specific sets of academic standards, such as Common Core.

Common Core was drafted by the states with the support of the Obama administration, but the standards become a rallying point for those who want a smaller federal role in education

Senators intended to spend the next day discussing dozens of amendments before a final vote. Any bill that emerges from the Senate would then have to be reconciled with a more conservative version that the House passed last week.

The House bill, sponsored by Rep. John Kline, R-Minn., also lessens the federal role in education policy by turning more power over to the states to assess school performance and by preventing the administration from pushing Common Core on the states.

This bill also allows federal money to follow low-income children to public schools of their choice, an issue known as portability. Democrats do not support it.

Education Secretary Arne Duncan has said the White House would veto the House measure. Duncan has been more supportive of the Senate bill, but has urged changes that would require states to identify their lowest-performing schools and require those schools to have plans for improvement.

No Child Left Behind, which had bipartisan support and was signed into law by Bush in 2002, mandated annual testing in reading and math for students in grades three through eight and again in high school. Schools had to show student growth or face consequences. But critics complained there was too much testing and the law was too punitive on schools deemed failing.

The law has been up for reauthorization since 2007.

Obamacare Fines Paid by 6.6 Million Taxpayers, More Than Planned // Bloomberg // Anna Edney – July 15, 2015

About 6.6 million U.S. taxpayers paid a penalty imposed for the first time this year for not having health insurance, about 10 percent more than the Obama administration had estimated -- though a portion didn't need to.

The penalty of as much as 1 percent of income was implemented under the Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act, or Obamacare, and was meant to encourage people to sign up for health insurance. The Treasury Department had said in January that as many as 6 million taxpayers would pay the fine.

The average penalty was $190, the Internal Revenue Service said Wednesday in a report. About 300,000 taxpayers overpaid the penalty by a total of $35 million. Most should have been exempt for their low income, according to the agency.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The average overpayment was a little more than $110. The IRS hasn't decided yet whether to issue a refund for the overpayments.

"Since the majority of taxpayers use paid tax-return preparers, most would probably spend more than the roughly $110 average overpayment amount in preparer fees if amended returns are required," the agency said.

About 10.7 million taxpayers filed for an exemption from the penalty.

For those who did gain health-care coverage under new marketplaces created by Obamacare, 2.6 million filed for premium tax credits to help them afford insurance, adding up to $7.7 billion in subsidies. The average tax credit was $3,000, the IRS said.
About 8 million people purchased health coverage through the government-run marketplaces in 2014.

Clearing Hurdles to Iran Nuclear Deal With Standoffs, Shouts and Compromise // NYT // David E. Sanger and Michael R. Gordon – July 15, 2015

One by one, the roadblocks to a nuclear accord between Iran and the United States had been painstakingly cleared. But as the negotiations went into their third week in the neoclassical Coburg Palace hotel this month, a major dispute lingered: whether a ban on Iran's ability to purchase conventional weapons and missile technology would remain in place.

The American delegation, led by Secretary of State John Kerry, insisted on extending the ban. But Mohammad Javad Zarif, the Iranian foreign minister and his country's chief negotiator, was opposed. Backing him were the Russians and Chinese, equal parties in the talks, who saw a lucrative market in selling arms to Tehran.

A compromise was struck that fully satisfied neither side: a five-year ban on the sale of conventional weapons and an eight-year ban on ballistic missiles.

As Mr. Obama made clear again Wednesday, the alternative he saw to the deal was a steady slide toward another war — perhaps, aides thought, in just a year or two as Iran's nuclear abilities accelerated. Throughout the talks, he had one goal: to diminish the prospect that Iran could develop an atomic bomb — or could race for one before the United States and its allies could react.

For the president, everything else — Iran's support for terrorism, its imprisonment of dissidents and even some Americans, its meddling in Iraq and Syria, its arms trade — was secondary.

For the Iranians, this was a negotiation first and foremost to get rid of what Mr. Zarif often called the "unjust sanctions" while trying to keep their nuclear options open. But while they treasured their nuclear program, they treasured the symbolism of not backing down to American demands even more. But Mr. Zarif was walking his own high-wire act at home. While he had an important ally in Iran's president, Hassan Rouhani, hard-liners did not want to reach any deal at all; many were making a fortune from the sanctions because they controlled Iran's black markets.

And conservatives around the supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, were looking for any signs that their Americanized chief negotiator, who studied at the University of Denver, was ready to give away too much nuclear infrastructure without getting Iran the sanctions lifted in return, as the ayatollah had decreed.

There was no single event, no heart-to-heart conversation between adversaries or game-changing insight that made the Iran deal happen. Instead, over a period of years, each side came to gradually understand what mattered most to the other.

For the Americans, that meant designing offers that kept the shell of Iran's nuclear program in place while gutting its interior. For the Iranians, it meant ridding themselves of sanctions in ways they could describe to their own people as forcing the United States to deal with Iran as an equal, respected sovereign power. And it happened because a brief constellation of personalities and events came into alignment:

A sultan in Oman who convinced the White House that he could establish a back channel to the Iranians. The election of Mr. Rouhani, who Mr. Obama thought would be more receptive to his overtures than Iran's aging supreme leader. A series of insights from the Energy Department's nuclear laboratories that allowed the physics of enrichment to create new space for compromise among the political leaders. And the presence of two top diplomats, Mr. Kerry and Mr. Zarif, driven by the conviction that they could break an ugly 35-year history.

At one point last week the simmering tension between the two negotiators boiled over when Mr. Zarif felt his American counterpart was pressing too hard. “Never threaten an Iranian!” he shouted. At the other end of the table Sergey V. Lavrov, the Russian foreign minister, who has had his share of disputes with Mr. Kerry, tried to break the tension. “Or a Russian!” he said, as the room broke out in nervous laughter.

But during a break on one particularly discouraging March day in Lausanne, Switzerland, where negotiations were held before adjourning to Vienna, Mr. Zarif struck a different tone as he invoked the names of the key figures on two sides, including Vice President Joseph R. Biden Jr. and the top energy officials of the United States and Iran, Ernest J. Moniz and Ali Akbar Salehi.

“We are not going to have another time in history when there is an Obama and a Biden and a Kerry and a Moniz again,” he said, according to notes of the conversation. “And there may be no Rouhani, Zarif and Salehi.”

Barack Obama came to office hoping for a dialogue with Tehran but focused on the problem of nuclear proliferation. After Ayatollah Khamenei responded to Mr. Obama’s private letters with long diatribes about America’s efforts, the president turned to squeezing the country economically.

“Obama seemed very comfortable with the shift to sanctions after the Iranians failed to reciprocate to his overtures,” Gary Samore, then a senior White House aide. He pressed the Russians to delay selling the S-300, a sophisticated air defense system, to Iran, and sent a delegation to persuade Beijing to reduce China’s purchases of oil.

But when an offer to help get secret talks started with the Iranians came from Sultan Qaboos bin Said of Oman, the president was intrigued. Eventually the White House turned to a trusted ally to tease out the possibilities: Mr. Kerry, then a senator from Massachusetts. Meeting in Oman on Dec. 7, 2011, the sultan said an accord could be reached.

There was a high likelihood, the sultan said, that a deal could be reached if the Obama administration showed its seriousness about a diplomatic solution. But making a point that would recur time and again — down to the last days of the Vienna talks — he said that a way would need to be found to allow the Iranians to “keep their honor.”

It took seven months — until July 2012 — before secret envoys sent by Mr. Obama and Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton met with the Iranians, and that meeting went poorly. Then, in June 2013, came the election of Mr. Rouhani, whom the supreme leader had allowed to run, largely on a platform of ridding Iran of the sanctions that were squeezing the elite and middle class.

“The president said we had to work up a letter to him right away,” one of Mr. Obama’s senior aides said. “He sensed it was a moment we had to seize.”

As Mr. Obama’s aides sketched out how the negotiations might play out, they faced a threshold decision: Would they abandon the Bush administration’s mantra that “not one centrifuge spins,” a position they knew the Iranians would never accept? Or were they willing to allow a token Iranian program — a face-saving one — if the trade-off was two decades or so of restrictions?

A consensus quickly emerged that a contained program was far better than a smoldering confrontation that seemed headed toward a military strike. “The idea was that if we accepted enrichment it would be at a very small level,” said Dennis B. Ross, who served on the National Security Council during Mr. Obama’s first term. “By being very limited, it would be a manifestation that they really had a peaceful nuclear program.”

But it became clear that Iran envisioned something different: a sizable nuclear infrastructure that would take a pause of a few years, the price of ending sanctions, but then resume its march to “industrial scale” uranium enrichment. The gap between the American numbers of acceptable centrifuges and the Iranian numbers seem unbridgeable.

Looking for a way to break the deadlock without forcing the Iranians into a corner, the nuclear experts at the Energy Department began to present other, more complex options. The focus, they suggested, should not be simply on the number and type of centrifuges, but the “breakout time,” the amount of time it would take for Iran, under a “best reasonable” estimate, to produce a single weapon’s worth of material. Put simply, Iran could have centrifuges running if it agreed to a far smaller stockpile of fuel.

“There were many intense meetings on this,” recalled Antony J. Blinken, Mr. Obama’s deputy national security adviser at the time, and now the deputy secretary of state. “We had to present a lot of permutations to the president to meet his bottom lines.”

The military said it could live with a “breakout time” of a year; that was plenty of time to launch a strike to destroy Iran's production facilities. But the optics of allowing thousands of centrifuges to remain was not good.

"Throughout this process," Mr. Blinken said, "we've been faced with a choice between what is politically feasible and what is practically necessary."

It would be the first of many such choices.

Progress Is Halting

A series of secret negotiations with the Rouhani team, led by Mrs. Clinton's top aide, Jake Sullivan, and one of America's most experienced diplomats, William J. Burns, explored the possibilities.

"I have about six months to get this through," Mr. Zarif said in New York in September 2013, on his first trip to the United Nations as foreign minister after many years of academic exile. After that, he feared, the opponents of dealing with the United States would rise again. He was wrong: It turned out the process went on for another 22 months.

A first agreement, just to get Iran to freeze its current nuclear activity and blend down some stockpiles of fuel that the West feared was approaching weapons-grade, took months to negotiate. Then came halting progress, as the Americans began to realize that at every stage the Iranians were fighting to preserve every major nuclear facility. "It was all about perception," one negotiator said. "They fought to keep the buildings and tangible equipment. It was easier for them to give up fuel or parts of the equipment people didn't see." That preserved a narrative that nothing had been surrendered.

Last summer, Iran's supreme leader made the problem even harder, pronouncing in a speech (which took Mr. Zarif by surprise) that Iran should eventually have an industrial-scale enrichment program — with 190,000 centrifuges — to provide fuel for power reactors. The logjam was not broken until several extensions of the talks, and a marathon set of meetings in Lausanne, where a critical treaty had been negotiated at the end of World War I. By this time, Mr. Moniz and Mr. Salehi, a former foreign minister and now head of the Atomic Energy Organization of Iran, joined the talks to work out the nuclear details — in a less political, more scientific environment.

The officials working under Mr. Salehi "were mostly hard-liners, and they would give on nothing," one American official said. But when Mr. Salehi, who got his nuclear training at M.I.T. before the Iranian revolution, showed up and developed a rapport with Mr. Moniz, the secretary of energy and a former chairman of the M.I.T. physics department, the Iranian bureaucrats were often sidelined, or overruled. (Mr. Moniz played the connection to the hilt, showing up one day with M.I.T.-logo baby gifts for Mr. Salehi's first grandchild.)

Over intense days, in which proposals were sketched out on rolling white boards so that nothing was on paper, where it might have to go back to Tehran for approval, they worked out a framework.

The two scientists found ways to achieve the one-year breakout time, at least for the first 10 years, by reducing low enriched uranium stocks to a mere 660 pounds, down from about nine tons that Iran has now produced. In return, Iran would be allowed over 6,000 centrifuges, and an agreement to keep 1,000 of them in Fordo, the deep underground enrichment site that worried Israeli officials because it was impermeable to Israeli bombing. But no fissile material — the stuff of enriched uranium — would be allowed at Fordo, and last week the Iranians agreed to pull most of the piping out of the facility, making it even harder to restart operations.

Still, Mr. Obama had talked about the need to close the facility when he revealed its existence in 2009. There were other compromises. One Western diplomat said an initial hope among some of the nations involved in the talks was that the central provisions of an agreement would last 20 years. They got 10, with restrictions on how much of a stockpile Iran could maintain that last for 15 years.

"By the time we left Lausanne, most of the nuclear issues were solved, we just had to work out the specific wording," one of the negotiators said.

But tellingly, in the ensuing two and a half months, the two sides described their agreements in very different terms. Mr. Kerry described an Iranian capability that had been neutralized; the Iranians a capability that had been preserved. That set up a collision course for the last negotiations, in Vienna.

Political Requirements Differ

Mr. Kerry arrived in Vienna on June 28, hobbling on crutches after breaking his femur in a bicycle accident in France. His chief negotiator, Wendy Sherman, a tenacious, detail-oriented diplomat who had broken two or three bones of her own during the negotiations, had already been in Vienna for a week.

The Iranians, she reported, were intent on getting bigger, faster relief from sanctions, claiming Mr. Rouhani's political survival depended on it.

The United States also had its requirements. On the nuclear side, it needed to cut off all three of Iran's pathways to a bomb: obtaining uranium, producing plutonium and the covert manufacture or purchase of a weapon. Each of those carried enormous complexities. Politically, it needed to show that Iran met all its major obligations before sanctions were lifted, and that there was a mechanism to reimpose them quickly if Tehran stopped cooperating.

Mr. Obama had already given ammunition to critics of a deal when he said in an April interview that after year 13 of the accord Iran's breakout time could be down to nearly zero. That seemed to acknowledge the main critique of the emerging agreement — that it constituted the medium-term management of the Iranian program, not its elimination.

American negotiators believed the deal was better than that, but to constrain Iran's ability to emerge from the accord as a nuclear threshold state they had to pin the Iranians down on some of the technical details, including the development of more efficient centrifuges.

The problem was that the principal Iranian interlocutor for settling precisely that issue, Mr. Salehi, was missing: He had undergone three abdominal operations in the previous two months, and on a conference call a few weeks before Mr. Moniz thought he sounded weak. "We didn't know if Salehi was reluctant to come, or too weak," said one senior American official. But without him, "we were getting nowhere."

Two days after Mr. Kerry arrived, Mr. Zarif took a quick trip to Tehran, ostensibly for consultations. Most important, he returned with Mr. Salehi on his plane. The atmosphere at the Coburg Palace was tense. But on July 4, the Iranians broke the ice by inviting the Americans for lunch, at which Mr. Zarif complained about ads in Tehran that were inveighing against the deal. Mr. Kerry talked about complaints he was getting from critics at home, who he said were attacking an agreement without even bothering to learn the details.

But the talks dragged on.

The Iranians appeared to think they could exploit a deadline for submitting a finished accord to Congress for a 30-day review. The deadline was July 9. "It was working against us," one diplomat said. "The Iranians saw that deadline and they were convinced we would give in on key details to avoid the longer review."

At the White House, Mr. Obama, monitoring the talks every few hours, was getting concerned about a narrative that he and Mr. Kerry wanted a deal too much — three mornings in a row Mr. Obama reminded his aides, "I don't need this." They were not certain what he meant, but they had a theory: After big victories in the Supreme Court on health care and the gay rights, he could afford to be patient.

The days ticked by, with halting progress. Mr. Moniz finished the nuclear details, often in meetings in the impressive stone basement of the Coburg, built from the ramparts of old Vienna. The Iranians called it Fordo — because, if you ignored the 60,000 wine bottles, it looked like their underground enrichment center.

The last stretch was taken up largely with the wording of a United Nations Security Council resolution that would lay out the terms of the arms embargo. Finally, on Tuesday, the agreement was announced.

When the photo ops were over, the seven foreign ministers who had negotiated it met for the last time. Each spoke briefly about the importance of the moment. Mr. Kerry spoke last, but then added a personal coda. Choking up, he recalled going off to Vietnam as a 22-year-old naval officer and said he never wanted to go through that again. He emerged committed, he said, to using diplomacy to avoid the horrors of war.

Greece, Its Back to the Wall, Adopts Austerity Steps // NYT // Suzanne Daley and James Kanter – July 15, 2015

Under threat from the nation's creditors to move quickly or lose any chance of obtaining a desperately needed new bailout package, Greece's Parliament approved painful new austerity measures early Thursday, virtually guaranteeing that life would get harder for millions of Greeks.

With banks closed and the economy on the verge of collapse, Prime Minister Alexis Tsipras had urged the adoption of the measures, saying that while it was a difficult deal the creditors were offering, it was the only one available and would avert a humanitarian and fiscal disaster.

The measures passed easily, with a vote of 229 to 64, with six abstentions. Yet much of the support came from opposition parties. Thirty-two members of Mr. Tsipras's own Syriza party voted no, including three of his ministers, throwing the stability of his left-wing coalition government into question.

The vote came a day after the International Monetary Fund signaled that it might not back the new bailout unless the pact substantially reduced the debt burden on Athens. That stance aligned it with Mr. Tsipras on the question of debt reduction and provided him with new ammunition to argue that the bailout plan did not do enough to get the Greek economy back on its feet.

But with the country teetering on the edge of insolvency, Athens moved ahead with the vote. It needed to begin unlocking the aid necessary to meet a debt payment on Monday, put its banks on sounder footing and negotiate a three-year package that would provide it with as much as 86 billion euros, or about $94 billion, in assistance.

Mr. Tsipras was given only two days to begin to pass the creditors' proposals. And as the vote neared, many in his party expressed profound dismay that they were being asked to approve measures that would reduce pensions and raise a wide array of taxes. One minister resigned before the vote.

In his address to the deputies, the prime minister made no secret of his unhappiness with the offer, which had forced him to backtrack on virtually every campaign promise he made and which many leading economists have condemned as unworkable.

But Mr. Tsipras said the alternative — exile from the eurozone — was the greater evil.

"We took on powerful opponents, we clashed with international financial system," he said. "And in that sense it was an uneven battle. But I'm proud of our fight."

But some members of his party had argued earlier that more austerity betrayed all that the party stood for and could not be accepted, especially after 60 percent of Greek voters had already rejected less harsh terms in a referendum just 10 days before.

"The people spoke," said one Syriza member, Zoi Konstanpopoulou, the speaker of Parliament. "We have a duty to defend their decision because our power is sourced from them."

Whether Mr. Tsipras will have to fashion a new coalition is unclear. Some party members suggested that with no one calling for a vote of confidence or a new election, he might be able to hang on.

Other analysts said that he would no doubt eventually have to form a new unity government with other parties.

While Mr. Tsipras signed an agreement with his creditors on Monday, there are still many potential pitfalls, including the fact that the accord must win parliamentary approval in each of the other eurozone countries. France has already given its approval, and German legislators could take up the issue by Friday. On Thursday, finance ministers are to discuss bridge financing for Greece until the terms of a longer agreement can be worked out.

Members of Syriza welcomed the I.M.F. report. Dimitrios Papadimoulis, a member of the European Parliament who is close to the prime minister, said that the fund's position could be helpful in the long run but that did not make Wednesday's parliamentary vote any less urgent.

He said the fund's position had provided an "additional argument" for reducing his country's debt payments, but that right now Greece needed to "stay alive" and approve the measures demanded by its European creditors.

The I.M.F.'s signal on Tuesday that it supported steps like forgiving some of the debt or putting a three-decade moratorium on debt payments put it in conflict with Greece's European creditors.

Under the terms of the agreement, reached after a weekend of contentious negotiations, the creditors would not forgive any debt and offered only a general assurance of further discussions about reducing annual debt payments by stretching out payment periods or reducing interest rates.

The bailout would be the third for Greece in five years and would involve new loans from the other countries that use the euro, the European Central Bank and the monetary fund.

The fund's decision to go public with its position suggested that the draft agreement would be only the starting point for further negotiations about the sustainability of the debt and the willingness of lenders to recognize that they might not get all their money back.

In Athens, tensions flared as Parliament prepared to vote. When the controversial former finance minister, Yanis Varoufakis, took the floor to compare the deal reached over the weekend in Brussels to the Treaty of Versailles, which imposed harsh conditions on a defeated Germany after World War I, one member of the center Right Democracy Party interrupted him to shout, "You ruined the country." Mr. Varoufakis, who along with Mr. Tsipras had taken a confrontational stance with the creditors, said he would not vote for the legislation.

Opposition party members took turns blaming Mr. Tsipras for the current state of affairs, but vowed to vote for the measures anyway. Harry Theoharris, of the centrist To Potami party, said that 10 years from now students would be studying the events of today and “how we shot ourselves and then started whining for a disability benefit.”

If nothing else, Greeks took some solace from the idea that the I.M.F. report would help keep attention focused on the issue of the debt, which Greece had long maintained was so heavy a burden that it choked off hope of any economic recovery and forced unjustifiably deep cuts in government spending.

“Certainly this issue is also going to be part of the discussions, negotiations when we’ll be discussing the memorandum of understanding, when we will be really preparing the third Greek program,” Valdis Dombrovskis, a vice president of the European Commission responsible for the euro, told the news media in Brussels.

The I.M.F.’s position highlighted a rift between European countries. Some, including Germany, are adamantly against writing off any of Greece’s debt of more than €300 billion, or about $330 billion. Others, including France, have stressed the need to reduce Greece’s debt payments to a more realistic and sustainable level, if not by forgiving any of the debt then by extending the payment schedule or cutting interest rates.

The French government, which has played a central role in efforts to keep Greece in the eurozone, said it welcomed the fund’s comments.

“The I.M.F. is saying the same thing that we are,” Michel Sapin, the French finance minister, told BFM television on Wednesday. “That we have to help Greece, but that we can’t do it if we maintain the same repayment burden on the Greek economy.”

Wolfgang Schäuble, the German finance minister, has been one of the most hard-line opponents of debt relief for Greece.

He indicated on Tuesday that there was continued resistance in the German government to the deal forged last weekend and a willingness to consider whether it might be better for Greece to leave the eurozone.

Chancellor Angela Merkel of Germany has ruled out writing off any of the Greek debt, but has left the door open to renegotiating the terms for paying it back, suggesting that there remain grounds for a compromise.

    - PA is key to McCain's win. Get involved in McCain's campaign.
    - McCain not typical politician-- he's on time today.
- 15 minutes later-- Announce that McCain will be out shortly
- Sen. Lisa Baker gives introductory remarks-- notes that this is McCain's first visit to PA and northeast PA; paints McCain as a "straight-talk"ing maverick; physically and spiritually tested
    - flubs-- McCain has the steel of spirit that a "divisive"--corrects "decisive leader needs"

Speech Highlights:

- TY for coming out -- I know everybody has something else to do today. Town halls are the essence of USA.
- Americans are facing major challenges in this country. We're all going to have to come together--Dem and GOP--and put our country first.
- USA has faced greater challenges in the past and we may again in the future.
- Right now we know in the past we have overcome those: we went to the moon faster than anyone had anticipated, we defeated the Nazis.
- Price of gas hurting every one. "Every time you go to the gas station you are shocked by the price of a gallon of oil" Lowest-income Americans hurting the most, that's why I wanted to give them a little gas tax holiday. You know what might happen? We might not be able to fund some of those pork-barrel projects that Congress loves spending money on, or build a bridge to nowhere. [awkward: 'You might-- you might-- you might--!"]
- This is an economic, national security, energy issue.

    - We are sending money to people who don't like us very much.
    - Largest transfer of wealth
    - I believe greenhouse gas emissions are real, climate change is real.

- We need wind, solar, nuclear. Navy hasn't had an accident in 60 years. The problem is that we don't store or re-process the spent fuel. We always want to imitate the French. So what do they do? Reprocess it! We can store and re-process it. It will have an immediate impact on our demand for foreign oil.
- A week or so after the Prez lifted the federal moratorium on dirilling"We need to drill off shore! We need to get our resources that are off shore and get them into our market!" So that the world will know we're on our way to being independent.
- US sits on one of greatest . I'm willing to spend $2B / year on R & D for clean coal technology. think about how many jobs that would generate
- It takes French 5 years to build a nuclear power plant. why should it take us 15? I want 45 new plants by 2030.
- Obama doesn't want to drill. Obama's presidential seal said in Latin something like 'yes we can.' I think it should say 'No we won't'
- I was recently in Detroit and saw this new car they're trying to get out by 2010. We need to have flex fuels (use ethanol) cars, hybrids, cars with batteries that will take them 200 mi. If people want to buy that car, I will give them up to a $5k tax credit.
- I call it the Lexington Project. You can call it anything you want.
- We have faced greater challenges. There are people here who have served in teh military. They were able to emerge victorious and I'm sure USA can follow in their footsteps.
- One more issue-- this on-going debate about the war in Iraq. We won a very easy initial strategy. Then we employed a very bad strategy that almost lost us this. I knew it was bad, I fought against it, and I was called disloyal by GOPs. I knew the strategy we had to take, we switched strategy and we found the great Gen. Petraeus to lead us. It's called a surge, but it's more-- it's basically a counter-insurgency strategy. Petraeus has troops going into neighborhoods, stay, and make sure they can do all the things that are part of a normal life. First, they had to fight back AQI. This strategy has succeeded. And we are winning this conflict.
- The benefits of this success are that we would restrain Iranian influence--btw, Iranians are still importing IEDs killing Americans. It would prevent AQI from establishing solid base in Iraq. And consequences of defeat would be terrible. If we lost
- I knew all this. I knew then and I know now.
- Obama said the strategy was doomed to failure, that there would be an increase in sectarian violence. This shows a tremendous failure to understand facts on the ground. "He would rather lose a war and win a campaign" He favors an unconditional withdrawal, which could lead to our failure and our return to IRaq. With me, we won't have to come back. because we will have won and we are succeeding. Obama says if we lose that we may have to go back. And we may.
- [Matthew Stanley story-- Make sure my son's death was not in vain.
- I want to be POTUS because I believe I can inspire a generation of Americans becuase I believe I can inspire a generation of young Americans to serve a cause greater than myself. Many years ago I had an opportunity to leave POW camp early because my father was a high-ranking admiral. But there was a Mexican-American named Everett Alvarez who had been there 2 years earlier. And I chose my country first. [enthusiastic applause]
- We may disagree on specific issues. Adn we can talk about them--well I hope not, I hope we agree on everything! Debate is healthy.
- (1) I need your support. PA will be battleground again. And I will always appreciate that support. (2) I will always put my country first and I will never let you down.

Question and Answer

- [jokes: We have work-release program
- 1Q) What are your feelings about Israel right now? Them having to give back land to the Palestinians? Status of Palestinians?

    - MCCAIN: That's a matter to be dealt with within Israel. Israel is probably under greatest threat since their independence--there is ample evidence that Iranians developing nuclear weapons and Russia is preventing us from imposing UN sanctions; but European democracies willing to help us. We have Hezbollah and Hamas on their borders. There's some disruption in Israel political process itself. Mostly I'm concerned about Iran's nukes, with leader claiming to wipe Israel off the map before the UN. US once said that we will never allow a second holocaust.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- 2Q) [lifelong Democrat--but independent-minded] Our country will have to monetarily support our troops. But will you continue to pour money into Iraqi government--they're not using their oil revenues. (2b) The $0.18 rebate doesnt amount to much.
    - MCCAIN: I'd like to introduce you to the guy that drives the diesel truck. For the lowest-income Americans it means a lot. Congress's approval is 9%. What would you rather have your tax dollars doing? Helping the low-income Americans or going to bridges to nowhere. It's not the answer. It's just a bit of a break. And we need to give them some breaks.
    - FOLLOWUP: I kind of get that, but it doesn't make a big difference.
    - MCCAIN: A lot of people I talk to say I want a little break. I'm not saying it's the answer. As soon as the Prez announced he was lifting the fed moratorium, the price of oil went down.
    - MCCAIN: Iraqis are taking up more of their responsible. There's corruption--it's not terrible, in Afghanistan its worse. They are paying for their oil production. And as American troops withdraw--and they will--that'll cut down our expenses there. Some straight-talk: a resurgence of the Taliban in Afghanistan, and we're going to have to send more troops there. Good news is that it's a NATO operation, though we will have to take the lead.

- 3Q) How will you address mandating and not funding for education?
    - MCCAIN: I think it's the worst thing they can do, because it leaves the burden on local governance. I think you're referring to NCLB--good idea but we never provided the funding. We need to fix it. I think it's been a great change in education because it allows us to assess. I believe in choice, I beliEeve in charter schools, rewarding good teachers, vouchers. That every family should have opportunity Cindy and I did when we sent our kids to Catholic school--and I'm not Catholic. Cases in point: NYC (when a school has a bad grade, parents move their kids to another school); NOLA (they had to start from square 1; they have over 30 charter schools. choice and competition "duh"). I think it's the civil rights issue of this generation providing every American with quality education.
    - FOLLOWUP: How do we control size of classes?
    - MCCAIN: I think too large class size degrades quality of education. But I believe you should have some flexibility in dealing with that situation. If your student grades can make progress, then good. If not, then you should pay a penalty.

- 4Q) What's your plan vs. Obama's on how you see the future of the economy within our nation and then across the world?
    - MCCAIN: Americans are hurting badly, especially downward spiral for homeowners. The energy crisis has been a double whammy, with the increased price of gas hurting plus increased inflation for food prices. This is a time of great challenge for America. We have to address energy crisis. WE have to be able to keep people in their homes: I want everyone to be able to get FHA 30-year mortgage for their homes at their NEW value and then pay that because the value of their homes has gone down. We have to stop the spending in Washington.
    - A little straight-talk: We GOPs when we came to Congress let spending get out of control. And I fought it every step of the way. I have never asked for or received a single earmark for my state of AZ. Obama has asked for tons. There is a difference. I will veto every earmark pork-barrel bill that comes across my desk. The last bad news is that it hasn't stopped in Washington even in these hard times--still the spending.

- 5Q) My son is at Drexel on a wrestling scholarship. My concern is if you needed to instate a draft, what would be your protocol?
    - MCCAIN: First of all, wrestling is great. ... Remind me of your question. I don't need we need to reinstate a draft. Our military today is the greatest, best-trained. But it's simply not big enough. And the PA Guard and Reserve have done magnificently. They've given and given and given. I served when there was a draft--it was unfair. The poorest Americans served and the wealthiest avoided it. The military today is so highly-trained that it doesn't do well with the short period of a draft. I want Americans to have the opportunity to serve, not be forced to. One of the biggest problems with after 9/11 is that we shouldnt have asked Americans to shop, but to serve.

- 6Q) What's your comment on Bush's remarks 'say bye to the world's #1 polluter? Why is it taking Iraqis so long to take control of their country?
    - MCCAIN: on 2nd question-- Because we mishandled it for nearly 4 years. We sent people from bases to fight and kill people and then they went back to the base. The new strategy isn't just more troops--they stayed, they lived and ate and slept along with the Iraqis. They had never known of a noncommissioned officer with real power. And then we got Petraeus and it turned it around in a relatively short period of time. It's succeeding and it's succeeded. And it means schools running and markets going without fear someone's going to run and cut off their heads. There are still going to be spectacular attacks and suicide bombs, but if you look at the overall stats, it's a success--but it's a fragile. Obama wanted us out last March. Can you imagine?! "I know how to win wars!" 2x
    - FOLLOWUP: I agree there's been progress. But sometimes Americans have problem admitting they made a mistake, e.g. Bush. And there are American soldiers lost! And Walter Reed!
    - MCCAIN: There's a great difference in the war in which I fought and this war. In the war I fought, vets were mistreated. Now Americans are divided, but they are treating the vets right. We need to improve our medical abilities to treat the wounds, we need to treat the PTSD. For routine health care needs, vets shouldn't ahve to stand in line at the VA, but should get a card and go to a doctor of their choice and get treated.
    - The issue of pollution will come up in another question because we covered a lot of ground. I think we can address it in a economic and efficient way.

- 7Q) On SS: Am I contributing to a program that will retire before I do?
    - MCCAIN: Unless we fix it. A great unjustice done to your generation is that this system is going to go broke adn you're not going to receive the benefits you're paying into. We know there's a set of solutions to restore the fiscal health. We need to sit down together. In 1983, SS was going broke. Reagan and O'Neill said we're gonna fix it. That's what's missing in America today in Congress. I'm committed to doing exactly that. I'll tell Pelosi and Reid, I'll give you all the credit. But I want to put Americans' interests first.

- 8Q) As GOP candidate for POTUS, do you have second thoughts on McCain-Feingold?
    - This meeting is adjourned. I do not. I believe that special interests outweigh the voice of those without the money and lobbying. There's corruption. I will continue to stand up against them. I voted against the energy bill, Obama didn't. The farm bill, incl the ethanol subsidies. I'll continue to work to clean up adn reduce the influence of special interests in DC. I'd like to tell you in DC today that your interests are uppermost, but I dont think they are. We'll have to continue to work. And our citizens should express their voice at hte ballot box.

- 9Q) How could you influence Congress to stop the spending?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- MCCAIN: First, get enacted a version of the line-item veto that is Constitutional. 43 of 50 governors have it. States have to balance their budget, fed doesn't have to. We need to increase the transparency. I'd like to do something like the British PM going back and forth with Parliament. Anything that gets Americans more involved. The day I'm elected--not inaugurated--is call Speaker and say I'm going to be in town next week. Let's get together and set priorities. And I promise you, I'll give you all the credit. We have to do it. This country deserves so much better than what it's got today. And you in PA will probably play a very large role in determining that.
- I strongly believe our best days are ahead of us. We talk about the problems. But I believe in the fundamentals of America. Every time I travel around the world, I am so happy to come back. God bless America. I need your vote!

Dear John:

Forgive me for a direct approach, but I wanted to put a bug in your ear. The Nonproliferation Treaty Preparatory Committee meeting started today April 29 in NYC. It's going to be a tough one, thanks to Russian misbehavior and myriad other issues. I would really like our nonpro team to be in place by then, to strongly represent the United States and show our leadership on these issues.

The team is made up of Adam Scheinman, who is slated to be our NPT envoy and delegation head, Robert Wood as Conference on Disarmament Ambassador, and Frank Rose, Assistant Secretary for Arms Control. If we can get them through Senate confirmation as a team in the next week or so, it would be extremely helpful to the President's Prague agenda, continuing to show strong leadership at a time of dire challenge to the nonproliferation regime.

Thanks in advance for your consideration,
Rose

Dear John,

Donald Trump turned the Republican debates into a clown show. It's a race to the bottom.

And now he's reached his very lowest point (yet). Trump started a childish feud with Megyn Kelly, whom he has referred to as a "bimbo," claiming that her questions about his sexism aren't "fair," and refuses to participate in tonight's debate.

The man who hopes to become our president — and has the numbers to actually become the Republican nominee — decided to pull the nuclear option because he couldn't handle a journalist's question.

It'd be comical if he didn't have real support — and not from big-dollar donors, but from voters. It's going to take a powerful, people-driven movement to counter Trump's popular insurgent campaign.

At ActBlue, we're working hard to make sure Democrats build strong grassroots campaigns, so they're able beat Trump and his down-ballot conservative cronies.

Even without Trump onstage, the Republican debate stage is going to be full of reckless leaders. Republican voters' second choice, Ted Cruz, was the one who shut down the government in 2013, after all.

With just four days until the Iowa caucus, and Trump and Cruz far ahead of the rest of the pack, it looks like the Republicans are going to nominate a rash, impulsive, ultra-right candidate.

If we want to protect our government, and help build a better future for every American, it's vital that we elect Democrats up and down the ballot.

And that can only happen if they're building strong, people-powered campaigns to counter Trump's huge number of supporters and Cruz's big-dollar donors. At ActBlue, we build the fundraising tools to make those campaigns possible.

Subject:	Initial Economic Questions for Republicans

On economic issues, I know Jake and his team will come up with a good list, but there are already two proposals on the table that I think we should try to get all GOPers to weigh in on:
--Rubio's tax plan that includes dropping the top rate for those making over $400k from 39.6 to 35.
--Rand Paul's 17% flat tax.
Also, it would be great to get:
--Dodd/Frank -- repeal? CFPB repeal?
--repeal of carried interest tax break
--repeal of oil company tax breaks
We already have the Senators' votes on Elizabeth Warren's student loan refinancing bills. We might get the other candidates too.
We might also get reaction to paid leave.

The Clinton Foundation is a totally non-political charity whose work saves and improves lives at home and around the world. Because of charitable contributions to the Foundation and its programs, 8 million people have benefited from lifesaving HIV/AIDS medications, 6,000 American schools are providing kids with healthy food choices in an effort to fight childhood obesity; 28,000 African farmers have improved their crops; and 248 million tons of greenhouse gas emissions are being reduced in cities worldwide. The Clinton Global Initiative brings together people from business, labor, government, and the non-profit world to solve problems without politics or gridlock. U.S. stocks plummeted again Friday, capping another volatile week of trading amid continued concerns that a slump in the global economy could spread to American shores. "All of the major indexes were down more than 3%, including the Dow Jones and Standard & Poor. The tech-heavy Nasdaq fell the most, nearly 4%. Merry Iconoclastic Christmas

William Rivers Pitt, Truthout: There may very well have been a guy born in Bethlehem who spent three years preaching against the order of his day until he was executed for it, but the gross manipulation of that alleged event definitely happened at the hands of people not seeking piety but power. So much of our culture has been shaped by the aftermath of the arrogance of the righteous, and we are all the poorer for it.

Video Games Gave Cultural Cachet – so Recognize Their Place in Society and History

Ashok Ranchhod and Vanissa Wanick Vieira, The Conversation: The UK's video games trade association has called for the products to be treated like other creative industries rather than mere "software," and there is a good argument for this. Games have been part of human civilization for thousands of years.

Anti-Black Racism and the Task of White Anti-Racists in This Historic Moment

Chris Crass, Truthout: The task for all who want to move white people into anti-racist consciousness and actions is to learn from the history of white anti-racists and continue generating positive identities rooted in challenging, not sidestepping, structural oppression.

Non-Violence and the Lost Message of Jesus

Mairead Maguire, Inter Press Service: In a world that has moved far from Christ's preaching of non-violence, a clear message and unambiguous proclamation is needed from spiritual or religious leaders that armaments, nuclear weapons, militarism and war must be abolished.

Bankers Brought Rating Agencies "to Their Knees" on Tobacco Bonds

Cezary Podkul, ProPublica: Wall Street pressed S&P, Moody's and Fitch to assign more favorable credit ratings to their deals and bragged that the raters complied. Now many of the bonds are headed for default.

Even With Ban, New York Can't Escape Effects of Fracking

Anne Meador, Cetology: Just because New York banned fracking, and even though more than 150 New York municipalities have banned fracking using local zoning laws, the state won't escape its effects.

Immigration Enforcement: A Tool to Silence Workers?

Steven Wishnia, Defending Dissent: How employers use immigration laws against workers who speak out on the job is murky. It's not as black-and-white as it was under George W. Bush, when massive ICE raids often coincided with union campaigns. The Obama administration has used more administrative measures – with the same results.

From the ER to the Courtroom: How Nonprofit Hospitals Are Seizing Patients' Wages

Paul Kiel, ProPublica: One Missouri hospital has sued thousands of uninsured patients who couldn't pay for their care, then grabbed a hefty portion of their paychecks to cover the bills. "We will be paying them off until we die," one debtor said.

Thank you so much. To the great Governor of Iowa and Lieutenant. Governor of Iowa. To my dear friend Tom Harkin for the outstanding work that he does. To the congressional delegation of Iowa that is doing outstanding work and to Nancy Pelosi , Madam Speaker, thank you all for the wonderful welcome and the wonderful hospitality.

[Responding to audience] I love you back.

A little less than one year from today, you will go into the voting booth and you will select the President of the United States of America. Now, here's the good news -- the name George W. Bush will not be on the ballot. The name of my cousin Dick Cheney will not be on the ballot. We've been trying to hide that for a long time. Everybody has a black sheep in the family. The era of Scooter Libby justice, and Brownie incompetence, and Karl Rove politics will finally be over.

But the question you're going to have to ask yourself when you caucus in January and you vote in November is, "What's next for America?" We are in a defining moment in our history. Our nation is at war. The planet is in peril. The dream that so many generations fought for feels as if it's slowly slipping away. We are working harder for less. We've never paid more for health care or for college. It's harder to save and it's harder to retire. And most of all we've lost faith that our leaders can or will do anything about it.

We were promised compassionate conservatism and all we got was Katrina and wiretaps. We were promised a uniter, and we got a President who could not even lead the half of the country that voted for him. We were promised a more ethical and more efficient government, and instead we have a town called Washington that is more corrupt and more wasteful than it was before. And the only mission that was ever accomplished is to use fear and falsehood to take this country to a war that should have never been authorized and should have never been waged.

It is because of these failures that America is listening, intently, to what we say here today -- not just Democrats, but Republicans and Independents who've lost trust in their government, but want to believe again.

And it is because of these failures that we not only have a moment of great challenge, but also a moment of great opportunity. We have a chance to bring the country together in a new majority -- to finally tackle problems that George Bush made far worse, but that had festered long before George Bush ever took office -- problems that we've talked about year after year after year after year.

And that is why the same old Washington textbook campaigns just won't do in this election. That's why not answering questions, because we are afraid our answers won't be popular just won't do. That's why telling the American people what we think they want to hear instead of telling the American people what they need to hear just won't do. Triangulating and poll-driven positions because we're worried about what Mitt or Rudy might say about us just won't do. If we are really serious about wining this election Democrats, we can't live in fear of losing it.
This party -- the party of Jefferson and Jackson; of Roosevelt and Kennedy -- has always made the biggest difference in the lives of the American people when we led, not by polls, but by principle; not by calculation, but by conviction; when we summoned the entire nation to a common purpose -- a higher purpose. And I run for the Presidency of the United States of America because that's the party America needs us to be right now.

A party that offers not just a difference in policies, but a difference in leadership.

A party that doesn't just focus on how to win but why we should. A party that doesn't just offer change as a slogan, but real, meaningful change -- change that America can believe in. That's why I'm in this race. That's why I am running for the Presidency of the United States of America -- to offer change that we can believe in.

I am in this race to tell the corporate lobbyists that their days of setting the agenda in Washington are over. I have done more than any other candidate in this race to take on lobbyists -- and won. They have not funded my campaign, they will not get a job in my White House, and they will not drown out the voices of the American people when I am President. I'm in this race to take those tax breaks away from companies that are moving jobs overseas and put them in the pockets of hard working Americans who deserve it. And I won't raise the minimum wage every ten years -- I will raise it to keep pace so that workers don't' fall behind.

That is why I am in it. To protect the American worker. To fight for the American worker.
I'm in this race because I want to stop talking about the outrage of 47 million Americans without health care and start actually doing something about it. I expanded health care in Illinois by bringing Democrats and Republicans together. By taking on the insurance industry. And that is how I will make certain that every single American in this country has health care they can count on and I won't do it twenty years from now, I won't do it ten years from now, I will do it by the end of my first term as President of the United States of America.

I run for president to make sure that every American child has the best education that we have to offer -- from the day they are born to the day they graduate from college. And I won't just talk about how great teachers are -- as President I will reward them for their greatness -- by raising salaries and giving them more support. That's why I'm in this race.

I am running for President because I am sick and tired of democrats thinking that the only way to look tough on national security is by talking, and acting, and voting like George Bush Republicans.

When I am this party's nominee, my opponent will not be able to say that I voted for the war in Iraq; or that I gave George Bush the benefit of the doubt on Iran; or that I supported Bush-Cheney policies of not talking to leaders that we don't like. And he will not be able to say that I wavered on something as fundamental as whether or not it is ok for America to torture -- because it is never ok. That's why I am in it.

As President, I will end the war in Iraq. We will have our troops home in sixteen months. I will close Guantanamo. I will restore habeas corpus. I will finish the fight against Al Qaeda. And I will lead the world to combat the common threats of the 21st century -- nuclear weapons and terrorism; climate change and poverty; genocide and disease. And I will send once more a message to those yearning faces beyond our shores that says, "You matter to us. Your future is our future. And our moment is now."

America, our moment is now.

Our moment is now.

I don't want to spend the next year or the next four years re-fighting the same fights that we had in the 1990s.

I don't want to pit Red America against Blue America, I want to be the President of the United States of America.

And if those Republicans come at me with the same fear-mongering and swift-boating that they usually do, then I will take them head on. Because I believe the American people are tired of fear and tired of distractions and tired of diversions. We can make this election not about fear, but about the future. And that won't just be a Democratic victory; that will be an American victory.

And that is a victory America needs right now.

I am not in this race to fulfill some long-held ambitions or because I believe it's somehow owed to me. I never expected to be here, I always knew this journey was improbable. I've never been on a journey that wasn't.

I am running in this race because of what Dr. King called "the fierce urgency of now." Because I believe that there's such a thing as being too late. And that hour is almost upon us.

I don't want to wake up four years from now and find out that millions of Americans still lack health care because we couldn't take on the insurance industry.

I don't want to see that the oceans have risen a few more inches. The planet has reached a point of no return because we couldn't find a way to stop buying oil from dictators.

I don't want to see more American lives put at risk because no one had the judgment or the courage to stand up against a misguided war before we sent our troops into fight.

I don't want to see homeless veterans on the streets. I don't want to send another generation of American children to failing schools. I don't want that future for my daughters. I don't want that future for your sons. I do not want that future for America.

I'm in this race for the same reason that I fought for jobs for the jobless and hope for the hopeless on the streets of Chicago; for the same reason I fought for justice and equality as a civil rights lawyer; for the same reason that I fought for Illinois families for over a decade.

Because I will never forget that the only reason that I'm standing here today is because somebody, somewhere stood up for me when it was risky. Stood up when it was hard. Stood up when it wasn't popular. And because that somebody stood up, a few more stood up. And then a few thousand stood up. And then a few million stood up. And standing up, with courage and clear purpose, they somehow managed to change the world.

That's why I'm running, Iowa -- to give our children and grandchildren the same chances somebody gave me.

That's why I'm running, Democrats -- to keep the American Dream alive for those who still hunger for opportunity, who still thirst for equality.

That's why I'm asking you to stand with me, that's why I'm asking you to caucus for me, that's why I am asking you to stop settling for what the cynics say we have to accept. In this election -- in this moment -- let us reach for what we know is possible. A nation healed. A world repaired. An America that believes again. Thank you very much everybody.

Obama and McCain Duel Over Foreign Policy (NYT 7/16/08)
By JOHN M. BRODER and LARRY ROHTER
Senator Barack Obama said on Tuesday that the addition of tens of thousands of combat troops to Iraq last year had significantly reduced violence in the country. But he said that positive developments there had not changed his mind about the need to pull troops from Iraq so America could focus more on the deteriorating situation in Afghanistan....Mr. Obama's likely Republican opponent for the presidency, Senator John McCain, drew the opposite conclusion from events in Iraq. He said the success of the so-called surge, which he supported from the start, pointed the way toward victory in both Iraq and Afghanistan.

"Thanks to the success of the surge, these forces are becoming available," added McCain. "Our commanders in Afghanistan must get them."

Did Obama Force McCain To Flip-Flop On Afghanistan? (Huffington Post 7/15/08)
By Seth Colter Walls
John McCain likes to paint Barack Obama as a naive follower on key national security issues. But by moving up his planned Afghanistan speech by two days to follow Obama's, and by agreeing that more U.S. troops are needed there, McCain appears to be following the Illinois Democrat on a major proposed shift for U.S. foreign policy.

When former Sen. This, historians will someday say, was the snarling end of an era in which our leaders believed that markets represented the very will of the people; that to serve one was to serve the other.

Both parties are wrongly blaming 'speculators' for our energy problems. (LA Times 7/15/08)
Jonah Goldberg
Contrary to nearly all received wisdom in Washington, not to mention the rhetoric of the presumptive nominees of both major parties, the scariest moments in American politics are often its most bipartisan. Some would say that this was demonstrated in the wake of 9/11, when all those allegedly terrible national security laws were enacted by both parties, or in the run-up to war, when Democrats and Republicans alike united to topple Saddam Hussein. But I find it is most true when Washington takes a populist turn, which it is doing now with pugnacious stupidity, attacking that classic populist boogeyman: the "oil speculator."

Jim Andrews and I have been pouring through the oppo and have a couple new possible negatives to suggest we test in the poll, since most of our attacks haven't been working. We also proposed language for a split message test between where we've been (ideas that sound good on paper/ can't wait) versus the new no barriers message -- stacked up against Sanders

Hope these are helpful.

YOU PAY FOR SOCIALISM

Bernie Sanders says he wants to restructure America's economy to make it work like it does in the socialist countries of Europe, providing things like free health care for everyone, free college for everyone, and free increases in Social Security for everyone. But Sanders does not mention that the middle class picks up the bill in these countries, paying nearly sixty percent of their income in taxes, three times what middle class Americans pay now.

FREE STUFF FOR EVERYBODY

Bernie Sanders said –quote– "all necessities of life must be provided free for people," and over the years he's proposed a radical restructuring of the entire American economy to make many things free, from the gas for people's cars to telephones and now free college and health care. To do this, Sanders proposed the complete government takeover of all oil companies, gas companies, electric utility companies, phone companies, health care companies, and all television networks. Combined, Sanders proposals would put the government in control of more than half of the American economy, but Sanders has never told anyone who would pay for all of this or how it would work.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

SPEND, TAX AND COVER IT UP

Bernie Sanders' spending plans cost at least eighteen trillion dollars, would increase government spending by 50% and equal the size of the current national debt. And it's actually worse. Experts say Sanders health care plan alone is quote –twice as expensive as he says it is and they say Sanders plans would increase middle class taxes by one third, even for people making less than nineteen thousand a year, and Sanders plans would raise the top tax rate to seventy seven percent. The Boston Globe said –quote "Sanders is not leveling with voters" about the real cost of his spending plans.

EXTREME ON NATIONAL SECURITY

Bernie Sanders' extreme views would gut America's national security and make less safe. Sanders ran for Congress calling for the military budget to be cut by more than half and spending the money on a "major electrified rail system" instead. In Washington, Sanders sponsored a law to unilaterally terminate America's entire nuclear weapons program and sponsored another law to cut the nuclear submarine fleet in half. In Congress, Sanders proposed massive cuts in the intelligence budget and earlier said we should shut down the entire CIA because –quote they "might even be able to overthrow the U.S. government if they chose to." Sanders is so ideologically committed to military cuts that just last year he said –quote we shouldn't spend money on the military "even if it does create jobs."

TROUBLING PATTERN ON CAMPAIGNING

Bernie Sanders says he's running a different kind of campaign, but the record tells another story. Last year a Sanders affiliated political action committee was fined by the federal election commission and Sanders staffers were caught hacking into computers and stealing data on political opponents. This year, Sanders got caught running ads that said he was endorsed by newspapers that actually endorsed his opponent and was forced to remove ads from the air. Sanders got caught claiming endorsements from organizations that endorsed his opponent and the American Legion is now threatening to sue him for falsely claiming he has their support.

TROUBLING PATTERN ON WOMEN

Bernie Sanders says he supports women's rights, but has a pattern of expressing and tolerating extreme views on women. Sanders once wrote that men fantasize about women being on their knees and women fantasize about being raped by three men simultaneously. Sanders wrote another article that connecting women's sexual behavior to breast cancer and said the way parents teach their daughter about sex –quote– "very well determine whether or not she will develop breast cancer." Now Sanders' supporters are flooding the internet with troubling comments about women quote –voting with their vaginas– and calling women who support Hillary Clinton quote –bitches.

BERNIE VS HRC MESSAGE TEST

BERNIE

Bernie Sanders says we have a corporate establishment whose greed is destroying the economy and a corrupt political establishment beholden to billionaires. Sanders says the billionaire class can't get huge tax breaks and hide profits overseas while the middle class is being hollowed out. Sanders says corporate America and the billionaire class have to start paying their fair share, and that to change things we need a political revolution to undo the power of corporate America and Wall Street. You sure can't change a corrupt system by taking its money. Sanders says one person alone can't change this country, but we can do it together.

HRC: BARRIERS

Hillary Clinton says we need to break down barriers of social injustice. Clinton says racism and sexism and other forms discrimination are not simply an effect of economic inequality, but are also part of the cause of economic inequality. Clinton says she will hold Wall Street accountable, but Wall Street is not gunning down young African Americans or denying immigrants a path to citizenship. Clinton says we can't move forward when women make seventy eight cents for each dollar men make, when people can be fired just because they're gay or when African American men go to prison at the same rate they graduate college. Clinton says that America can't reach its full potential when you're held back from reaching yours.

HRC CAN'T WAIT

Hillary Clinton says she is not interested in ideas that sound good on paper but will never make it the real world, and she won't make promises she can't keep. Clinton says the single mom who needs raise can't wait for plans that will never happen. The student with a mountain of debt can't wait. The grandmother who has to choose between paying for medicine and paying the rent can't wait. Clinton says she's spent a lifetime making a difference for people and getting results, from winning benefits for the National Guard and Reserve to winning health care for eight million children and she's ready to roll up her sleeves and get to work right now. Clinton says she's ready to tackle our toughest challenges and move our country forward.

John -

It's hard to overstate the importance of 2016 for veterans and military family members.

The Koch Brothers are financing a multi-million dollar campaign to privatize veterans health care.

Republicans running for Congress are eager escalate our endless war in the Middle East, threatening to re-commit more troops to the region and drop nuclear weapons on Iraq and Syria.

And, of course, control of the U.S. Senate is on the line and we're going to elect a new Commander in Chief before the year is done.

At VoteVets, we're set to take on these challenges and more, but we want to hear from you about your priorities for the year ahead.

Take a moment to complete our official VoteVets 2016 Supporter Survey, and let us know the issues you are passionate about in the year ahead.

With fewer members of Congress who have served in the military than at any point in decades, and none still in the race to become the next president, it is even more important that veterans and military family members make their voices heard on the issues of the day.

We're ready to lead with you, but first we want to get a sense of your thoughts for the year ahead.

Your priorities are our priorities -- let us know the issues you're most concerned about taking on in the year ahead.

http://action.votevets.org/2016-priorities

Thank you for making your voice heard. It's an important part of our decision making process as we consider our work in 2016.

Thank you for standing with us.

Hollywood Mogul Haim Saban Calls for 'More Scrutiny' of Muslims (Exclusive)

By Itay Hod on November 18, 2015 @ 3:59 pm
http://www.thewrap.com/hollywood-mogul-haim-saban-more-scrutiny-muslims-profiling-hillary-clinton/st_refDomain=t.co&st_refQuery=/agopLLvIFh

"You want to be free and dead? I'd rather be not free and alive," billionaire and Hillary Clinton supporter tells TheWrap Media mogul Haim Saban , one of Hillary Clinton's biggest backers in Hollywood, said that the U.S. should step up its scrutiny of Muslims in the wake of the deadly ISIS attacks in Paris.

In a broad-ranging conversation about his support for the former secretary of state, the 71-year-old Israeli-American businessman and philanthropist said that some civil liberties may need to be suspended in times of war.

"I'm not suggesting we put Muslims through some kind of a torture room to get them to admit that they are or they're not terrorists," he told TheWrap. "But I am saying we should have more scrutiny."

TheWrap spoke to Saban about his support for the Democratic presidential frontrunner — he and and his wife, Cheryl, gave $2 million to Priorities USA Action, Clinton's Super PAC, and hosted a fundraiser in May that netted another $2 million — as well as how the Paris terror attacks could alter the 2016 presidential election as well as civil liberties.

People keep calling the Paris attacks a game-changer. Are they also a game-changer when it comes to the 2016 presidential race?
It's a wake-up call. I fully believe we're in a different kind of World War III. What ISIS has proven is that they're not only active in Syria and Iraq, but they're active in Europe. We can't afford the next president, basically the leader of the free world, to be an amateur that has done nothing other than missing votes, or a clown, to be making the decisions as to how to react.

Why do you think Hillary Clinton is the right person for the job?
You need to bring together a coalition of other countries under one tent. For people whom Paris is the Eiffel Tower and not much more, it's going to be difficult. Hillary knows and has interacted with all these people, she has excellent relationships with all these people, is very respected by all these people and has been in the trenches her whole life. She's also made of steel. She's absolutely made of steel and she will take no baloney from no ISIS.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Did she underestimate the instability in the region while she was secretary of state which, some have suggested, led to the birth of ISIS?
The first thing I would say is, the state of the world is not [the way it is] because of climate change [a reference to Bernie Sanders' claim during the second Democratic debate last week that climate change can lead to terror attacks].

You want someone in the White House that's not going to tell you, "Ah... if we had a better climate strategy, things would be better." The other thing to remember is that when the Syrian people started demonstrating in the streets, [Hillary] recommended to President Obama that he arm those people so that they can achieve their goal of democracy. President Obama chose differently, right or wrong, and now we are where we are.

Some critics have said that she's partly responsible for the ISIS mess because she voted to approve the war on Iraq. Is she?
She did vote to approve the war on Iraq. She said she made a mistake and, frankly, I watched when a very reliable, respected individual such as Colin Powell showed us tubes and semi-trailers and told us this is the beginning of nuclear weapons. It wasn't just President Bush who said that. It was very respected individuals telling us that on TV to the entire nation. And living with a nuclear Saddam Hussein was not an option. Based on the information we had back then, the vote for the war was the right vote. She apologized, but I don't think she should have. But that's easy for me to say. I'm sitting in Beverly Park.

What are people in Hollywood saying about the Paris terror attacks?
Many members of the Hollywood community are very liberal and they value their civil liberties more than they value life. I disagree with that. You want to be free and dead? I'd rather be not free and alive. The reality is that certain things that are unacceptable in times of peace — such as profiling, listening in on anyone and everybody who looks suspicious, or interviewing Muslims in a more intense way than interviewing Christian refugees — is all acceptable [during war]. Why? Because we value life more than our civil liberties and it's temporary until the problem goes away.

But to say this is shameful — I disagree. [ISIS] said, 'We're going to Paris,' and they went to Paris. They're saying they're now going to Washington. Watch out, they might. I'm not suggesting we put Muslims through some kind of a torture room to get them to admit that they are or they're not terrorists. But I am saying we should have more scrutiny.

Do you think Hillary Clinton should change her position on allowing more Syrian refugees into the U.S. in the aftermath of the attacks in Paris?
I'm not in a position to tell you whether 10,000 or 65,000 or half a million is the right number. I don't have an opinion on that. But I do have an opinion on the scrutiny. Scrutinize every single individual. There is no data available from Syria. The country is completely in turmoil. It's all a judgment call of the person conducting the interview. So it's too dangerous.

Do you think the Paris attack will inadvertently help Hillary Clinton now that foreign affairs has become such a focal point in the campaign?
I do think it will help because she's the only one with the resume and the most qualified to deal with this.

A look at 10 of former First Lady's biggest moments in the White House, as Secretary of State and as Democractic candidate for president.

Photos of then Secretary of State Hillary Clinton checking her email went viral in 2011. When Clinton joined Twitter last month, she chose a shot like this for her profile page, quickly racking up 650,000 followers.

Subject: RE: draft for Poznan message / Govr Summit

Below is the final draft script for the Govs' Summit video - - with signoff from FP and E&E Team. We have included 2 options about congressional observers, as directed. Please let me know if you need anything else.

DRAFT SCRIPT:
Let me begin by thanking the bipartisan group of U.S. governors who convened this meeting.

Few challenges facing America – and the world – are more urgent than combating climate change. The science is beyond dispute and the facts are clear. Sea levels are rising. Coastlines are shrinking. We've seen record droughts and record famines, and storms that are growing stronger with each passing hurricane season.
I know many of you are working to confront this challenge. In particular, I want to commend Governor Sebelius, Governor Doyle, Governor Crist, Governor Blagojevich and your host, Governor Schwarzenegger – you have shown true leadership in the fight to combat global warming. And we've also seen a number of businesses doing their part by investing in clean energy technologies.
But too often, Washington has failed to show the same kind of leadership. That will change when I take office. My presidency will mark a new chapter in American leadership on climate change.
That will start with a federal cap and trade system. We will establish strong annual targets that will set us on a course to reduce emissions to their 1990 levels by 2020 and to reduce them an additional 80% by 2050.
Further, we will invest $15 billion each year to catalyze private sector efforts to build a clean energy future. We will invest in solar power, wind power, and next generation biofuels. We will tap nuclear power, while making sure it's safe. And we will develop clean coal technologies.
This investment will not only help us reduce our dependence on foreign oil, making the United States more secure. And it will not only help us bring about a clean energy future, saving our planet. It will also help us transform our industries and steer our country out of this economic crisis by generating five million new green jobs that pay well and can't be outsourced.
But the truth is, the United States cannot meet this challenge alone. Solving this problem will require all of us working together. I understand that your meeting is being attended by government officials from over a dozen countries, including the UK, Canada and Mexico, Brazil and Chile, Poland and Australia, India and Indonesia. And I look forward to working with all nations to meet this challenge in the coming years.
Let me also say a special word to the delegates from around the world who will gather in Poznan, Poland next month: your work is vital to the planet. I won't be President at the time of your meeting and, of course, the United States has only one President at a time.
OPTION 1: I've asked Members of Congress who are attending the conference as observers to report back to me on what they learn there.
OPTION 2: I've asked Senator John Kerry, an extraordinary leader with deep expertise on climate change, to report back to me on what he learns there.
And once I take office, you can be sure that the United States will once again engage vigorously in these negotiations, and help lead the world toward a new era of global cooperation on climate change.
Now is the time to confront this challenge once and for all. Delay is no longer an option. Denial is no longer an acceptable response. The stakes are too high. The consequences, too serious.
Stopping climate change won't be easy. It won't happen overnight. But I promise you this: When I am President, any governor who's willing to promote clean energy will have a partner in the White House. Any company that's willing to invest in clean energy will have an ally in Washington. And any nation that's willing to join the cause of combating climate change will have a leader in the United States of America. Thank you.

Subject: draft for Poznan message / Govr Summit

hi - I'm here with David Sandalow…

can we see the draft tonight?

we need to distribute, and discuss tomorrow - there should be an option to include John Kerry as the representative we are sending, or just to mention we are sending a representative tbd to the meeting. Timing of this videomessage will generate more speculation in Sec State / Kerry thanks,

Sara

McCain struggles to break free of Bush (LA Times 6/20/08)
By Maeve Reston and Bob Drogin
In the months ahead, John McCain will have to repeatedly beat back claims by Barack Obama's campaign that he is running to win a third term for the Bush administration. But events this week have illustrated just how difficult that could be. In this crucial opening phase of the general election campaign -- when McCain is trying to establish his independence from the unpopular president -- his message has repeatedly been eclipsed by that of the White House.

By August Cole and John R. Wilke
Democrats are taking fresh aim at Sen. John McCain's role in the Air Force's $40 billion tanker contract, saying he jeopardized thousands of U.S. jobs by helping steer the huge award to a European-designed competitor to Boeing Co.

McCain adviser in Republican attack (BBC 6/20/08)
By Steve Schifferes
John McCain's top economic adviser has attacked Congressional Republicans, saying they have brought "shame and disgrace" on the party. In a BBC interview, Doug Holtz-Eakin accused them of busting the budget with profligate spending programmes. The comments are part of a strategy by Senator McCain's camp to distance themselves from the Republicans and avoid blame for the economic downturn.

An Oily Mess (Newsweek Web Exclusive 6/19/08)
By Catharine Skipp and Arian Campo-Flores
For all their partisan bickering, Florida Republicans and Democrats have usually come together on one point: opposition to offshore oil drilling. But soaring gas prices and presidential politics have ruptured that consensus and now threaten to split the state GOP. The resulting disarray could have significant implications in the Sunshine State, which both Sen. John McCain and Sen. Barack Obama consider vital to their chances in November.

McCain Falsely Claims Katrina And Rita Did Not Cause Significant Oil Spillage (ThinkProgress 6/19/08)
Speaking before Houston oilmen yesterday, Sen. John McCain (R-AZ) declared his support for lifting the 25-year federal moratorium on offshore drilling. He justified this reversal of his longstanding opposition by explaining that it's now "safe" ... In fact, the clear satellite evidence of major spills was borne out by final reports.

McCain Now Supports GI Bill, War Funding Bill (ABC blog 6/19/08)
By Z. Byron Wolf
Sen. John McCain did not vote last month when Senators passed their version of a war funding emergency supplemental. But he said the bill being considered then was overloaded with funding for non-war related projects and he objected to a sweeping new benefit for veterans to get the equivalent of state college tuition and a living stipend after only a few years service because he worried it would affect military retention rates.

Bush And McCain Try To Steal Credit For Webb's GI Bill That They Consistently Worked To Defeat (ThinkProgress 619/08)
Yesterday, House leaders in both parties struck a deal on a war supplemental bill that includes expanded college benefits for veterans. The GI Bill is Sen. Jim Webb's (D-VA) version, as well as a provision allowing troops to transfer the benefits to family members. President Bush has promised to sign the legislation.

Bin Laden will be killed, McCain promises (Boston Globe blog 6/19/08)
By Foon Rhee
Republican John McCain vowed today that if he's president, Osama bin Laden will be either killed in combat or executed -- a stern response to Democrat Barack Obama suggesting Wednesday that he would put the terrorist mastermind in the equivalent of the Nazi war crime trials after World War II to avoid making him a martyr.
